predicate the existence of an intent on the part of the mortgagee to benefit the mortgagor, or to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors. Charges 9 and 23, requested by plaintiff, make the effect of the instrument upon the rights of other creditors the test of its validity, without regard to the real intent of the grantee therein. If the debt to Ewing was based upon his payment in good faith of claims against Bowman, at Bowman's request, such payment was a valuable consideration moving from Ewing, which was not vitiated by the fact that the claims so paid off in good faith were not themselves supported by valuable considerations. Charge 3 of the plaintiff's series was incorrect in asserting the contrary of this proposition. Plaintiff's charge 14 was properly refused because there were several deeds of trust in evidence, and the charge did not refer specifically to the one which was the matter of contest. Charge 22 assumes that the deed of trust in question covered all of Bowman's property. There was evidence tending to show that some of his property was not included. Charge 24 was argumentative. Unless the usury in the debt to Ewing was allowed and received for the purpose of fraudulently swelling the debt, it would not have effect to avoid the deed of trust. Harris v. Russell, (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 541. Charge f, on this subject, was properly refused. Reversed and remanded.

FARLEY v. FARLEY.

DIVORCE — PLEADING — COMPLAINT — VALIDITY OF MARRIAGE.

1. An averment in a bill for divorce that, on a certain day, complainant, "whose maiden name was ——, was lawfully and legally married unto ——," sufficiently avers the marriage.

2. A ceremony of marriage without license, and performed by an unauthorized person, and imposed on a woman by false pretenses, but believed by her to be lawful and bona fide, is valid for all civil purposes, unless and until avoided by the deceived person. Beggs v. State, 55 Ala. 108, followed.

3. An averment in a bill for divorce that "defendant has been guilty of adultery with divers parties and persons, whose names are unknown to your oratrix," is sufficiently certain.

Appeal from chancery court, Montgomery county; JOHN A. FOSTER, Chancellor.

Bill for divorce by Daisy Farley against H. C. Farley. From a decree overruling a motion to dismiss the bill, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Watts & Son, for appellant. Chas. Wilkinson, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. Appellee seeks by the bill the dissolution of the bonds of matrimony, on the ground that defendant has abandoned her, and committed adultery with divers other women. The appeal, being taken from a decree overruling a motion to dismiss the bill for want of equity, and a demurrer thereto, involves only the sufficiency of its allegations. The bill alleges that the parties were of the age of consent. The averment as to the marriage is "that theretofore, to-wit, on the 8th day of May, 1890, your oratrix, Daisy Farley, whose maiden name was Daisy Flexnor, was lawfully and legally married unto Hoxie C. Farley, the defendant to this, your oratrix's bill of complaint." This is a sufficient averment of the marriage. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 332. Defendant insists, however, that this general averment is limited and modified by subsequent allegations of facts, which show there was never a legal marriage between complainant and defendant. The allegations referred to are that defendant, having taken advantage of the innocence and inexperience of complainant, did not in fact have the marriage ceremony performed by an authorized minister, but substituted therefor a person unknown to her, who, she subsequently discovered, was not a minister; that defendant and such person represented to complainant that he was a regularly ordained minister of the Gospel, well known in the city of Montgomery; also that they had procured from the judge of probate of Montgomery county a license for the marriage of complainant and defendant; and that by these representations, which were untrue, they imposed upon her credulity, and she married defendant for her great love towards him. The bill also avers that complainant and defendant associated together and cohabited as husband and wife. Whether, under our statutes, a legal marriage can be had without license, and without solemnization, was left an open and unsettled question in Robertson v. State, 42 Ala. 510. But in the subsequent case of Beggs v. State, 55 Ala. 108, it was held that a marriage without license from the judge of probate, and without solemnization by any person authorized by statute to solemnize it,—merely by the consent of the parties,—followed by cohabitation, is valid. The statutes having been since re-enacted, without material change in phraseology, and as marriages may have been contracted on the faith of the decision, and the legitimacy of children depend on maintaining the rule therein declared, whatever may be our individual opinion as to the legality of such marriages, under our statutes, we do not feel at liberty to depart from the doctrine announced in Beggs v. State; if deemed impolitic and unwise, the legislature must furnish the remedy. It may be reasonably inferred from the averments of the bill, being taken as true, that complainant, at least, did not mean and intend to enter into the relation of husband and wife unless there was a formal solemnization of the marriage. As a general proposition, when the nuptials are delayed with an understanding of the parties that they are not to become husband and wife until a formal ceremony takes place, marriage is not constituted by copulation without such solemnization; for, in such case, consent to become husband and wife presently—indispensable to a valid marriage—does not exist. Peck v. Peck, 12 R. I. 485; 1 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 262. This, however, is not the question here presented. Complainant consented, in fact became the wife of defendant, though beguiled into the assumption, at that time, of the status of marriage by misrepresentations of the legality and binding effect of the formal ceremony. The precise question is, when there is an executory agreement to marry, with the understanding that the parties were not to become husband and wife without formal solemnization, what is the effect of an intervening ceremony, without license, and performed by a person unauthorized, imposed on complainant by false pretenses and representations, but believed by her to be lawful and bona fide? A marriage procured by deception and fraud, except, it may be, of certain kinds and magnitude, is not absolutely void, but only voidable, and valid for all civil purposes unless and until avoided by the deceived party. The party imposed upon may disaffirm or ratify the contract of marriage after discovery of the fraud; and it has been held that voluntary cohabitation thereafter as husband and wife is a ratification. As, under the rule declared in Beggs v. State, supra, a valid marriage may be constituted, without license and solemnization, merely by the consent of the parties, certainly complainant may ratify her consent to an immediate marriage, procured by false representations, and thus, by relation, render the marriage good ab initio. The contract, however, can be avoided only by the party defrauded. Says Mr. Bishop: "The doctrine seems to require no qualification that a voidable marriage is, until the act or sentence transpires which renders it void, as good for every purpose as if it contained no infirmity." 1 Bish. Mar. & Div. § 116. If, in answer to the usual questions, though propounded by a person not authorized to solemnize the marriage, both parties consented to a union, defendant is estopped from asserting that the consent was not mutual, or that he did not consent; he will not be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong and fraud to escape the duties and responsibilities of the marital relation." "The party who commits a fraud is bound, and remains bound until the party deceived has made his or her election, and will thereafter be bound, or not, according to the election made." Tomppert v. Tomppert, 13 Bush, 826; Hampstead v. Plaistow, 49 N. H. 84; State v. Murphy, 6 Ala. 765. The allegations of the bill, fairly construed, show that complainant elected to treat and recognize the marriage as valid. The averment as to the charge of adultery is "that said defendant has been guilty of adultery with divers parties and persons, whose names are unknown to your oratrix." The charge is averred with a sufficient degree of certainty. Holston v. Holston, 23 Ala. 777.

CRAFT et al. v. STOUTZ.

EXEMPTIONS—PROCEEDS OF LIFE INSURANCE POLICY.

Code, § 2856, provides that a husband or father may insure his life for the benefit of his wife and children, or minor children, and such insurance is exempt from liability for his debts or engagements, if the annual premiums do not exceed $500. Held, that a note given by a husband, which waived exemptions as to personal property, was in no sense a lien on the annual premiums paid by him on a policy in favor of his wife, where such premiums did not exceed $500; and, at the husband's death, the proceeds of the policy belonged to the wife absolutely.

Appeal from chancery court, Mobile county; W. H. TAYLOE, Chancellor.

Bill by Craft & Co., as creditors of the estate of Arnold Stoutz, against Julia J. Stoutz, executrix, to subject certain property to the payment of their claim. Judgment for defendant. Complainants appeal. Affirmed.

William E. Richardson, for appellants. Fredk. G. Bromberg, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. Craft & Co., complainants, as creditors of the estate of Arnold Stoutz, filed the present bill to subject to the payment of their claim certain property, the legal title to which is in the name of his wife, the respondent. It is unnecessary to consider the validity of the deed of 1883, by which Arnold Stoutz, the husband, conveyed the homestead to his wife. If null and void for want of consideration, or defective execution of the conveyance, or for any other cause, the mortgage on this property executed by Stoutz and wife to Phœbe A. Tuthill, on the 1st day of April, 1884, is not assailed. At the time of the execution of this mortgage complainants had no lien on or claim to this property, and the grantors had a perfect right to mortgage the same if they saw proper. This mortgage was foreclosed on the 23d day of March, 1886, and at the sale the property was purchased by one Hudson, either for himself or the mortgagee. If this property, conveyed by the mortgage to Tuthill, was the property of Arnold Stoutz, as charged in the bill, complainants, as judgment creditors of Arnold Stoutz, were authorized to redeem this property from the purchaser. Their judgment against Arnold Stoutz was recovered on the 16th day of December, 1886, and they have permitted more than two years to elapse, the time allowed by statute for redemption. The present bill is not one to redeem the property. It is averred that, on the 28th day of June, 1888, Phœbe Tuthill by deed conveyed the property to Julia Stoutz for an expressed consideration of $1,100; that, on the 28th day of June, 1888, $1,200 was borrowed by Arnold Stoutz from one Gelbke, the payment of which was secured by a mortgage executed by Julia Stoutz, the wife, and her husband on this property to said Gelbke, and that the money thus borrowed was the money paid to Mrs. Tuthill, the consideration for the conveyance to Mrs. Julia Stoutz of June 28, 1888. The bill then shows that the husband, Arnold Stoutz, died, and out of the proceeds of a policy of insurance taken out by him in his life-time for the benefit of his wife, Julia Stoutz, the mortgage to Gelbke was paid by her, and that the wife, in addition to the money paid to satisfy this mortgage, expended about $2,000 in improving the premises. The bill charges that complainants' judgment was founded upon notes made by Arnold Stoutz, in which he waived his right to claim exemption of personal property, and that these notes antedated the payment of the annual premiums, and that the premiums paid upon the policy were voluntary, and null and void, for this reason, as against him.

The equity of complainants' bill and their right to relief, in this aspect of the case, depend upon the right of the wife to the money collected from the policy. Section 2356 of the Code provides that the wife may insure the life of the husband, for the benefit of herself, or for the benefit of herself and child or children of the marriage. It also provides that the husband or father may insure his life for the benefit of the wife and children, or minor children, and such insurance is exempt from liability for his debts or engagements, if the annual premiums do not exceed $500. In this case, as appears from the bill, the annual premiums were not so much as $500. A note waiving exemptions as to personal property is a mere debt or engagement. It in no sense creates a lien on property or money. The effect of the statute which permits the husband to insure his life for the benefit of his wife is to enable the husband to expend so much money, in the manner prescribed, for the benefit of his wife, which, without the statute, would not be exempt from liability for the debts of the husband. The creditors of Arnold Stoutz, the husband, have no claim upon the insurance money, the proceeds of the policy taken out for the benefit of the wife. This money belongs to her in her absolute right, and she had the power to expend it as she saw proper. The demurrer to the bill raised these questions, and was properly sustained. Affirmed.

MORRISON v. MORRISON.

DIVORCE—PROOF OF ADULTERY.

In a suit by a husband for divorce on the ground of adultery with one B., it appeared that defendant was living at the house of one C., apart from plaintiff. C. and wife testified that B. visited defendant at their house, and was seen to kiss her; that two different nights B. went to defendant's room, closed the door, and remained till after 11 o'clock; that, when defendant learned that C. had forbidden B. to repeat his visits, she stated that when she "got a house of her own she would do as she pleased, and would not go back on" B. There was evidence, though conflicting, that soon after leaving the house of C., and for twelve months, defendant lived with B. in a house having but two rooms, with no shutters between the rooms; that they there lived as husband and wife. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to a decree.

Appeal from chancery court, Bibb county; W. H. TAYLOE, Chancellor.

Suit for divorce by David L. Morrison against Maggie Morrison. The bill was dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and rendered.

Logan Hargrove & Vande Graaff, for appellant. Peters, Wilson & Lyman, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. The complainant filed his bill against his wife, the respondent, praying that the bonds of matrimony be canceled and annulled, and that he be divorced. The bill charges adultery with one Robert Brewer. The respondent answered, denying the charge of adultery, and by cross-bill asked to be divorced from her husband, the complainant in the original bill. At the hearing the court refused relief to either, and dismissed both the original and cross bill. The complainant in the original bill appeals. We agree with the chancellor that there is no proof to sustain the cross-bill, and that it was properly dismissed. In regard to the original bill, the learned chancellor seems to have considered only the evidence of the husband, the plaintiff, and of the wife, the defendant, and Robert Brewer, the party with whom, as alleged in the bill, the adultery was committed. That there was a difficulty between husband and wife, growing out of the fact that the husband accused her and Brewer of being too intimate, is not controverted, and separation of the husband and wife followed. That the wife left, and for a while lived at Henry Carroll's, are undisputed facts. Both Henry Carroll and his wife testified that Robert Brewer visited her at their house; that he was seen to kiss her, and said he could kiss and hug her now as much as he pleased; and on two different nights he went into her room, closed the door, and remained in there with her alone, one night until after 11 o'clock, and the other night they did not know when he left her room. Robert Brewer was notified by the owner of the house not to repeat his visits; and in response to this notice the defendant stated that when she "got a house of her own she would do as she pleased, and that she would not go back on Robert Brewer." The criminating facts here testified to are not denied or questioned either by the defendant herself or Robert Brewer, further than may be included in their general denial of having had illicit intercourse. The evidence by a number of witnesses, and which is neither denied nor explained, is that the respondent soon afterwards left the house of Henry Carroll, and for twelve months lived with Robert Brewer in a house having two rooms, with no shutter between the two rooms. The witnesses all state that while here they lived together as man and wife. A part of the time that they thus lived together was after the filing of the bill, but such testimony, when properly connected, is admissible to show a previous adulterous intercourse. Alsabrooks v. State, 52 Ala. 24; Lawson v. State, 20 Ala. 74; Smitherman v. State, 40 Ala. 355. The record abounds with other evidence of a criminating character, wholly inconsistent with the innocence of respondent and Brewer, unless we impute to them a frigidity of temperament or an ethical affection not common to human nature. The facts do not warrant the assumption that these parties were abnormally virtuous. The rule in cases of fornication or adultery is "that the circumstances must be such as would lead the guarded discretion of a reasonable and just man to the conclusion" that the act has been committed. Applying this rule to the evidence in the case, we are very clear that the court below erred in dismissing complainant's bill. A decree will be here rendered, granting the complainant the relief prayed for in his bill of complaint. Reversed and rendered.

FRIEDMAN et al. v. FENNELL et al

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 25, 1892.)

LIFE INSURANCE—ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY TO MINOR CHILD—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS—PLEADING.

1. Deceased took out a life insurance policy in his own name, and assigned it to a minor child. Suit was brought to subject the proceeds of the policy to the payment of debts contracted by the assured. The bill alleged that under the policy the insurance was payable to a minor child of the assured. An amendment thereto, without purporting to correct the allegation, alleged that the policy was in the name of the assured, and was assigned by him to the said child. Held, that the bill was demurrable for inconsistencies in the description of the policy.

2. Code 1886, § 2356, allowing a father to insure his life "for the benefit of his minor child or children," does not authorize the assignment by a father of an insurance in his own name to his minor children, he being in debt at the time.

Appeal from chancery court, Madison county; THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor.

This was a bill by Friedman Bros. against Charles H. Fennell, Jr., and the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company, to subject the proceeds from a policy of insurance upon the life of Charles M. Fennell, Sr., to the payment of a judgment recovered against the said Fennell in his lifetime. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the bill, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Humes & Sheffey, for appellants. William Richardson, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. Our statutes permitting insurance of the life of a husband or father for the benefit of the wife or child or children is not declarative of any common-law principle, but is enabling,—creative of a new right. Insurance Co. v. Webb, 54 Ala. 688. These statutes confer a special privilege. In their nature they are an exemption of property from the payment of debts; and, to be successful in securing the exemption, the statute must be conformed to. When, however, the case exists for which the statute makes provision, the statute will be liberally interpreted in furtherance of the relief intended. Fearn v. Ward, 65 Ala. 33, 38, 80 Ala. 555, 2 South. Rep. 114; 3 Brick. Dig. 490, § 8; Felrath v. Schonfield, 76 Ala. 199; Tompkins v. Levy, 87 Ala. 263, 6 South. Rep. 346; Elliott's Appeal, 50 Pa. St. 75, 88 Amer. Dec. 525, and note. The debt against which the claim of Charles Fennell, the younger, is asserted was in existence, and the policy was taken out and the premium money paid by the father, while he was so indebted and was insolvent. It is charged in the bill, and not denied, that the said debt was in existence at and before the time when the Code of 1886 went into operation. Section 2350 of the Code of 1886 changes, somewhat, the statute on the subject theretofore existing. Code 1876, §§ 2733, 2734. The contention is urged before us that, inasmuch as the exemption secured under the later Code is an enlargement of that secured by the Code of 1876, the new or enlarged provision cannot be made to apply against creditors whose claim antedated the amended statute. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 490, § 8. For reasons to be presently stated we consider it unnecessary to decide this question. The language of the statute (Code 1886, § 2356) is that "the husband or father may insure his life for the benefit of his wife, or for the benefit of his wife and children, or for the benefit of his minor child or children." It will be seen by comparing the two statutes that the clause, "for the benefit of his minor child or children," has no counterpart in the statute theretofore existing. That clause is new. Before that time the only statutory authority for making provision for child or children by means of life insurance was to append it to the policy taken out for the benefit of the wife. The insurance there provided for inured to the wife only in the event she survived her husband; but the statute (Code 1876, § 2734) declared that, "in case of the death of the wife before the decease of her husband, the amount of the insurance may be made payable after death to her children for their use." To come within the present statute, and to secure to the child or children the benefit it tenders, the later statute, as we have said, must be conformed to. The policy being in the name of the father, his attempt to transfer it to his child stands on no higher plane than any other attempt he might make to give away his property at the expense of his debts. Such gifts are constructively fraudulent. Insurance Co. v. Webb, 54 Ala. 688; Tompkins v. Levy, 87 Ala. 263, 6 South. Rep. 346; Fearn v. Ward, 80 Ala. 555, 2 South. Rep. 114; Battle v. Reid, 68 Ala. 149; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 490, § 8.

There were original and amended bills in this case. The original bill averred that by the terms of the policy of insurance, as taken out, the insurance money was made payable to the minor child, Charles Fennell, Jr. The answer and exhibit show that the policy was sued out in the name of Charles M. Fennell, the father, and by its terms the insurance money was made payable to him. The policy bears date February 28, 1889. On March 15th next ensuing, Charles M. Fennell assigned the policy to his son, Charles H. Fennell. The amended bill does not, in terms, correct any averments of the original bill, nor does it purport to do so. It simply adds an additional paragraph to the bill, by which it is averred that Charles M. Fennell, after the accrual of his debts, sued out a policy in his own name, paid the premiums, and that on March 15, 1889, for love and affection, and with intent to delay, hinder, and defraud complainants, assigned and transferred the policy to Charles H. Fennell, his son. This amendment fails to show the amount of the policy, or when issued. If its averments were sufficiently specific, its indications would be that it sets forth a different policy from the one relied on in the original bill. If it was intended as a correction of the mistaken description of the policy made in the draft of the original bill, it is insufficient, because it fails to refer to and correct the mistake. Considering the two together, and each as a part of the amended bill, it is inconsistent with itself in the several descriptions of the policy. The bill needs further amendment. The chancellor gave no reason for his ruling on the demurrer. The bill in its present shape is evidently bad, and, to give it equity, must be amended. We find no ground for reversing his decretal order.

Affirmed.

APPEAL—DECISION—PROCEEDINGS BELOW.

Where plaintiffs in trover recovered judgment, and on defendants' application the court in vacation granted a rehearing, and directed a supersedeas to issue, and on appeal the supreme court held that the trial court's action was erroneous, and that the facts averred in the petition for rehearing should have been heard and tried at the next term of court, the trial court erroneously refused leave to amend the petition for rehearing, and to substitute certain papers, which were part thereof, but which had been lost, and improperly dismissed the petition.

Appeal from circuit court, Fayette county; S. H. SPROTT, Judge.

Trover by A. B. Farquhar & Son against A. J. Seymour and others. From an order dismissing the petition for rehearing, defendants appeal. Reversed.

John B. Sanford and A. B. McEachin, for appellants. McGuire & Collier, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. Farquhar & Son recovered a judgment in trover against appellants. Under sections 2873 and 2876 of the Code the defendants applied for a rehearing. In vacation, the judge presiding granted a rehearing in accordance with the petition, and directed the clerk to issue a supersedeas or restraining order to restrain the collection of the execution issued upon the judgment. Upon application to this court, the order of the judge granting a rehearing in the cause, and ordering a supersedeas or restraining order, was held to have been improperly made, in vacation, and that the facts averred in the petition should have been heard and tried at the next term of the court, as provided in section 2876 of the Code. At the following term of the circuit court of Fayette county, in which the judgment had been recovered, the petitioners for a rehearing moved the court for leave to amend the petition as set out in the proposed amendment, and also for leave to substitute certain papers, which, according to the averments of the motion, were a part of the original petition for a rehearing, and which, in transmission to the judge, were lost. The court refused to grant the amendment to the petition, or to consider the evidence offered to show the loss of a part of the papers of the original petition; holding that, under the order of the supreme court, the trial court had no discretion or further jurisdiction than to vacate the order granting the rehearing, and to dismiss the petition. From the action of the court refusing to allow the amendment, and the substitution of the papers, and from the judgment vacating the former order granting a rehearing, and dismissing the petition, the present appeal is prosecuted. When the case was here before, the decision of this court had no other scope or effect than to require that the order of the lower court, granting a rehearing and supersedeas or restraining order be annulled and vacated. It left the petition pending, to be heard at the first subsequent term of the trial court, under section 2876 of the Code. The statute requires the court to allow amendments of the pleadings, and it has been long held that a petition for a rehearing may be amended. Dothard v. Teague, 40 Ala. 586. The statute provides for the substitution of lost or destroyed papers in any pending cause or proceeding, and of the notice to be given to the adverse party. Code, §§ 657, 2734. An appeal lies from an order of the court refusing to grant a statutory rehearing after final judgment at law. O'Neal v. Kelly, 72 Ala. 559; 40 Ala. supra. It might give certain facts set up in the petition and proposed amendments undue weight if they were specifically pointed out and discussed in this opinion. The ruling of the trial court was not in accord with the principles herein declared. The court should allow all proper amendments to the petition, pass upon all demurrers, if any, which raise the question of the sufficiency of the petition, or have the issue of fact tried and determined, as it may direct, under section 2876 of the Code. Reversed and remanded.

PERRY v. STATE.

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—FLIGHT.

1. On a trial for murder it appeared that, just before the killing, defendant was in an open space before a stable, engaged in hitching up his employer's horse; that he and deceased had a violent altercation; and that deceased went for a pistol, and, returning, was shot by defendant. Held, that the place where defendant was working was not entitled to the privileges which the law accords to one's residence or place of business, but that defendant should have retreated if he could have done so safely.

2. The fact that deceased was a violent and dangerous man, though it did not palliate the offense of taking his life, was a proper subject of consideration for the jury in determining the extent of danger, if any, to which defendant was exposed, and his means of safe escape therefrom by flight.

3. If defendant was in his proper place of business he was not required to leave there on mere threats by deceased to do him bodily harm, but in such case he was justified, if free from fault in provoking the difficulty, in preparing for defense.

Appeal from circuit court, De Kalb county; JOHN B. TALLY, Judge.

Albert Perry was convicted of manslaughter in the second degree, and appeals. Reversed.

The only exception reserved, as is shown by the bill of exceptions, went to the refusal of the court to give the following written charges requested by the defendant: (1) "The court charges the jury that the law does not require a man to retreat from his dwelling-house, and that his place of business (for this occasion, pro hac vice) is his dwelling-house." (2) "The court charges the jury that if one has reasonable apprehension of great personal violence, involving imminent peril to life or limb, he has the right to protect himself even to the extent of taking another's life, if such protection cannot be otherwise secured." (3) "The court charges the jury that if they find from the evidence that Albert Perry used all the means in his power consistent with his safety to avoid the danger before he fired at Lee Williams, and was not in fault in bringing on the difficulty, then they must acquit him." (4) "The court charges the jury that if, under the evidence in this case, they find that there were such acts as to create in the mind of a reasonable man apprehension that there was great danger to his life, or there was danger of his suffering grievous bodily harm, then the defendant was not forced to retreat, but might take Lee Williams' life, if the defendant was not in fault in bringing on the difficulty." (5) "The court charges the jury that retreat is not required when the assault is made with a deadly weapon." (6) "If the jury believe from all the evidence in this case that Albert Perry was lawfully and peaceably engaged in hitching up the sheriff's buggy, and, while so engaged, Lee Williams rushed upon him with a deadly weapon, and that Albert Perry had reasonable cause to believe, and did believe, that he was in danger of losing his life or of receiving great bodily harm at the hands of said Lee Williams, and that said danger was imminent, and Albert Perry was without fault on his part, then Perry had the right to strike in self-defense, and if apparently necessary, under all the circumstances proven, for his own protection to take the life of his assailant, he would have a right to do so." (7) "If the jury believe from all the evidence in this case that Albert Perry was lawfully and peaceably engaged in hitching up the sheriff's buggy, and, while so engaged, Lee Williams rushed upon him with a deadly weapn, and that Albert Perry did believe, and had reasonable ground to believe, that he was in danger of losing his life or of receiving great bodily harm from the said Lee Williams, then he had the right to strike in self-defense." (8) "The court charges the jury that if they believe from the evidence that Albert Perry was at Mr. Frazier's house in the rightful discharge of his work, and that he did nothing to foster or bring on the difficulty with Lee Williams, the mere fact of his going to his house and getting his gun would not of itself alone, and with no act or demonstration of using it until he was forced to do so by the act of Lee Williams, take from him the right to shoot in self-defense, if he could not have escaped danger by retreating." (9) "The court charges the jury that the defendant, if they find he went home and got a gun, had the right to peaceably return and hitch up the horse, and that he had the right to bring with him a gun for protection only." (10) "If the jury believe that Albert Perry went to his house and procured a gun, and in doing so was not actuated by any motive of preparing himself to commence or enter upon a difficulty with Lee Williams, but solely and only for the purpose of being prepared to protect himself from an attack that there was a reasonable apprehension would be made upon him, and would endanger his life or put him in danger of receiving great bodily harm, and that Perry returned to continue in a peaceable manner the performance of the service for Sheriff Frazier in which he was engaged, and after he so returned he did nothing to renew the former difficulty or to bring on or provoke a difficulty with Williams, then the mere fact that he had gone to his house, armed himself, and returned to his work, would not deprive him of the right of self-defense." (11) "The court charges the jury that while the law requires that Albert Perry should be in a situation of either real or apparent danger to life or of receiving grievous bodily harm, that that danger was imminent, and that he should be reasonably justified in shooting, yet the law only requires that he should exercise his reason,—should act as a reasonable man would have acted under all the circumstances; and if, under those circumstances, a reasonable man would have believed that he was in danger of losing his life or of receiving great bodily harm, and that such danger was then impending, and said Perry did so believe, and was not the aggressor in the difficulty, and was reasonably free from fault, then he had a right to defend himself, even to the taking of the life of Lee Williams."

L. A. Dobbs, for appellant. William L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

STONE, C. J. The law must and does place a high estimate on human life, and the circumstances must be exceptional to excuse its being taken otherwise than in punishment of some crime which the law itself has made capital. Hence it is that when life has been taken, not in obedience to some judicial sentence, the law raises the presumption that it was feloniously taken, unless the testimony which proves the killing proves also the excuse or extenuation. Hence it is that when a homicide is proved, and the criminating proof fails to disclose the excuse or extenuation, the law-imputed, felonious guilt attaches, and the burden is cast on the defendant to rebut or repel such imputation. Hence it is that one who begins or provokes a difficulty cannot invoke the doctrine of self-defense, unless he clearly retires from the combat, and by word or deed manifests a desire and intention to be at peace. Hence it is that when one is menaced or assailed, not in his own dwelling, he must escape by flight, if he can do so safely, and without increasing his apparent danger. Clements v. State, 50 Ala. 117; Roberts v. State, 68 Ala. 156; Sylvester v. State, 71 Ala. 17; De Arman v. State, Id. 351; Ex parte Warrick, 73 Ala. 57; Wharton v. State, Id. 366; Ex parte Brown, 65 Ala. 446; Bain v. State, 70 Ala. 4; Ingram v. State, 67 Ala. 67; Jones v. State, 76 Ala. 8; Cary v. State, Id. 78. The defendant and the deceased were each of them servants in the employment of the same person, the sheriff of the county. Defendant was hostler. Aside from the testimony of the defendant himself there is a want of clearness of proof as to the origin of the quarrel. One phase of the proof was that the deceased first insulted the defendant with opprobrious words and with threats; that thereupon he (deceased) went into the sheriff's office, and came out towards where the defendant was, having in his hand the sheriff's pistol, and was in this condition advancing on the defendant, who was in his proper place in front of the stable, harnessing and hitching up his employer's horse; that he advanced, with pistol in hand, near to the defendant, but on the opposite side of the horse, and, while pushing the horse's head aside, the defendant snatched up his gun and fired, killing him. This phase of the testimony tends to show that, about the time deceased went after the pistol, defendant went a short distance and returned with his gun, which, at the suggestion of a bystander, he set down by a buggy, and returned to the service of harnessing the horse; and that he was thus employed when the deceased approached, on the opposite side of the horse. This phase of the testimony leaves it a question for the jury to determine whether the deceased first went for the pistol or indicated such intention, or whether defendant first went for his gun. The testimony was that deceased was a violent and dangerous man. We have given only one phase of the testimony. Other testimony gave a different version. It is the province of the jury to determine the facts. Certain legal principles become important, if the foregoing phase of the testimony be found to be true. The difficulty taking place in an open space in front of the stable, that place was not entitled to the immunities and legal privileges the law accords to the actual or business residence. It was the duty of the defendant, if he was approached in a dangerous and threatening manner, to retire and escape from the conflict, if he could do so without danger to himself. If by flight he would apparently increase the danger to his own life, or if, by the attempt, he would apparently leave himself exposed to grievous bodily harm from which he could not probably escape by flight, and if he was free from fault in bringing on the difficulty, then he could stand his ground and defend himself, even at the expense of his assailant's life. The law does not require that one who is without fault shall lose his own life, that he may thereby spare that of his assailant. We are not commanded to love our neighbor better than ourselves.

There are other aspects of this question which the phase of the testimony we are considering presents. The testimony is undisputed that deceased was a man of violent and dangerous character. Now, while that fact did not of itself justify the taking of his life, or even palliate the offense, yet it was permissible to make proof of it; and such proof should be weighed by the jury in determining the extent of danger, if any, to which defendant was exposed, and his means and opportunity of safe escape therefrom by flight. "A demonstration or overt act of attack, made by such a one, may afford much stronger evidence that the life or limb of the person assailed was in imminent peril than if performed or made by one of an opposite character or disposition. Hence it would reasonably justify a resort to more prompt measures of self-preservation." Roberts v. State, 68 Ala. 156.

The testimony tends to show that defendant was in his proper place of business. He had a right to be there, if this testimony be true. He was not required to leave his place of business upon a mere belief or apprehension, or even threat, that deceased contemplated doing him grievous bodily harm; and, if threatened by words or hostile demonstration, he violated no law if he prepared himself for defense, and only for defense, against such threatened, dangerous attack. His duty to leave his employment and escape by flight, if apparently practicable, would not arise in such conditions on mere apprehension of attack. He could safely prepare, and await developments. If, however, when approached menacingly, not being within his dwelling, there was apparently reasonable opportunity for safe escape by flight, then it would be and was his duty to so escape. This, because of the law's imperative command that human life shall not be taken unless there is a present necessity, real or apparent, to strike in defense of one's own life. All these defensive rights, however, are hinged on the condition that the party resorting to them must be free from fault in provoking or bringing on the difficulty. Of the charges asked by defendant, the first was abstract, and was rightly refused on that account. Charges 2, 3, 4, and 5 pretermit all inquiry of defendant's fault in bringing on the difficulty, and for this reason were faulty. Charges 6 and 7 omit all inquiry of reasonable means of escape by flight, and for that reason were rightly refused. Charge 8 postulates, as a fact, that defendant did no act, and made no demonstration of an intention to use the gun, until he was forced to by the act of the deceased. One phase of the testimony may have justified this, but the whole testimony, taken together, did not. Charge 9 ought to have been given. Charge 10 would be faultless if the words "after he so returned" were omitted. So, if the word "reasonably" had been omitted from the latter part of charge 11, it would be free from error. Reversed and remanded.

HOOPER v. DORA COAL MIN. CO.

INJUNCTION—JURISDICTION—IRREPARABLE INJURY.

Where a bill in equity alleged that defendant had the right to mine coal and other minerals under complainant's land; that, having almost exhausted such subjacent minerals, it extended the opening of its mines into adjacent, but unconnected, lands, and brought the coal therein mined to the surface of complainant's land, to be there loaded and transported; that it deposited on his land noxious refuse and foul water; and that his land was valuable for agricultural and grazing purposes,—it entitled complainant to an injunction.

Appeal from chancery court, Walker county.

Bill for injunction by John De B. Hooper against the Dora Coal Mining Company.

John J. Moore and B. K. Collier, for appellant. Coleman & Lowell, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. The bill alleges that complainant is the owner of the land therein described, "except all the coal and other minerals in, under, and upon said lands, and also except all timber and water upon same, necessary for the development, working, and mining of said coal and other minerals, and the preparation of the same for market, and the removal of the same; also the right of way, and the right to build roads of any description over the same, necessary for the convenient transportation of said coal and other minerals from said coal lands, and the conveying and transporting to and from said lands all materials and implements that may be of use in the mining and removal of said coal and other minerals, or in the preparation of the same for market." It further alleges that defendant has opened a mine on the land, and erected thereon a tramway, bridges, trestles, weigh-houses, blacksmith shops, and other buildings and works used for mining coal; that the company has ceased to mine the coal lying beneath the surface of the land to any appreciable extent, and has extended the openings of the mines to adjacent lands, from which large quantities of coal are mined, using the plant upon complainant's land to load and transport such coal, not loading and transporting coal mined beneath the surface of complainant's land. The bill further avers that the land of complainant is very valuable for agricultural and grazing purposes; and that defendant, its agents or employes, dump vast quantities of slate and other obnoxious refuse, taken from the mines on the adjacent lands, onto the agricultural and grazing lands of complainant. They also permit vast quantities of foul water to accumulate in the mines of the adjacent lands, which, by means of machinery, is ejected upon the surface of complainant's lands. The bill, which is filed by appellant, seeks to restrain appellee from using complainant's land for the purpose of loading and carrying away coal mined on such adjacent lands; also from dumping onto complainant's land slate, refuse water, and other substances and fluids taken therefrom. The court overruled all the grounds of demurrer to the bill, except the second, which is to the effect that complainant has an adequate remedy at law.

It will be observed that the case made by the bill is of a mixed character,—one where the surface is used for the purpose of mining the subjacent minerals to a small extent, and where it is used for the purpose of working mines on lands lying adjacent to a much greater extent. The bill does not inform us whether the right of defendant to mine is by reservation in a deed to the surface, or by a grant of the minerals; the grantor reserving to himself the surface. But this is immaterial; the relative rights and duties of the parties are the same. It is well settled that where one person is the owner of the surface, and another of the subjacent minerals, the surface is servient to the mining right as to the occupation and use of so much as may be reasonably necessary for the beneficial and profitable working of the mines. A reservation or grant of the minerals, severed from the ownership of the surface, carries with it the right to penetrate through the surface to the minerals for the purpose of mining and removing them. This includes the adoption and use of such machinery, methods, appliances, and instrumentalities as may be reasonably necessary and are ordinarily used in such business; and, it may be, for the storage of the minerals in the first marketable state until they can be transported with due diligence. Williams v. Gibson, 84 Ala. 228, 4 South. Rep. 350. These incidental rights must be exercised with due regard to the rights of the surface owner; without injury to the right of support for the surface, and without any permanent damage thereto, not necessary for the proper and beneficial enjoyment of the right to mine. It has been said: "The incidental power would warrant nothing beyond what is strictly necessary for the convenient working of the coal. It would allow no use of the surface; no deposit upon it to a greater extent or for a longer duration than should be necessary; no attendance upon the land of unnecessary persons." Cardigan v. Armitage, 2 Barn. & C. 197. Possibly, under our rulings, the adverb "strictly" confines the use of the easement within too narrow limits. "Reasonably necessary" is the language of this court, and we prefer to make no change in a rule which we consider so conservative. Williams v. Gibson, 84 Ala. 228, 232, 4 South. Rep. 350. It does not allow defendant to use the surface for the deposit of slate or other refuse matter taken even from the mines underneath. Marvin v. Mining Co., 55 N. Y. 538. The right to use the surface, implied from the reservation or grant, arises from and ceases with the necessity of the case. When all the subjacent ore is dug and removed, and the mine exhausted, there no longer exists any necessity for the use of the surface. Without an express reservation or grant, the right to use the plant erected on the surface of complainant's land for the loading and transporting of coal mined on adjacent lands does not exist. Midgely v. Richardson, 14 Mees. & W. 595. As regards the dumping of slate and other obnoxious substances and ejecting foul water on complainant's land, the liability of defendant is the same as that of a party who occasions injury to land unconnected with the land in which the mines are worked; the same as if he were not owner of the minerals on complainant's land.

The grounds of demurrer, raising the question as to the right of defendant to use complainant's land for loading and transporting coal mined on other lands, and for the deposit of refuse substances, whether taken from the subjacent mines or others, having been overruled, the direct and sole question is whether, on the facts averred in the bill, an injunction will lie to prevent such injuries. The foregoing principles have been stated as aiding its determination. Under the averments of the bill, dumping the slate and other substances on complainant's land is clearly a trespass. As a general rule, an injunction will not be awarded, in the absence of special circumstances, to restrain the commission or repetition of a trespass, when an action at law for the recovery of damages affords an adequate remedy. But the jurisdiction is well established when, from the peculiar nature or use of the property, or the probability of a multiplicity of suits arising from the frequent and continued repetition of the trespass, the injury cannot be adequately compensated by an action for damages. It is difficult to define with any degree of definiteness what will constitute such irreparable injury as to warrant the interposition of the extraordinary, but conservative, remedy of injunction. The general rule is that when the trespass is of a temporary nature, or of such character and effect as may be readily compensated in damages, the trespasser being solvent, equity will not depart from the settled rule to leave the aggrieved party to his remedy at law. As to the jurisdiction of equity in such cases, there is a well-recognized distinction between injuries temporary and fugitive in their nature and injuries permanent, continuous, and of frequent occurrence. The former may be readily redressed at law; but when the injuries are of the latter character, though there may be a remedy at law, it is obviously inadequate. When the trespasses committed or threatened are of a character which destroy the substance of the inheritance, or ruin the estate, or permanently impair its future use and enjoyment in the manner in which the owner has been accustomed to use and enjoy it, pecuniary compensation is inadequate, and equitable interference demanded. Mayor v. Groshon, 30 Md. 436; Echelkamp v. Schrader, 45 Mo. 505; Nininger v. Norwood, 72 Ala. 277. In Hobbs v. Canal Co., 66 Cal. 161, 4 Pac. Rep. 1147, it was held an unlawful act for a company engaged in mining to so work and use the mine as either directly or indirectly to cover the land of another with the sand, gravel, and debris from such mines, thereby rendering it valueless for agricultural purposes, and that such acts will be restrained by injunction. It is true, the averments of the bill are general, and might have been more definite and precise as to the extent of the injury, present and prospective; but they are sufficient to make a case of irreparable injury, within the meaning of that term, as understood and employed in equity jurisprudence. Defendant, having become possessed in a lawful way of a location on the surface of complainant's land, and having nearly exhausted the subjacent coal, extended the opening of its mines into adjacent, but unconnected, lands; brings the coal therein mined to the surface of complainant's land, to be there loaded and transported; and deposits on his land noxious refuse substances and foul water. The frequent and continuous deposit of vast quantities of slate on lands valuable and used for agricultural and grazing purposes, and the emptying of foul or filthy water thereon, pumped from mines, where suffered to accumulate, certainly deteriorates its value and usefulness for such purposes, and permanently injures its future use and enjoyment, producing irreparable injury, to redress which pecuniary compensation is inadequate. Sullivan v. Rabb, 86 Ala. 433, 5 South. Rep. 746; Ogletree v. McQuaggs, 67 Ala. 586. The case made by the bill comes within the rule stated above, and the demurrer should have been overruled.

Reversed and remanded.

KYLE v. MCKENZIE.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 25, 1892.)

CONSTRUCTION OF DEED—DISMISSAL OF CROSS-BILL—AMENDMENT.

1. A deed, after reciting that the grantors "grant, bargain, sell, and convey" certain lands designated according to a government survey, and that they "convey by quitclaim only" certain other lands designated in the same way, concluded with the following clause: "The intention of the grantors in this deed is to convey to K. all their right, title, claim, and interest in and to the lands heretofore belonging to G., and lying in said sections 13, 16, 18, 19, 21. Should the description above be incorrect, the grantors will, at any time when called on, correct the same." Held, that the clause limited the conveyance to such lands in the sections mentioned as had formerly belonged to G., and that the warranty did not extend to lands which, though particularly described in the deed, had never belonged to G.

2. It is error to dismiss a cross-bill on demurrer in vacation without affording an opportunity to amend.

Appeal from chancery court, Etowah county; S. K. MCSPADDEN, Chancellor.

Bill by F. E. McKenzie against R. B. Kyle to enforce a vendor's lien. Defendant filed a cross-bill, to which plaintiff demurred. Defendant's motion to dismiss the original bill was overruled, and plaintiff's motion to dismiss the cross-bill, and his demurrer to the cross-bill, were sustained. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. H. Denson, for appellant. Dortch & Martin, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The original bill was filed for the enforcement of a vendor's lien for an unpaid balance of purchase money on a sale of land by the complainant to the defendant. The defendant made his answer also a cross-bill, and charged therein that the vendor had no title to a considerable part of the land described in his deed; that in consequence of this the defendant acquired by the conveyance less land by several hundred acres than he supposed he was getting by the purchase; and he claimed that he was entitled to an abatement of the purchase money because of the alleged deficiency in the quantity of the land. The decree was on a motion to dismiss the original bill as amended for want of equity, on a similar motion as to the cross-bill, and on demurrers thereto.

The construction of the deed above referred to is the principal question in the case. That deed was executed by the complainant and his wife. They "grant, bargain, sell, and convey" certain lands which are designated according to the government survey. They "convey by quitclaim only" certain other lands which are designated in the same way. Thus far the deed follows the ordinary forms of such conveyances. It concludes, however, with this clause: "The intention of the grantors in this deed is to convey to said R. B. Kyle all their right, title, interest, and claim in and to the lands heretofore belonging to Thomas Garrett, now deceased, and lying in said sections 13, 16, 18, 19, 21. Should the description above be incorrect, the grantors will, at any time when called on, correct the same." In the original bill as amended all the lands in the sections mentioned which formerly belonged to Thomas Garrett, now deceased, are particularly designated. It appears from the averments on this subject that all those lands were properly described in the deed. It also appears that other lands are described in the deed which never belonged to Thomas Garrett. The respondent in his cross-bill alleges, in substance, that under the contract of sale he was to pay the complainant $3,500 for all the land mentioned and described in the deed; that he would not have made the purchase had he not believed that he would get title to and possession of the land as particularly described; that 1,035 acres were embraced in that description, while the deed really conveyed only 760 acres, as the complainant had no title to some of the lands described in the deed, and as there were double descriptions of several of the parcels; and that the difference in value between the quantity of land included in the description and the quantity actually acquired by the respondent under the deed was $1,250. There is, however, no allegation that the complainant made any representation as to the number of acres sold, or that the land was bought by the acre, or that Thomas Garrett, deceased, had owned any lands in the sections named in the deed which were not included in the description therein, or that there was a failure or defect of title as to any of the lands formerly owned by Thomas Garrett. The contention of the respondent is that he is entitled in any event to the land particularly described according to the government survey, and to the number of acres called for by such description. The terms of the deed do not support this contention. It is true that the words "grant," "bargain," "sell," or either of them, as used in the deed, must be construed, unless it otherwise clearly appears from the conveyance, an express covenant that the grantor was seised of an indefeasible estate in fee-simple in the lands to which they refer. Code, § 1839; Swann v. Gaston, 87 Ala. 569, 6 South. Rep. 386. But those words must be construed in connection with the other language used in the deed, so as to give effect to the intention of the parties as expressed in the instrument. Derrick v. Brown, 66 Ala. 162. If it clearly appears from the deed, taken as a whole, that the words of conveyance and warranty were intended to apply only to such lands as had formerly belonged to Thomas Garrett, then the statutory warranty is not to be arbitrarily implied as covering lands which never belonged to Thomas Garrett. The clause of the deed last above quoted is decisive of the meaning of the instrument. It is plain that the particular description according to the government survey is controlled by the express provision to the effect that only such lands in the sections named as had formerly belonged to Garrett were intended to be conveyed. The warranty is not to be stretched to cover lands which the deed itself shows were not intended to be included therein. The intention of the grantors to convey only their right, title, interest, and claim in and to the lands theretofore belonging to Thomas Garrett, now deceased, and lying in sections 13, 16, 18, 19, and 21, is clearly expressed. The provision for such corrections as might be necessary to include such lands in the sections named which had formerly belonged to Thomas Garrett shows that the parties apprehended that the land might be incorrectly described in the deed, and that they did not intend that the particular description contained in the deed should control in determining what lands were covered by the purchase. If any of the Garrett lands in either of the sections named had been omitted from the deed, it cannot be denied that it would have been the duty of the grantors to correct their conveyance so as to make it include the omitted lands. If there had been such omission, could the grantee have claimed that the particular description contained in the deed should be treated as conclusively correct for the purpose of binding the grantor to convey the lands covered thereby, but as subject to correction for the purpose of adding other lands intended to be conveyed,—that the provision should operate only against the grantors, and not for their protection in any event? Clearly not. The obvious effect of the clause referred to is to limit the operation of the conveyance to such lands in the five sections mentioned as had formerly belonged to Thomas Garrett. The warranty does not extend to lands which, though particularly described, had never belonged to the person named as former owner. The grantee is entitled to claim nothing more, under the deed, if all the lands in the sections mentioned which had formerly belonged to Thomas Garrett were included in the deed by proper descriptions. The cross-bill does not show that any of those lands were omitted from the description in the deed, or that the title to any portion thereof has failed or is defective. The cross-complainant did not aver facts entitling him to any equitable relief. The chancellor was correct in so holding.

It cannot be affirmed, however, that the cross-bill could not be so amended as to disclose a case entitling the complainant therein to equitable relief. It was error to dismiss it in vacation without affording an opportunity to amend. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 379, § 197. For this error the decree must be reversed. Reversed and remanded.

WELLS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 25, 1892.)

SELECTION OF GRAND AND PETIT JURORS—MEETING OF COMMISSIONERS.

1. Code, vol. 2, § 4, p. 132, providing that the jury commissioners of a county shall meet at a certain time, and proceed to draw for the ensuing year the requisite number of persons to serve as grand jurors, and then in like manner the requisite number to serve as petit jurors, does not allow the whole number to be drawn at one time, and the selection of grand jurors to be made from this number, but the grand jurors must be drawn first.

2. Code, vol. 2, § 2, p. 132, providing that the jury commissioners of a county shall meet at a certain time for the purpose of drawing jurors for the ensuing year, and that "if, for any reason, a meeting is not held at the time appointed," a meeting shall be held as soon thereafter as practicable, does not authorize a subsequent meeting merely for the purpose of correcting errors or mistakes that may have been made in drawing at the regular meeting.

Appeal from circuit court, Hale county; JOHN MOORE, Judge.

Indictment against Major Wells for murder. From an order overruling defendant's motion to quash a special venire, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Phares Coleman and Charles E. Waller, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

STONE, C. J. The trial in this case was had at the fall term of the court in 1891. The venire of jurors summoned for the week set for the trial was served on the defendant, as part of the venire from which the jury was to be, and was, selected. In this order and service the statute was strictly conformed to. Code 1886, vol. 2, p. 134, §§ 10 and 11 in note. Before entering upon the trial, the defendant moved to quash that part of the venire which consisted of the jurors drawn and summoned for the week, on the following grounds, which were shown by the testimony to be the facts of the case: The board of jury commissioners of the county had held their meeting at the proper place, and at the proper time, viz., "on the next day after adjournment of the last regular term of the court of commissioners," in the year 1890. At that session the commissioners had drawn grand and petit jurors to serve for the several courts to be held in 1891. At such drawing, the commissioners did not pursue statutory directions. They did not first draw the requisite number of names to serve as grand jurors, and then, in like manner, proceed to draw the requisite number of persons to serve as petit jurors. Jury St. § 4, p. 132, Code, vol. 2. They drew a sufficient number of names to serve in both capacities of grand and petit jurors, and then from this whole number selected a list to serve on the grand jury, leaving the residue to perform the petit service; and the persons thus drawn and selected constituted the several venires of jurors to serve during the year 1891. In this the jury commission mistook the statute, and their duty under it, and, on motion properly made, it would have been the duty of the trial court to so declare. Murphy v. State, 86 Ala. 45, 5 South. Rep. 432. The legal result of this is that the county of Hale was without petit jurors to serve during the year 1891, who had been drawn in the manner prescribed by the statute.

There being, then, no legally drawn juries to serve at the several terms of the court, in what manner was the error or omission to be remedied? This must be answered by the statutes themselves. The act of 1887 (Code, vol. 2, p. 132, in notes,) repeals all former statutes on the subject which conflicted with its provisions. We have seen that the time of drawing juries for the next ensuing year is directed to take place "on the next day after adjournment of the last regular term of the court of county commissioners * * * held in each year." Section 2. It is further provided in the same section that "if, for any reason, a meeting of the board of jury commissioners is not held at the time appointed for such meeting, a meeting shall be held on a call of the president of the board as soon after the time appointed for such meeting as practicable." We have now stated all the provisions found in the act of 1887 bearing on the question we have in hand. It will be observed that this case does not fall within that provision of the statute which declares that "if, for any reason, a meeting of the board of jury commissioners is not held at the time appointed for such meeting, a meeting shall be held on the call of the president of the board as soon after the time appointed for such meeting as practicable." There was in this case no failure of a meeting of the board of jury commissioners at the time appointed by the statute. They did meet, and they did act. The error they fell into was that in their action they did not conform to the law. They drew the requisite number of jurors, but they did not draw them as the state commanded they should be drawn. The act of 1887 makes no provision for such a case as this. It contains no clause authorizing the reassembling of the board of jury commissioners, at any subsequent time, for the purpose of correcting errors or mistakes that may have been committed at the law-appointed meeting. And we have no authority for going beyond the provisions of the statute, even though in doing so we may appear to have done the defendant no actual injury. We must observe and enforce the law as it is written. There was no authority for the action taken by the jury commission at its called meeting in June. It would seem that, when a court of original jurisdiction finds itself without juries legally drawn, and for that reason quashes the venires, it must, as the statute now stands, supply the omission, under section 4327 of the Code of 1886. Possibly this subject needs legislative attention. For not quashing the venire of petit jurors drawn and summoned for the week in which defendant was tried, the circuit court erred. Reversed and remanded.

JACKSON v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—ELECTION BETWEEN OFFENSES.

Defendant was indicted for the unlawful killing of a bull, and one of the witnesses testified, on examination by the state, that he saw the defendant, on a certain Friday, shoot the bull with a double-barrel shotgun. Held, that the prosecutor was not compelled to elect to prosecute for the shooting at that particular time, but could prove, by the same witness, a shooting on the following Monday.

Appeal from circuit court, Lauderdale county; H. C. SPEAKE, Judge.

On the trial of Richard Jackson under an indictment for the unlawful killing of a bull, one John Holland, a witness for the state, testified "that on Friday, in the month of November, 1890, about 9 o'clock in the morning, on the premises of Aleck Jackson, in Lauderdale county, Alabama, in the cotton patch of witness, he saw the defendant shoot the bull with a double-barrel shotgun; that witness was about 60 yards distant from him when the shot was fired; that the defendant was a few steps from the bull; that witness saw the bull 'draw up' when shot by the defendant." The bill of exceptions then recites as follows: "This was the first witness and the first testimony offered. Defendant did not cross-examine witness. The prosecuting attorney then asked the witness if he had ever seen any other injury inflicted on the bull by the defendant at any other time. To this question the defendant objected, on the ground that the state had elected to prosecute for the injury on Friday; but the court overruled his objection, and the defendant then and there, in open court, duly excepted. The witness then testified that, on Monday following said Friday, he saw the defendant shoot the said bull in the cotton patch of defendant's wife, in Lauderdale county, Alabama. The court of its own motion having required the state to elect for which shooting and injury it would prosecute, the state's attorney elected to prosecute for the shooting and injury on Monday, and the evidence of the shooting on Friday was excluded. The witness then described the injury to the bull, and testified that the shooting took place about 9 o'clock in the morning, and was done with a shotgun. The defendant moved the court to exclude all the evidence of the witness in relation to the shooting on Monday, on the ground that the defendant was only indicted for one offense, and the state, having made proof of the shooting on Friday, as hereinbefore stated, had elected to prosecute for that shooting and injury, and could not prove another injury committed at another time and place. But the court overruled the motion, and the defendant, having been tried and convicted for the shooting on Monday, appeals. Affirmed.

Simpson & Jones, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in this case was indicted, tried, and convicted "for wantonly killing or injuring a bull." The only question presented by the rulings of the lower court is whether the state made an election to prosecute for one act, and afterwards proceeded to elicit evidence concerning another. The beneficent purpose of the rule which requires an election is that the defendant shall not be prejudiced in the minds of the jury by the introduction of evidence of offenses for which he is not on trial. The term "elect" implies a knowledge of facts which go to make up two or more offenses; and while a solicitor may by his own acts and questions involuntarily effect an election, yet, to hold him to have elected to proceed for a certain offense, he must have learned enough to enable him to individualize the transaction, and then pursue his inquiry with a view of learning the details and particulars of the act or transaction thus individualized. To hold him to an election without going this far would, in many cases, amount to a denial of justice. Peacher v. State, 61 Ala. 22; Smith v. State, 52 Ala. 384; Hughes v. State, 35 Ala. 351; Cochran v. State, 30 Ala. 542; Elam v. State, 26 Ala. 48. Under the rule laid down, we hold that the solicitor had not elected to prosecute for the shooting which took place on Friday. There is nothing in the answers of the witness to questions asked which calls for the particulars or details of that shooting. We discover no error in the record.

Affirmed.

ASKEW v STATE.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 25, 1892.)

JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE—DUTY TO RETREAT—INTOXICATION—READING FROM LAW REPORTS TO JURY.

1. In a trial for murder, it appeared that defendant and deceased, who were friends, were at the time of the killing in defendant's place of business, and that deceased was intoxicated. The court, after stating that, if defendant was in his own place of business, he was under no obligation to retreat therefrom, instructed the jury that if deceased was intoxicated to a degree so as to render him less prudent and less dangerous by impairing his physical faculties, then it was defendant's duty to exercise reasonable care to avert a difficulty with him, unless defendant increased his danger thereby, and if he failed to exercise such care he was not without guilt. Held, that the charge was erroneous in ignoring the fact that the killing occurred in defendant's place of business, and in assuming that it was defendant's duty to retreat therefrom.

2. Where defendant's attorney, in discussing the law involved, read to the court certain portions of opinions in cases cited by him, it was not error to allow the other side to read the facts as reported in those particular cases; the court instructing the jury that they should not consider such facts.

3. Defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that if defendant shot believing that unless he did so deceased would cut him, then they should acquit, unless defendant brought on the difficulty. Held, that the instruction was properly refused; it basing the right to kill on a mere belief, without any reasonable grounds for the belief.

Appeal from circuit court, Henry county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge.

Thomas C. Askew was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. Reversed.

Thomas Askew was indicted for the murder of Ned Grice, and was convicted of murder in the second degree. The testimony for the state showed that the defendant shot and killed Ned Grice in the livery stable of the defendant. The circumstances attending the killing are substantially as follows: The defendant and one Whidden walked with the deceased, who was drunk, from across the street in the town of Dothan to the defendant's livery stable; that they went into the bedroom adjoining the stable; that the defendant and the deceased, who were good friends, got into a scuffle; that in falling on the bed the deceased took his pistol from his pocket, and the defendant called Whidden to come and assist him in getting the pistol from the deceased; that the defendant succeeded in getting the pistol from the deceased, and left the room, going to the rear of the stable; that said Grice came out of the room, coming towards the defendant with his knife open in his hand, and told the defendant to give up his pistol to him, using, as some of the witnesses testify, profane language; that the defendant told said Grice not to come any nearer to him with his knife open, that he was his best friend, and he hated to hurt him; that the said Grice continued to advance, staggering, as testified to by some of the witnesses, towards the defendant; that the defendant continued to tell him to stand back, otherwise he would shoot him; that upon said Grice coming within a few feet of him with the knife in his hand, his arm being by his side, the defendant raised the pistol and shot at said Grice, but the first shot missed him, whereupon the defendant shot again, and said Grice fell, and died almost instantly; that after the defendant had shot said Grice he went to the front of the stable, and told the by-standers that he had killed the best friend he had in the world. The defendant excepted to the charge given by the court, and to the court's refusal to give the following charge requested by him in writing: "If the jury are reasonably persuaded from the evidence that Askew, at the time he shot Grice, did it believing unless he did so Grice would cut him, then they will find him not guilty, unless they further believe from the evidence that Askew brought on the difficulty; and if the evidence shows that Askew merely carried Grice to his stable to care for him, and in doing so he only took from him his pistol to prevent him from doing injury to himself or to any other person present, then he did not bring on the difficulty."

Roberts & Martin, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLOPTON, J. The evidence showing, without dispute, that the killing occurred in a livery stable of which the defendant was proprietor, and that the deceased was intoxicated at the time, the court, after stating the general proposition that, if the defendant was in his own place of business, he was under no obligation or duty to retreat therefrom to avoid a difficulty, proceeded to further instruct the jury in substance as follows: But if the deceased was intoxicated, and in consequence thereof was less prudent, and his power of locomotion and action was so impaired as to render him less dangerous than he otherwise would have been, and this was known to defendant, "then it was his duty to exercise reasonable care to avert a difficulty with the deceased, unless by the exercise of such care he would have apparently increased his danger; and if the defendant failed to exercise such reasonable care, and if it could have been done without increasing his danger, then the defendant is not without guilt if he shot and killed the deceased." The ascertainment of the proper construction and legal effect of the charge, when referred to the evidence, is preliminary and essential to determining its correctness. The first inquiry is, what is meant by the expression that "it was the duty of defendant to exercise reasonable care to avert a difficulty, and to avoid the necessity of killing, unless, by the exercise thereof, he would have apparently increased his danger," in the manner and connection in which it is employed in the charge? When a person is assailed without the precincts of his dwelling or place of business, it is his unquestionable duty to use all the means in his power to avert the difficulty, and to avoid the necessity of taking life, if there be any mode of escape or retreat with reasonable safety. Also, notwithstanding he may be attacked in his dwelling or business house, it is his duty to refrain from taking life, unless there is imminent and pressing necessity, real or apparent. He must take care to employ no more force than is sufficient to repel the danger to his life, or the apprehended injury to his person. In these two respects alone can the duty to exercise reasonable care arise in cases of voluntary homicide, not the consequence of criminal negligence, when the accused is without fault in bringing on or provoking the difficulty. The expression, therefore, "to exercise reasonable care," though not strictly accurate, must have been employed with reference to one or both of these respects. There being no evidence tending to show that defendant was at fault, and the evidence showing that the deceased was the assailant, whether there existed a real or apparent necessity, and a reasonable mode of escape, were the only issues really involved and tried. In view of these issues, the charge was intended to assert the principles on which the defendant could set up the excuse of self-defense, when he was assailed in his own place of business by a drunken man.

The precise subject of the charge is the duty to retreat. This is apparent from the fact that it begins with a statement of the general rule as to the duty of defendant to retreat from his place of business. After stating this general rule, the charge proceeds to lay down, by way of distinction, as it were, a rule in respect to the duty of exercising reasonable care to avert the difficulty, as specially applicable when the assailant is intoxicated to the degree hypothesized. When the charge is construed as an entirety, and in reference to the evidence, when the different parts are considered in connection and in relation to each other, the legal effect of the latter part is to limit or modify, when the assailant is intoxicated, the application of the general rule stated in the first clause; otherwise the qualifying phrase, "unless by the exercise of such care he would have apparently increased his danger," is without meaning and effect. Such may not have been the intention of the court, but it was probably so understood by the jury. A similar charge was so construed in Brinkley v. State, 89 Ala. 34, 8 South. Rep. 22. In that case the killing occurred in the house of defendant. The court gave the following charge: "That, if the defendant could have avoided the difficulty without danger to himself, he should have done so." This charge was held to be erroneous for the reason that it assumed that the defendant was bound to retreat from his house, and also to yield the right to order the deceased from his premises on account of profanity and indecent behavior, as a mode of avoiding apprehended violence. Though differing in phraseology, there is no difference in principle between the charge in that case and the charge under consideration. Unless the meaning and legal effect of the charge is to constitute the drunken condition of the deceased an exception to the general rule in regard to the duty to retreat from one's dwelling or business house, it is intrinsically inconsistent; the charge making no allusion to any other mode of exercising reasonable care. It may be that the intoxication of the deceased was a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining whether there was apparently a present, pressing necessity for defendant to take the life of the deceased to protect his own, or to prevent great bodily harm. But voluntary intoxication did not deprive defendant of the right to defend himself against violent assault. The conduct of a person in a state of voluntary intoxication is subject to the same rules and principles as the conduct of a sober man. Nichols v. Winfrey, 90 Mo. 403, 2 S. W. Rep. 305. The charge is defective, in that it ignores the evidence showing that the killing occurred in the defendant's place of business, and assumes that if the deceased was intoxicated to a degree rendering him less prudent, and so impairing his physical faculties as to render him less dangerous, it was the duty of defendant to retreat therefrom, as a mode of exercising reasonable care to avert the difficulty, and avoid the necessity of taking his life, if his danger would not be apparently increased thereby. The charge requested by defendant was properly refused, because it bases the right to kill the deceased upon his mere belief that unless he did so the deceased would cut him, without the predicate of reasonable grounds for the belief. The circumstances must be such as would create in the mind of a reasonably prudent man the belief that such necessity existed.

The defendant also excepted to the court permitting the solicitor to read the facts in certain reported cases. It appears that the defendant's attorney, in discussing the legal questions, read to the court certain portions of the opinions rendered in those cases, and thereupon the solicitor read to the court the facts as reported. The solicitor may have deemed this necessary to show that the principles of law announced in the opinions were not applicable to this case. The court stated to the jury that they should not consider the facts read from the cases referred to. Under the circumstances, we cannot say there was error in this. It does not come within the principle declared in Williams v. State, 83 Ala. 68, 3 South. Rep. 743. Reversed and remanded.

WINGO et al. v. HARDY.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 25, 1892.)

EQUITY—ADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW—PLEADING.

1. Plaintiff leased certain mining property from W. on condition that, upon failure to commence shipment of ore at a given time, W. could re-enter and take possession. Plaintiff sold an interest in his lease to P., who assumed all the obligations of the original lease. On default under the lease, W. commenced an action of unlawful detainer to obtain possession, and, while such suit was pending, plaintiff instituted proceedings in equity against W. and P., asking for a receiver, and to enjoin W. from prosecuting his suit for possession, alleging as an excuse for non-compliance with the lease that W. and P. had colluded to defraud plaintiff by failure to perform on the part of P. so as to oust him of possession, W. and P. having agreed to hold each other harmless. Held that, plaintiff's averments constituting a legal defense that could be pleaded in answer in the suit of unlawful detainer, there was no ground for equitable relief.

2. The bill alleged that plaintiff had done all in his power to hasten the opening of the mine, and that he was delayed from six to eight weeks in obtaining rights of way for a spur track. Held, that the allegations were bad in that they failed to set out specifically the cause of the delay, so as to enable the court to determine whether such delay was "unavoidable," as specified by the terms of the lease.

3. The answer by W. that plaintiff did not do "all in his power to hasten the opening of the mine, or that he was delayed as alleged," was, in view of the generality and indefiniteness of the allegation in the bill, a sufficient denial, but such defense could properly be made in the action of unlawful detainer.

Appeal from chancery court, Colbert county; THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor.

Action by Nicholas Hardy against Abner W. Wingo and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed and rendered.

Jackson & Sawtelle and Roulhac & Nathan, for appellants. J. B. Moore and Kirk & Almon, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. Wingo, in May, 1890, executed a lease to Hardy, granting to him the right to mine and remove iron ore from a quarter section of land, the property of the lessor. The lease was to continue five years, with a privilege of renewal for five additional years. By the terms of the lease, Wingo granted mining privileges in the particular quarter section, and certain other easements and privileges not necessary to be named. He incurred no liability to furnish any money, labor, or anything else in promotion of the enterprise. It was a mere lease, conferring certain rights and privileges, on Wingo's part. Hardy bound himself to open up the mines, construct and supply all necessary works and machinery, and build a spur track connecting the mine with the railroad which ran near by. All this was to be done and completed without any assistance from Wingo. By the terms of the lease, Hardy bound himself to have the works completed and commence shipping ore by the 15th of October, 1890, to ship 100 tons per day, and to pay Wingo a royalty of 10 cents per ton for the first year, and 12½ cents per ton for each succeeding year. He further stipulated that if he failed to ship the 100 tons per day, commencing with October 15th aforesaid, then, for every day he so failed, he or his assigns would pay to Wingo "ten dollars per day for each and every day thereafter" during the time he, said Hardy, should remain in default; the monthly settlements of royalty to be made on the 25th day of each month. The lease contains this further clause: "If the party of the second part [Hardy] shall fail to pay said royalty, or the amount that is to be paid per ton for said ore, on or before the 25th day of each month, or shall fail to comply with any of the covenants herein mentioned, according to the true intent and meaning of this contract, then this contract or agreement shall be null and void, and the lessor, said Wingo, his agent, heirs, or assigns, has the right to re-enter and take possession of said leased property mentioned herein, and lease the same to other parties, if he so desires." On June 21, 1890, another clause was added to said contract of letting, by which it was agreed, by and between Wingo and Hardy, that "the only reason which will be taken into consideration by the party of the first part will be the impediment met with in securing the right of way through other parties' lands from the above property, to make connection with the common carrier. Any detention met with in that line, such as injunctions, arbitrations, or condemnation of lands by appraisements or other unavoidable delays, such time shall be extended to the party of the second part [Hardy] from Oct. 15, 1890, without penalty during the time of this lease." It is manifest that the exemption reserved and secured to Hardy from penalties and forfeitures to be incurred by non-compliance with his contract included only such as might result from impediments and unavoidable delays in obtaining the right of way in lands belonging to others, over which the spur railroad track must be constructed. For a period corresponding to the length of time Hardy might be unavoidably delayed in obtaining such right of way, his obligation to ship 100 tons of ore per day, or to pay daily the stipulated penalty of $10, was postponed beyond October 15, 1890. If there was no impediment or delay in obtaining such right of way, then the contract contains no provision excusing Hardy from his promise to deliver 100 tons of ore daily, beginning October 15, 1890, and, failing, to pay $10 per day forfeit money. Soon after the second or modifying clause of the lease was agreed on and executed, Hardy sold and conveyed a two-thirds interest in the lease to Perkins. By the terms of that sale Perkins undertook to furnish all the means, and do and perform all the work, which Wingo's lease had imposed on Hardy, and the moneys to be thus expended by Perkins were to be refunded to him, with interest, out of the first profits of the enterprise. The contract between Hardy and Perkins contains these clauses: "It is understood that the party of the second part [Perkins] shall have full management of all the business which may be transacted under said lease, also full control and disbursement of all the funds which may be derived from said business, upon the following conditions, to-wit: that the said L. R. Perkins, the party of the second part, shall conform to and faithfully carry out all of the conditions that are required of M. Hardy to carry out his part of the contract and agreement with A. W. Wingo, contained in said lease * * * It is fully understood that M. Hardy, the party of the first part, shall aid and assist in carrying on said business at the mines and elsewhere, or furnish a competent representative, from this date until the expiration of this contract, free of compensation, other than the one-third of the net profits that may be derived from said business after all expenses shall be paid." These extracts show that Perkins was to furnish all the means and labor necessary to carry out Hardy's part of the lease contract, which Hardy bound himself to aid and assist, either personally or by competent representative. This devolved on Perkins the duty and obligation to have the works completed and in operation, and to commence delivering ore and paying royalty, by October 15, 1890, and, failing, to pay daily the stipulated forfeiture, unless there was hindrance and delay in obtaining the right of way for the railroad spur-track. In November, 1890, the works not having been completed, the railroad unfinished, no ore shipped, and no royalty or penalty paid, Wingo commenced an action of unlawful detainer to obtain possession of the land embraced in the lease. The justice decided this action in favor of Hardy. Wingo thereupon took an appeal to the circuit court. Without waiting for a trial in the circuit court, Wingo, in January, 1891, commenced another action of unlawful detainer, before another justice of the peace, to recover possession of the land. Each of these actions was undecided when the bill in this case was filed, in April, 1891.

The present suit is a bill by Hardy, and Wingo and Perkins are made defendants. It sets forth in extenso the facts summarized above. It does not aver that the works are completed, but admits they are not. Does not aver that any ore has been shipped, or can be shipped, as matters now stand. Does not aver any payment of royalty, or any offer, willingness, or ability to make payment, or to complete the works and comply with the contract of letting. The gravamen of the complaint it makes—of the excuse it sets up for non-compliance with the contract—is, briefly, that Wingo and Perkins have colluded and entered into an agreement to defraud and oppress Hardy by failing to perform the contract on Perkins' part, and thus to oust him of the possession; and that they, Wingo and Perkins, have mutually agreed and promised to protect and hold each other harmless. The bill prays for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the works, and for an injunction against the said unlawful detainer suits; prays for specific performance of the contract with Perkins, and that Wingo's suits be perpetually enjoined. The chancellor did not appoint a receiver, but granted an injunction restraining Wingo from prosecuting his said suits. A motion was made to dissolve the injunction on two grounds: First, that the bill is without equity; and, second, that the material averments of the bill are denied in the answers. The chancellor overruled the motion to dissolve the injunction, and from that ruling the present appeal is prosecuted. No ruling of the chancellor was made on that part of the bill which seeks to have specific performance of the agreement entered into between Hardy and Perkins. It would seem, however, that chancery could not entertain jurisdiction to enforce that agreement, situated as the parties and the works were when this bill was filed. When the agreement sought to have enforced involves continuous administration of executory skill, discretion, personal supervision, or anything else of like kind, then the chancery court is without power or machinery to compel the active observance of such duties. Parties thus circumstanced are left to such redress as law courts can furnish for the breach of such contract. Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 339; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. 1343; Carlisle v. Carlisle, 77 Ala. 339; Iron Age Pub. Co. v. W. U. Tel. Co., 83 Ala. 498, 3 South. Rep. 449. Does the bill contain equity, in that phase of it which sought and obtained an injunction against the prosecution of the suits in unlawful detainer? If Hardy was hindered and prevented in the performance, through Perkins, of his contract to have the works completed and in operation by October 15, 1890, by collusion and fraudulent combination between Wingo and Perkins, could that afford him excuse for appealing to the chancery court for relief? We think not. No one can insist on a forfeiture for failure to perform a condition precedent, if he himself has caused, or intentionally or knowingly aided in causing, the failure. To allow a recovery in such conditions would be to permit the wrong-doer to take advantage of his own wrong. McLendon v. Godfrey, 3 Ala. 181; Sprague v. Morgan, 7 Ala. 952; Eads v. Murphy, 52 Ala. 520; 1 Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 269; 5 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 2510; Bish. Cont. (Enlarged Ed.) § 1431; Borst v. Simpson, 90 Ala. 373, 7 South. Rep. 814. This defense is legal, and, if proved, will be an answer to the actions of unlawful detainer. Under these principles the bill of complaint in this case shows no ground for equitable relief, and the injunction ought to have been dissolved on that ground. The bill, among many other things, charges that "complainant [Hardy] has done all that was in his power to hasten the opening and developing of said mines from the time they began work, on the 22d of June, 1890; that they were delayed from six to eight weeks in obtaining rights of way for the railroad." This charge is not specific enough. It should have set forth what caused the delay—"injunctions, arbitrations, or condemnations of lands by appraisements, or other unavoidable delays"—with such particularity of language, both as to persons and the nature of the proceedings, as that the court could determine whether such impediment or hindrance falls within the exceptional clause of the written lease. Facts should be averred, not conclusions. Wingo's answer to this clause is that he "denies that complainant did everything that was in his power to hasten the opening and developing of said mines, or that he was delayed as alleged." Considering the generality and indefiniteness of the charge made in the bill, this answer was a sufficient denial. This defense, like the other, was of legal cognizance, and can be made to the actions of unlawful detainer. We have not considered it necessary to notice the denials in the answers in detail. All interference with the work by Wingo, and all collusion and combination between him and Perkins, are denied. Taking the answers for our guide, the chief if not the only cause of failure to complete the work by October 15, 1890, was the fault or misfortune of Perkins in not performing his contract according to its stipulations. The decretal order of the chancellor is reversed, and a decree here rendered dissolving the injunction. Reversed and rendered.

KAHL v. MEMPHIS & C. R. CO.

COURTS—JURISDICTION—TORT COMMITTED IN ANOTHER STATE—PLEADING—DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT.

1. Where a railroad company obtains charters from the states of Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee, the courts of Alabama have no jurisdiction to entertain an action against the company for negligently killing plaintiff's intestate in the state of Mississippi, since the tort was committed by a foreign corporation in a foreign state.

2. In an action against a railroad, a petition which alleges that plaintiff's intestate was negligently killed in another state by a co-employe, but fails to set out any statute of such state making the employer liable in such cases, is bad on demurrer.

Appeal from circuit court, Colbert county; H. C. SPEAKE, Judge.

Action by John Kahl, administrator, against the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company, for causing the death of plaintiff's intestate. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought by the appellant, John Kahl, as administrator of the estate of John P. Kahl, and sought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of the plaintiff's intestate in a collision which occurred on the road of the defendant. The complaint, as amended, shows that the appellee is a domestic corporation, and owns and operates a line of railroad extending from the town of Stephenson, in Alabama, to Memphis, Tenn., and that it has charters from the states of Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee; that said line of railroad is a continuous line through this state, operated by the appellee; that the intestate of the plaintiff was a citizen of Alabama, and at the time of the accident was employed by the defendant as an engineer to run an engine of the said road from the city of Tuscumbia, in Alabama, to Memphis, in Tennessee; and that the contract of employment was made in Alabama. It was also shown that the accident which resulted in the death of the plaintiff's intestate occurred in Mississippi. The defendant demurred to the complaint, as amended, on the following grounds: (1) That it appears from the complaint that the alleged injuries resulting in the death of plaintiff's intestate occurred outside of the jurisdiction of Alabama; (2) that it does not appear from the said complaint, as amended, that the state of Mississippi gave any right to an action by said plaintiff to recover damages for the alleged injuries resulting in the death of his intestate; and (3) that the statutes of the state of Mississippi, as set forth in the amended complaint, did not purport to confer upon the personal representative of the decedent the right of action for injuries resulting in the death of said decedent. The court sustained the defendant's demurrers to the amended complaint, and, the plaintiff declining to further amend his complaint, judgment was rendered by the court for the defendant, to which ruling of the court plaintiff excepted. On this appeal, prosecuted by the plaintiff, the ruling on the demurrer and the judgment of the court are assigned as error.

J. B. Moore, for appellant. Humes & Sheffey, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. The averments of the complaint show that plaintiff's intestate, while acting in the discharge of his duties as an employe of the defendant's railroad corporation, was killed in a collision of trains, caused by the negligence of the employer. The collision occurred in the state of Mississippi, and the present action to recover damages for the death of the intestate was instituted in the state of Alabama. The court below sustained a demurrer to the amended complaint, and, plaintiff declining to further amend, his action was dismissed. We are of opinion that the amendment, added to each count of the complaint, clearly avers three separate, distinct, and independent constituents of the defendant's corporate character,—one created by the state of Mississippi, one by the state of Alabama, one by the state of Tennessee,—and neither dependent upon the other for existence or authority. The averment that it was "a unit as a corporation" is a mere conclusion of the pleader. Though incorporated by the same corporate name, owned by the same stockholders, invested with like franchises, and operated under the same management, so that practically it is a single corporation, legally speaking, the corporation is composed of three separate, independent, legal entities, each depending for its existence upon the separate and independent acts of incorporation by the several states through which it passes. If the state of Mississippi should revoke and annul the charter granted by that state, the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company, as a corporation, would still exist in Alabama and Tennessee, but there would be no such corporation in the state of Mississippi. Neither of the three states can give or take away the legal existence of a corporation beyond its territorial boundary. Within the boundary of Alabama, it is a domestic corporation; beyond that, it is a foreign corporation. These general principles find support in many adjudications. Insurance Co. v. Kamper, 78 Ala. 325; Railroad Co., v. Alabama, 107 U. S. 581, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 432; Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 181; Runyan v. Coster, 14 Pet. 122; St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 354; Nashua & L. R. Corp. v. Boston & L. R. Corp., 136 U. S. 356, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1004. It would seem to follow that the tort complained of in the present case was committed by a foreign corporation, and beyond the jurisdiction of the state of Alabama. In Rorer on Railroads, (volume 2, p. 1149, par. 3,) it is said: "The right given by statute to the recovery of damages for injuries caused by the wrong act or negligence of a railroad company, its employes and servants, is local in the courts of the county or state wherein the right is given by the statute, and the injury is incurred." A great many authorities are cited by the author to support the text. See, also, Banking Co. v. Carr, 76 Ala. 393.

The demurrer was well taken for another reason. We think it may be stated as an established proposition that if the tort complained of was not actionable in the state where it occurred, it will not sustain an action in this state. The present action is purely statutory. At common law, where death resulted from the culpable negligence of a co-employe, under such circumstances as averred in the complaint, no action could be maintained against the master. Railroad Co. v. Davis, 92 Ala. 312, 9 South. Rep. 252; Stewart v. Railroad Co., 83 Ala. 493, 4 South. Rep. 373; Railroad Co. v. Orr, 91 Ala. 552, 8 South. Rep. 360. If there exists any statute in the state of Mississippi giving an action to the administrator of a deceased employe against the master, to recover damages for the death of his intestate, caused by the negligence of a co-employe, or any statute substantially similar to what is known as the "Employers' Act" in this state, such statute ought to have been set out in the complaint. Sections 2078, 2079, of the Revised Code of Mississippi, copied in the complaint, do not cover a case like the present. In the absence of such an averment, we must presume the common law was in force in that state, and at common law the present action could not be maintained. In either view, the demurrer was well taken, and properly sustained.

Affirmed.

SHEPHERD v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 25, 1892.)

LARCENY—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. On a trial for larceny, the evidence tended to show that certain packages of seeds were consigned to one C.; that at the place of destination the car containing the packages was broken open before being unloaded; that the packages were missing; and that packages corresponding in number and description were subsequently found in defendant's possession. Held, that the evidence authorized a conviction of the larceny of the packages.

2. Where the evidence of guilt is purely circumstantial, it is proper for the court to refuse to instruct the jury that they should not consider, as a circumstance against defendant, the fact "that no other person was suspected of the crime."

3. The fact that a juror "feels a desire" for more evidence of criminality is not necessarily the equivalent of reasonable doubt in the mind of such juror.

4. On a trial for larceny, an instruction that "no matter how strong the circumstances, if they can be reconciled with the theory that some other person may have done the act without the guilty agency or participation of defendant, then defendant is not shown to be guilty by that full measure of proof which the law requires," is properly refused as argumentative.

5. Where the jury is recalled, after retiring to consider the verdict, and given defendant's charge previously refused, it is not error of which defendant can complain.

Appeal from circuit court, Bibb county; J. R. DOWDELL, Judge.

Henry Shepherd was convicted of grand larceny, and sentenced to imprisonment for five years, from which he appeals. Affirmed.

The testimony on which the defendant was indicted was purely circumstantial, and is sufficiently shown in the opinion. The defendant separately excepted to the refusal to give each of the following written charges requested by him: (1) "The court charges the jury that if they believe the evidence they must find the defendant not guilty." (2) "The court charges the jury that under the evidence in this case they cannot consider the fact, if it be a fact, that there is no circumstance tending to show that any other person committed the crime, or has been charged with or suspected of the crime as a circumstance against the defendant." (3) "The court charges the jury that if any juror, before pronouncing a verdict of guilty, feels the desire for more evidence tending to show the guilt of defendant, then that juror has the reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt upon which the law requires him to acquit the defendant." (4) "The court charges the jury that the evidence in this case is entirely circumstantial; that humane provisions of the law are that a prisoner charged with a felony should not be convicted on circumstantial evidence, unless it shows by a full measure of proof that the defendant is guilty. Such proof is always insufficient unless it excludes to a moral certainty every other reasonable hypothesis but that of the guilt of the accused. No matter how strong the circumstances, if they can be reconciled with the theory that some other person may have done the act without the guilty agency or participation of the defendant, then the defendant is not shown to be guilty by that full measure of proof which the law requires." The bill of exceptions then recites: "After the jury had retired to consider upon their verdict, the court directed them to be called back into the court-room, and, the jury having been brought back accordingly, the court gave them the following charge, which had been asked in writing by defendant before their retirement, but which the court had then refused to give, to which ruling of the court the defendant had duly reserved an exception: 'The court charges the jury that if the evidence is reasonably reconcilable with the theory that defendant acquired the property from the real thief, or that, if the evidence is reasonably reconcilable with the theory that some one else was the guilty agent, then the jury must acquit the defendant.' After reading the charge to the jury, the court stated to the jury that, while he gave them the charge, they should take it in connection with the general charge of the court, and also with the further oral charge which he would give them, viz., that the jury could consider the fact of the recent possession of stolen goods unexplained, if they were satisfied from the evidence that such was the fact, as a circumstance showing that the party having such possession was the thief. To the giving of this additional oral charge by the court the defendant objected, and, his objection being overruled, he duly reserved an exception to the giving of such charge.

Logan, Hargrove & Vande Graaff, for appellant. William L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MCCLELLAN, J. The evidence tended to show that certain packages of seed, about 500 in number, were consigned at Philadelphia by Landreth to E. N. Cottingham & Co., at Blockton, Ala.; that the car containing these packages arrived at Blockton, and was broken into before being unloaded; that the packages were missing, and packages corresponding in number and description were subsequently found in the possession of the defendant. Very clearly, we think, the jury were authorized to find upon this evidence that the defendant had stolen the seeds as charged in the indictment, and the general charge requested by the defendant, the giving of which would have denied them this right, was of course properly refused. Kemp v. State, 89 Ala. 52, 7 South. Rep. 413, and authorities there cited. In cases like the present one, where the guilt of the defendant is to be found, if at all, from criminating circumstances alone, it is error to instruct the jury that they may not look to the fact that "there is no circumstance tending to show that any other person committed the crime, or has been charged with or suspected of the crime." Charge 2 asked by the defendant was of this character, and hence was well refused. Childs v. State, 58 Ala. 349. The fact that a juror feels a desire for more evidence of criminality is not necessarily the equivalent of a reasonable doubt of guilt in the mind of such juror. A juror might well "feel a desire" for more evidence, and naturally would experience such desire in all cases where he entertained any doubt whatever of guilt, whether that doubt were a reasonable one or not, in itself; and manifestly a desire for further proof, resulting from a mere unreasoned misgiving, would not involve a state of mind on the part of the juror which would make it his duty to acquit. These considerations demonstrate the infirmity of the third charge requested by the defendant. The fourth instruction asked for defendant is palpably a mere argument, and its refusal may be justified upon that ground. Potter v. State, 92 Ala. 37, 9 South. Rep. 402; Chatham v. State, 92 Ala. 47, 9 South. Rep. 607; Bancroft v. Otis, 91 Ala. 279, 8 South. Rep. 286; Little v. State, 89 Ala. 99, 8 South. Rep. 82. We do not doubt that the trial court may with propriety recall the jury after they have retired, and give them an instruction which had been previously refused to the defendant. It would seem, indeed, that in any event the defendant could not complain of such action on the part of the court, as it is taken in consequence of his original request that the charge should be given, and presumptively in all cases, and as matter of fact in this case, in his interest. Marcus v. State, 89 Ala. 23, 8 South. Rep. 155. So that, if error was committed in recalling the jury and giving the previously refused charge, it was affirmatively beneficial to the defendant, and cannot be availed of by him on appeal. Marks v. State, 87 Ala. 99, 6 South. Rep. 377. The court having properly recalled the jury, and given the charge at first refused to the defendant, its further action in that connection stands upon the same footing as if the charge had been originally given, in which case the defendant could not have complained because of any infirmity in the charge itself, since given at his instance, nor because of any explanatory charge given by the court, if such explanation were proper in itself; and that the explanatory oral instruction given by the court was proper we do not doubt. Barnard v. State, 88 Ala. 111, 6 South. Rep. 752. We find no error in the record, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

ATTORNEYS—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION.

Where a firm of attorneys is retained to procure the granting of a license to sell liquor, under an agreement that they are to be paid a certain sum cash and the balance "whenever a license to sell liquor is obtained or can be obtained," they cannot recover the balance when their efforts to procure a license prove fruitless, but afterwards a license is obtained through the efforts of other parties.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge.

Action by Kelly & Smith against E. E. Cheney and others for $250 for services rendered as attorneys. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Gordon McDonald, for appellants. Kelly & Smith, in pro. per.

STONE, C. J. The claim set forth in the two counts of the complaint is substantially as follows: The Anti-Prohibition Society of Anniston, a voluntary association of the persons sued in this action, employed Kelly & Smith, attorneys, to represent them, or any member of the society, in an effort to procure a license to retail spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors in precinct 15, Calhoun county, the precinct in which Anniston has its situs. The attorneys were to represent the applicants for license in any and all courts that might become necessary in the attempt to obtain such license. The fee to be paid Kelly & Smith was $250 cash, and other "two hundred and fifty dollars to be paid whenever a license to sell liquor is obtained or can be obtained in said precinct." The cash payment was presently made. This suit is for the deferred payment, and the complaint avers "that a license issued authorizing the sale of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors in Anniston as early as September 15, 1890." Whether the police jurisdiction of Anniston extends to and includes the whole of precinct 15 is not shown. It may admit of question whether the establishment of a right to obtain a license to retail within the city of Anniston is a compliance with the agreement to establish such right in precinct 15. We will not decide this question, as we prefer to place our ruling on a different ground.

The present suit does not count on a written retainer. The proof shows the defendants executed no writing. The testimony most favorable to plaintiffs shows that two persons, being a majority of a committee of three, representing a voluntary association consisting of a large number of persons, and known as the "Anti-Prohibition Society of Calhoun County," entered into an oral agreement with the attorneys, engaging their services to represent the association in certain matters of prospective litigation. Plaintiffs aver that the event has happened or transpired on which the second payment was to become due and demandable, and on this they base their right of recovery. The plaintiffs at the time of the retainer executed a receipt acknowledging the payment to them of $250, specifying the professional services they bound themselves to render, and naming the event or condition on the occurrence of which the promise to make the second payment depended. It is stated in the receipt that "said Anti-Prohibition Society of Calhoun County, Alabama, have this day employed Kelly & Smith as their attorneys to represent their interest in precinct No. 15 of said county, [Anniston,] and make such application to the probate court as may be necessary to thoroughly test the right to procure license to sell liquor in precinct No. 15, and to secure such license, if the same can be legally done, and to represent such applications of appeal, or otherwise, as may be necessary, either to supreme court, circuit court, or city court, one or all, as may be necessary, until it is ascertained whether license can be secured, or not. * * * Terms of employment, $259.00 cash, the receipt of which is acknowledged, and $250.00 to be paid whenever a license to sell liquor is obtained, or can be obtained, in said precinct." This receipt was put in evidence by plaintiffs for the purpose of proving the terms of the retainer. It was proved, and not denied, that Kelly & Smith did render professional services in endeavoring to procure a license to retail liquors in said precinct, particularly in the case of Olmstead v. Crook, 89 Ala. 228, 7 South. Rep. 776; but in all their efforts they were unsuccessful. In a later case, (Ex parte Mayor, 90 Ala. 516, 7 South. Rep. 779,) it was decided by this court that there was no statute authorizing the city council of Anniston to enact an ordinance prohibiting sales of liquors in said city, but that they could only regulate such sale by license. We therefore decided that the prohibition ordinance adopted by the city council was in excess of its authority, and was invalid. The result of this decision was to open up the way for obtaining a license to retail liquors in the city of Anniston. The case last referred to (90 Ala. 516, 7 South. Rep. 779) arose in the matter of Mrs. Untreiner's conviction for violating the prohibition ordinance of the city of Anniston. She was not a member of the Anti-Prohibition Society of Anniston, and had nothing to do with its plans and purposes. She was an outsider, and Kelly & Smith neither represented her in that litigation, nor did the Anti-Prohibition Society or any of its members, so far as we are informed, request them to do so. They were not of counsel in the case. As we understand the contract of retainer in this case, as evidenced by the written receipt, the professional services to be rendered by the attorneys were the consideration—the only consideration—which purported to uphold and could uphold the promise. Without such services, or the agreement to render them, the promise had no consideration, and would not maintain an action. Bish. Cont. (Enlarged Ed.) § 40; Hamlin v. Wheelock, 42 Hun, 530. And, the promise to pay being made contingent on success, it was not enough that services should be rendered. They must have been successfully rendered, to entitle the plaintiffs to the additional $250. To test this: When the plaintiffs had rendered all the professional services they claim to have rendered, the right to obtain a license to retail liquors in Anniston had not been established. If no proceedings had been taken after that time, and matters had remained in statu quo, no one would contend the present action could be maintained. A complete answer to such suit would be that the promise to pay was conditional, and the condition had not been complied with. Now, all that was subsequently done, and which it is claimed is a performance of the condition, was done by another; and neither the plaintiffs nor defendants in this suit had any participation therein. So far as they were or are concerned, it was the merest accident. It was not a performance of the condition on which the payment of the second $250 was made dependent. The judgment of the city court is reversed, and, rendering the judgment that court should have rendered, it is ordered and adjudged that the defendants go hence, and recover of plaintiffs the costs of this suit in the court below and in this court.

Reversed and rendered.

PATE v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Jan. 8, 1892.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE OF THREATS—REFUSAL TO FLEE—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—CHARACTER—REASONABLE DOUBT.

1. On trial for murder, threats made by defendant against deceased four months before the killing are admissible in evidence.

2. Unlawful relations existing between defendant and the wife of deceased may be shown as evidence of motive.

3. Evidence of the refusal of defendant to flee when he heard that he was to be arrested for the crime is inadmissible, in the absence of any evidence of flight offered by the state.

4. A charge that, no matter how strong the circumstances may be, if, under all the evidence, the jury believe that defendant might not have committed the crime, they must acquit, is properly refused.

5. A charge that if the evidence of defendant's good character generates a doubt in the jury's mind, apart from all the other evidence in defendant's favor, they must acquit, is properly refused.

6. It is proper to refuse to charge that, if the evidence of a witness for the state is directly contradicted by a witness for defendant, the jury may reject the testimony of either; but the burden of proof being on the state, "if all the other evidence is in equipoise," they must acquit.

7. Where there is a defense of an alibi, the evidence in support of it should be considered in connection with all the other evidence in the case, and, if on the whole evidence there is reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt, he should be acquitted.

Appeal from criminal court, Jefferson county; SAMUEL E. GREEN, Judge.

Rafe Pate was indicted for the murder of one John Orr, and was convicted of murder in the second degree. On the trial it was proved by the state that Sunday morning, March 15, 1891, the body of John Orr was found on Twenty-Fourth street, in the city of Birmingham, between Ninth and Tenth avenues; that he had a wound in his temple, caused by a pistol or rifle ball, which caused his death. William Robinson, a witness for the state, testified that on Saturday night, the 14th of March, 1891, he was walking along Twenty-Fourth street, between Ninth and Tenth avenues, and heard the defendant and John Orr, the deceased, disputing, and heard John Orr say, "Go away, and let me alone. You have got one child by my wife; you ought to be satisfied;" that he went on up the street, and when about 75 yards away heard a pistol shot from the direction where he left the two men standing; that this was between 9:30 and 10 o'clock at night. The state introduced testimony of an unlawful intimacy between defendant and the wife of John Orr. The state introduced testimony of threats made by defendant against deceased in the November preceding the killing in March. The defendant offered to prove that he gave himself up when he heard there was a warrant for him, but this evidence was excluded. The evidence introduced for the defendant tended to prove an alibi. There was also evidence introduced by the defendant to prove his good character. John Lewis, as a witness for defendant, testified that he knew the witness Robinson, and that on March 14th he was with him at Hood's elevator from about 6 o'clock in the afternoon till about 10 o'clock at night, when he closed up the elevator, and they went down the street, and separated about 10:30 or 11 o'clock. The court refused to give the following written charges, requested by defendant: (1) "Gentlemen, I charge you that, no matter how strong the circumstances may be in this case, if, under all the evidence, you believe the defendant might not have committed the crime, then you must find him not guilty." (2) "Gentlemen, I charge you that if the defendant has proven a good character, that you may consider it, and, if it generates a doubt in your mind apart from all the other evidence in his favor, then you must find the defendant not guilty." (3) "Gentlemen, if the testimony of the witness William Robinson is directly contradicted by the witness John Lewis, and you cannot reconcile their testimony, then you may reject either; but you cannot reject the testimony of a witness capriciously, and the burden of proof being upon the state, if all the other evidence is in equipoise, you must find the defendant not guilty." (4) "Gentlemen, it is not necessary that the evidence in support of an alibi should cover every moment of time in which the offense was committed. It is only necessary to create a reasonable doubt that the defendant was there, and if, under all the evidence, there is any reasonable probability that the defendant was not present when John Orr was killed, then you must find him not guilty." Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COLEMAN, J. The defendant was tried for the unlawful killing of John Orr, and convicted of murder in the second degree.

Evidence of threats made by the defendant against the deceased previous to the killing was admissible against him. The weight to be given such evidence depends more or less on the character of the threats, the length of time intervening, and the attending circumstances. Griffin v. State, 90 Ala. 599, 8 South. Rep. 670; Long v. State, 86 Ala. 43, 5 South. Rep. 443; Barnes v. State, 88 Ala. 204, 7 South. Rep. 38; Evans v. State, 62 Ala. 6.

It was competent to show that unlawful intimate relations existed between the defendant and the wife of the deceased, and this could be shown by the acts of the parties, and, so far as the defendant is concerned, his voluntary statements to that effect were admissible against him. Such relations are evidence of motive. Marler v. State, 67 Ala. 55, 68 Ala. 584; Johnson v. State, 17 Ala. 618; Hall v. State, 40 Ala. 698.

It is permissible for the state to introduce evidence of flight on the part of the defendant after the commission of the offense, but the refusal of the defendant to flee, there being no evidence of flight offered by the state, is not admissible for him, as tending to establish his innocence. The admission of such evidence would be to allow him to make testimony for himself. Jordan v. State, 81 Ala. 31, 1 South. Rep. 577; Chamblee v. State, 78 Ala. 466; Oliver v. State, 17 Ala. 587.

In criminal cases the law only requires that the jury shall be satisfied of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. The state is not required by its proof to exclude possibilities, or establish the defendant's guilt beyond all doubt. Evidence of good character must be considered with the other evidence in the case, and if, upon the whole evidence, including that of good character, the jury are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt, it is their duty to convict. When the law says that good character alone may be sufficient to generate a doubt, it does not mean that it may be considered independent of the other evidence in the case, but in connection with it. Williams v. State, 52 Ala. 413. The first and second charges asked by defendant were properly refused.

The third charge requested was also properly refused. Although the testimony of the witnesses William Robinson and John Lewis may have been irreconcilable, there may have been other evidence in the case so bearing upon their testimony as to satisfy the jury of the credibility of the one or the other of these witnesses. The charge is argumentative also.

When the defense is that of an alibi, the law casts the burden upon the defendant to reasonably satisfy the jury that he was elsewhere at the time of the commission of the offense. Pellum v. State, 89 Ala. 32, 8 South. Rep. 83. This rule of law, as applicable to the defense of an alibi, does not require of the defendant to reasonably satisfy the jury of his exact whereabouts every moment of the time necessary to cover the period when the offense was committed, but he is required to prove such a state of facts or circumstances as to reasonably satisfy the jury that he was elsewhere than at the place where and at the moment when the offense was committed. 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 454, 455; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. §§ 1066, 1067; Pellum v. State, 89 Ala., 8 South. Rep., supra; Allbritton v. State, (Ala.) 10 South. Rep. 426.

The first part of the charge requested in reference to the alibi was objectionable, for the reason that it was calculated to mislead. The jury might have inferred from the charge that the alibi was sufficiently established, although the testimony adduced in support of it did not reasonably satisfy the jury that he was elsewhere when the offense was committed. A case will not be reversed for refusing a charge which calls for an explanation. We lay down the true rule to be that proof adduced to support an alibi should be considered by the jury with the other evidence in the case; and if, upon the whole evidence, there is a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, he should be acquitted. Affirmed.

(94 Ala. 35)

JOHNSTON v STATE.

COURTS—TERM-TIME — SERVING COPY OF INDICTMENT — JURY — HOMICIDE — EVIDENCE — DYING DECLARATIONS—INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—SENTENCE FOR MISDEMEANOR—REMARKS OF JUDGE.

1. The act fixing the time when the courts composing the ninth judicial circuit should be held declares, "in the county of Cherokee on the second Monday in January and July," and, after fixing the time for each county, provides "that this act shall not take effect until after the spring terms of said courts are held for the year 1891. Approved February 14, 1891." Held, that the term of the circuit court in Cherokee county which began the second Monday in July, 1891, was authorized by the act of February 14th, as the spring term of the court had expired in April following the adoption of such act.

2. Under Code, § 4449, it is sufficient to serve a copy of the indictment and venire on a defendant in person, "or on counsel appearing for him."

3. Where it appeared that a certain person was summoned as a regular juror for the week, but did not attend, that the regular jury had been impaneled without him, and that his name was on the venire, a copy of which was served on defendant's counsel, it was not error for the court to order another name to be drawn, on such juror failing to answer to his name when called.

4. Where a person is charged with having unlawfully killed his wife, evidence of his unlawful relations with another woman are admissible, as tending to show motive.

5. In a criminal action, evidence on the part of a defendant that he offered to surrender to a sheriff or refused to flee is inadmissible.

6. It is not proper to ask one witness if another witness who had testified to certain language used by defendant was not mistaken in his statement, as he should have been asked to give his recollection of the language used.

7. In objecting to the exclusion of a question, defendant's counsel stated to the court that the supreme court of the state had decided that such questions were admissible, to which the court replied, "Let them decide it again." Held, that the remark of the court simply implied a doubt as to the correctness of counsel's recollection as to the ruling of the supreme court, and that, as the court withdrew the remark, defendant was not prejudiced.

8. On a murder trial, a statement of deceased was inadmissible as a dying declaration, where it was not previously shown how long it was after the shooting before the declaration was made.

9. It is not necessary, to constitute the offense of involuntary manslaughter, that defendant should have intentionally pointed a pistol at deceased, as it is sufficient if he intentionally pointed the pistol, though he supposed it was not loaded, at another, and it went off and killed deceased; for Acts 1888–89, p. 67, make it an offense to point a pistol, whether loaded or not, at any person.

10. On a murder trial it was not error for the court to refuse to charge "that, if the jury believe from the evidence that defendant is a man of good moral character, then that itself may generate a doubt, although none otherwise exists," as such charge would tend to mislead.

11. The judgment of the court that defendant, convicted of a misdemeanor, perform hard labor for the county for 15 months and pay the costs of the prosecution, will be corrected on appeal, as the limit in cases of misdemeanor is 8 months.

Appeal from circuit court, Cherokee county; JOHN B. TALLY, Judge.

Robert W. Johnston was indicted for murder in the first degree, and from a conviction of manslaughter appeals. Modified.

On the call of the case in the lower court, the defendant moved to quash the venire, on the ground that he had not been individually served with a copy of the indictment and a list of the jurors summoned as a special venire to try his case, but that the said copy of the indictment and venire was served on his attorney, although he, the defendant, was in jail at the time. The court overruled this motion to quash, and the defendant duly excepted. The evidence for the state tended to show that, while the defendant was cleaning and oiling his pistol, he pointed and snapped it at his little children and his wife, without knowing that it was loaded; and the pistol went off, and the ball struck the said Margaret Johnston, defendant's wife, which wound resulted in her death. Against the objection and exception of defendant, the court allowed the state to prove that the defendant had told a witness "that he had had dealings with a woman by the name of Snow fifty times, he reckoned." The state introduced as witness one Pollard, who testified that one night when the defendant was passing his house with some prisoners his wife asked him when he would be back, to which he replied, "It is none of your G——d——d business." On the cross-examination of one Young as a witness, the defendant asked said witness that, if said Pollard did testify as above set forth, "if he was not mistaken in that statement." The court sustained the state's objection to this question, and the defendant duly excepted. The bill of exceptions then recites: "Defendant's counsel stated to the court that the supreme court of this state had decided that such questions were admissible, to which the court replied, 'Let them decide it again.' To this remark of the court the defendant then and there duly excepted. The court withdrew said remark." There was evidence introduced as to the general good character of the defendant, and also that he and his wife, whom he killed, were upon very good terms, and always seemed to treat each other well and considerately. The court gave its general charge to the jury in writing. The defendant separately excepted to the following portion of the said charge as given: "If the defendant pointed the pistol at his child, believing it was not loaded, and snapped it, and the pistol went off and killed Margaret Johnston, and this occurred in this county some time last January or February, he would be guilty of manslaughter in the second degree." The defendant also separately excepted to that part of the general charge which was as follows: "If this [the shooting of Mrs. Johnston] was done while snapping the pistol at his child, it was unlawful." And the defendant also separately excepted to the expression in the general charge that "if, by accident, Mrs. Johnston was in range, and was shot and killed." The defendant also separately excepted to the refusal of the court to give the following written charges requested by him: (1) "Unless the jury find from all the testimony that the defendant intentionally pointed the pistol at his wife when he shot her, then the jury must find the defendant not guilty." (2) "That if the jury believe from the evidence that defendant is shown to be a man of good character, then that itself may generate a doubt, although none otherwise exists." (3) "Unless the jury believe from all the evidence that the defendant pointed the pistol at his wife intentionally, then they cannot find him guilty."

J. L. Burnett, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COLEMAN, J. It is argued that the court at which the defendant was tried was held at a time not authorized by law. The court began on the 2d Monday of July, 1891. The act fixing the time when the courts composing the ninth judicial circuit should be held declares as follows: "(1) In the county of Cherokee on the second Monday in January and July, and at each term may continue three weeks." After fixing the time for each county, the act provides "that this act shall not take effect until after the spring terms of said courts are held for the year 1891. Approved February 14, 1891." When this act was approved the courts were then being held in the ninth judicial circuit, under the law in force as fixed by the Code, and by virtue of its provisions the last court held in this circuit began on the ninth Mondays after the fourth Mondays in January and July, and might continue for four weeks. Code, § 749. The last court to be held in this circuit under the law as fixed by the Code, and then in force, would expire some time in April following the adoption of the act of February 14, 1891. It was the purpose of the legislature that these terms should not be interfered with or affected by the new order or arrangements, and to accomplish this result it was provided that the later act should not take effect until after those terms had been completed. We think there is nothing in this objection.

Under section 4449 of the Code, it is sufficient to serve a copy of the indictment and venire upon the defendant in person or counsel appearing for him. Reese v. State, 90 Ala. 626, 8 South. Rep. 818. The name of John A. Kennedy was drawn from the hat as a juror in the case. The record shows that John A. Kennedy had been summoned as a regular juror for the week, but did not attend, and the regular jury had been impaneled without him. His name was on the venire, a copy of which had been served upon the defendant's counsel. The rule requires that, when the day fixed for the trial of one charged with a capital offense is a day of the week in which the order setting a day for the trial is made, the copy served upon the defendants shall include the names of those in attendance and impaneled as regular jurors for the week; but, when the day fixed for the trial is a day of a week succeeding the week in which the order is made, the list of jurors to be served upon the defendant must include the names of the jurors summoned to serve as regular jurors for that week. Shelton v. State, 73 Ala. 5; Posey v. State, Id. 490; Floyd v. State, 55 Ala. 61. The juror Kennedy failing to answer, the court, against the objection of the defendant, ordered the drawing from the hat to proceed. The defendant at the trial assigned no grounds for his objection, and now insists that the court should have ordered another juror summoned to supply his place. The case is not covered by section 4322 of the Code, where this course is prescribed by statute. There was no mistake in the name of the juror John A. Kennedy. It was simply the case of a juror who had been summoned and failed to attend. The principle applying here was decided in Hall v. State, 51 Ala. 13. In the latter case, a juror failing to answer to his name when drawn, the court ordered another name to be drawn, and it was held to be without error. See, also, Johnson v. State, 47 Ala. 34. The reasons for the rule are there stated. There is nothing in the objection that the name W. F. Roberts appeared in the list served upon defendant's counsel when the correct name was W. L. Roberts. It was the duty of the trial court to examine the original and copy, and determine whether the copy was correct. That was done in the present case. The record shows that the copy served contained the name of W. L. Roberts, and from an inspection of the original sent up to this court, but which was unnecessary, our conclusion coincides with the trial court.

When a person is charged with having unlawfully killed his wife, it is permissible to prove unlawful relations with another woman. It is evidence tending to show motive.

It is not permissible for a defendant to make evidence for himself by showing that he offered to surrender to the sheriff or refused to flee. On these propositions see Pate v. State, 10 South. Rep. 665, (present term,) and authorities cited.

It is not proper to ask one witness if another witness who had testified as to certain language used by the defendant was not mistaken in his statement. The witness thus interrogated should give his recollection of the language used. It is the province of the jury to draw the conclusion in such cases.

We understand the remark of the court to which exception was reserved as simply implying a doubt as to the correctness of counsel's recollection, in the statement made, as to the ruling of the supreme court. The court withdrew the remark, and we are unable to perceive how injury resulted to defendant.

No predicate was laid for the introduction of the statement by the deceased as a dying declaration, and it was not shown how long after the shooting before the declaration was made. Acts and declarations, to be admissible under the principle of res gestæ, must be substantially contemporaneous with the main fact under consideration, and so closely connected with it as to illustrate its character.

Fonville v. State, 91 Ala. 42, 8 South. Rep. 688. The declarations were not admissible for any purpose.

Our statute divides manslaughter into two degrees, as follows: "Manslaughter by voluntarily depriving a human being of life is manslaughter in the first degree, and manslaughter committed under any other circumstance is manslaughter in the second degree." Code, § 3781. "Involuntary manslaughter" has been defined to be the unlawful killing of a human being without malice, either expressed or implied, and without intent to kill or inflict the injury causing death, committed accidentally in the commission of some unlawful act not felonious, or in the improper or negligent performance of an act lawful in itself. 6 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 588. If an act be done unlawful in itself, but without mischievous intention, and the act was done heedlessly and incautiously, it will be manslaughter, not accidental death, because the act which ensued was unlawful. Roscoe, Crim. Ev. § 721. Misadventure, says Blackstone, happens in consequence of a lawful act; involuntary manslaughter, in consequence of an unlawful act. 4 Bl. Comm. § 192. A. whips a horse on which B. is riding; whereupon the horse springs out, and runs over a child and kills it; this is manslaughter in A., but misadventure in B. 1 East, P. C. 255. Manslaughter in the second degree is when the homicide results from the commission of a misdemeanor or civil tort, but which result was not intended or contemplated. Mitchell v. State, 60 Ala. 33.

By act of the legislature, the pointing of a gun or pistol or other fire-arm at another, whether loaded or unloaded, is made an offense. Acts 1888-89, p. 67. There is evidence—that of the witness Wilson—which tended to show that the defendant was snapping his pistol at a child when it went off, and killed deceased. The charge of the court upon this phase of the evidence was neither abstract nor erroneous. It was not necessary that the defendant should have intentionally pointed the pistol at the deceased to constitute the offense. If he intentionally pointed it at the child, and while doing this unlawful act it went off and killed deceased, although he may have supposed it was not loaded, he was guilty, at least, of involuntary manslaughter. The killing was not a misadventure.

Good character may generate a doubt in cases where, without such proof, the jury would be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt. But the jury are not authorized to consider the proof of good character, independent of the other evidence in the case. It is taken into consideration with all the evidence, weighed with it, and if, upon the whole evidence, the jury entertain no reasonable doubt of guilt, they must convict. The manner of expression used in the charge requested was calculated to convey to the jury that they might consider the proof of good character by itself, or independent of the other evidence, and, when separately considered, might generate a doubt. We have but recently condemned a somewhat similar charge in the case of Pate v. State, (present term,) 10 South. Rep. 665, and it is liable to the same objection as the charge criticised in Williams v. State, 52 Ala. 412. We have examined the exceptions to the general charge of the court and each assignment of error, and find no reversible error in the record. The judgment of the court that the defendant perform hard labor for the county for a term of 15 months, to pay the cost of the prosecution, was erroneous. Eight months is the limit, in cases of misdemeanor, for which a person may be sentenced to pay cost. The judgment will be here corrected in this respect, and as thus corrected is affirmed. Bradley v. State, 69 Ala. 318. Affirmed.

OWENS et al. v. STATE.

ADULTERY—EVIDENCE.

1. On a prosecution of a man and woman for adultery, evidence of the previous marriage of the woman to another man is admissible.

2. Such previous marriage may be proved, as against the woman, by the declarations and admissions of the alleged former husband and the woman.

3. Though the evidence may show that defendants are guilty of bigamy, that does not bar a conviction for adultery.

4. Where defendants are charged with living together in a state of adultery or fornication, and the evidence shows that they cohabited some time before they were married, it is not error to refuse to charge that defendants cannot be convicted unless the jury find that the woman was previously married to another man.

5. The fact that defendants believed that one of them—the woman—was not in fact married to the alleged former husband, is no defense to the charge of adultery, if the woman was in fact so married.

Appeal from circuit court, Escambia county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Joe Owens and Prudence Owens were convicted on the charge of living together in adultery or fornication. The court charged the jury as follows: "Although the facts in this case might show the offense of bigamy by the defendant Prudence, you can find her guilty of adultery, if you believe beyond a reasonable doubt that she is guilty of adultery. This is not a case where the misdemeanor is merged in the felony, even if you should believe she was guilty of bigamy." The court refused the following charges, requested by defendants: "(1) Before the jury can find the defendants guilty in this case, they must find beyond all reasonable doubt, from the evidence, that the defendant Prudence Owens was married to the man Beatty. A mere adulterous intercourse with him, no matter for how long continued, will not be sufficient. (2) The court charges the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that it was understood by the defendants that Beatty and the defendant Prudence were not in fact married, they must find for the defendants." Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Davidson & McGowan, for appellants. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. The defendants, Joe Owens and Prudence Beatty, were convicted on the charge of living together in a state of adultery or fornication. The cohabitation was not denied, but the defendants claimed that they had been duly married. There was evidence tending to show that at the time of their alleged marriage the female defendant was the wife of one Beatty. Evidence was admitted without objection to show that the defendant Prudence and the man Beatty lived in the same house as husband and wife, treated each other as husband and wife, and so called each other. Against the objection of the defendants a witness was permitted to state that while the defendant Prudence and the man Beatty lived together a child who lived with them called the man Beatty father, and that the man Beatty called the defendant Prudence his wife. This evidence was admissible against the defendant Prudence. Marriage may be proved by the admissions and declarations of the parties; and the man's recognition of himself as the parent of the woman's child, and the fact that he allows the child to call him father, are circumstances tending to show marriage. Williams v. State, 54 Ala. 131; Green v. State, 59 Ala. 69; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 462. This evidence being admissible against one of the defendants, the other defendant was not entitled to have it entirely excluded. The remedy of the defendant Owens, to prevent the use of this evidence against him, was to ask instructions limiting its effect, so as to confine its influence to his co-defendant, against whom alone it was admissible. Williams v. State, 81 Ala. 1, 1 South. Rep. 179; Alsabrooks v. State, 52 Ala. 24.

The offense of bigamy is complete when the second marriage is complete, without proof of subsequent cohabitation. Beggs v. State, 55 Ala. 108. The offense of adultery is not necessarily involved in bigamy, and there may be a prosecution for living together in a state of adultery, although the parties may also be guilty of bigamy. There was no error in the charge of the court on this subject.

The first charge requested by the defendants was properly refused. There was evidence tending to show that they lived together in a state of fornication before their alleged marriage. It was not necessary to prove adultery to support the indictment. If there had been no evidence that the defendants cohabited together before formal marriage, it would have been necessary to show the invalidity of that marriage.

If the defendant Prudence and the man Beatty were in fact married, the understanding of the defendants to the contrary would not relieve their cohabitation of its adulterous character. This consideration discloses the incorrectness of the second charge requested by the defendants. Affirmed.

MOODY v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LIBEL—INDICTMENT.

Under Code, § 3771, providing that any person who publishes a libel of another, which tends to provoke a breach of the peace, shall be guilty of a criminal offense, an indictment for criminal libel, which fails to charge that the libel tended to provoke a breach of the peace, is insufficient.

Appeal from city court of Mobile; O. J. SEMMES, Judge.

John J. Moody was indicted and convicted of criminal libel, and appeals. Reversed.

Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. Mr. Wharton, in discussing the offense of libel under the common law, says: "Whatever, if made the subject of civil action, would be considered libelous without laying special damage, is indictable in a criminal court." 2 Whart. Crim. Law, (9th Ed.) 1598. Another standard text-writer on criminal law thus defines the offense of libel: "It is any representation in writing, or by pictures, effigies, or the like, calculated to create disturbances of the peace, to corrupt the public morals, or to lead to any act which, when done, is indictable." 2 Bish. Crim. Law, (7th Ed.) § 907. Again, it is stated in a recent commentary on the subject that "any publication which has a tendency to disturb the public peace or good order of society is a libel by the common law, and is indictable as such." Newell, Defam. 937. In a civil action for damages this court has given the following definition of libel: "Generally, any false and malicious publication, when expressed in writing or printing, or by signs or pictures, is a libel, which charges an offense punishable by indictment, or which tends to bring an individual into public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or charges an act odious and disgraceful in society. This general definition may be said to include whatever tends to injure the character of an individual, or blacken his reputation, or imputes fraud, dishonesty, or other moral turpitude, or reflects shame, or tends to put him without the pale of social intercourse." Publishing Co. v. Crudup, 85 Ala. 519, 5 South. Rep. 332. The above definitions are to be looked to in determining whether a publication is libelous; for, while our Criminal Code provides for the punishment of libel, yet it does not define the offense further than to state the fact or circumstance which renders the libel punishable as a crime. It is clear, however, that the comprehensive definitions of criminal libel under the common law include offenses which are not punishable under our statute. The statute on the subject provides that "any person, who publishes a libel of another which may tend to prove a breach of the peace, must be punished, on conviction," etc. Code Ala. § 3771. This is a general provision prescribing the kind of libel which is to be punished criminally. A publication which is a libel within the definitions above quoted is not within the terms of the statute unless it "may tend to provoke a breach of the peace." That the publication has such a tendency is the fact which renders the libel punishable under the statute. The offense which the statute denounces is not shown unless it is made to appear that the publication is one which may tend to provoke a breach of the peace. An indictment is insufficient when it omits to state this material ingredient of the statutory offense. When the case of Reid v. State, 53 Ala. 402, was decided, the statute, as it now stands, was not in existence. The Revised Code of 1867 was in force at that time. In that Code, as also in the Code of 1876, the section corresponding with section 3771 of the present Code was in the following words: "Any person who publishes a libel of another person, or who sends to another person a threatening or abusive letter, which may tend to provoke a breach of the peace, must be punished, on conviction, by fine and imprisonment in the county jail, or hard labor for the county, the fine not to exceed in any case five hundred dollars, and the imprisonment or hard labor not to exceed six months." Rev. Code 1867, § 3553; Code 1876, § 4106. In the case above cited the court evidently construed the words, "which may tend to provoke a breach of the peace," as having reference to the act of sending a threatening or abusive letter. The clause to which the words quoted had reference in the section as it stood in the former Codes is wholly omitted from section 3771 of the present Code. The language of the section as thus changed makes it perfectly plain that the provision is only for the punishment of libels which may tend to provoke a breach of the peace. The existence of this pernicious tendency is the fact which renders the libel a public offense, and punishable under the statute. An indictment which merely charges the publication of the libel, without stating the one circumstance which the statute makes the test of the criminality of the act, does not show the commission of the particular offense which is denounced by the statute. The indictment in the present case is without any averment as to the tendency of the publication to provoke a breach of the peace. For the lack of such averment the indictment must be pronounced insufficient. We do not regard the provision of section 3772 as dispensing with the necessity of making such averment. That section merely dispenses with the necessity, in charging the libel, of stating extrinsic matter by way of inducement or innuendo. When the law made it a criminal offense merely to publish a libel of another person, it was not necessary to state the tendency of the publication to provoke a breach of the peace. But when, as a result of a change of the statute, the libel is not criminally punishable unless it may tend to provoke a breach of the peace, the existence of such tendency must be charged as a constituent element of the offense. Reversed and remanded.

HOOD v. BLAIR, Sheriff, et al.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 4, 1892.)

SHERIFFS—FAILURE TO EXECUTE PROCESS—MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT—AMENDMENT.

1. Under Code, §§ 3326, 3333, providing that where the sheriff fails to make the money on an execution issued by a justice of the peace, which by due diligence he might have made, a summary judgment for the amount may be rendered against him on motion, and that where the amount exceeds $100 the motion must be made in the circuit court, a motion made in the circuit court for judgment against the sheriff for failing to collect two executions issued by a justice, one for $100 and one for $60, is properly dismissed, as the court has no jurisdiction of the $60 included.

2. It is error to dismiss the motion finally on the ground that the objections suggested by the demurrer cannot be removed by amendment, since the circuit court would have jurisdiction of a motion for summary judgment on the $100 execution alone.

Appeal from circuit court, Cherokee county; JOHN B. TALLY, Judge.

Motion by S. M. Hood against John S. Blair, sheriff, and the sureties on his official bond, for summary judgment for $100 and $60, the amounts of two judgments recovered by movant before a justice of the peace, and executions for which were placed in Blair's hands. A demurrer to the motion was sustained, and the motion was dismissed; the court reciting in its order that the objections raised by the demurrer could not be cured by amendment. Petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Walden & Son, for appellant. Burnett, Cardon & Daniel, for appellees.

WALKER, J. A summary judgment may be rendered against a sheriff for failing to make the money on an execution issued by a justice of the peace, which by due diligence might have been made, for the amount of the execution and interest, and 5 per cent. damages on the amount thereof; and the motion must be made in the circuit court when the amount claimed, by reason of interest or damages, exceeds the sum of $100. Code, §§ 3326, 3333. Under former statutes, such judgments could not be rendered against sheriffs for any negligence or misfeasance on their part in levying process issued by, and returnable before, justices of the peace. Thompson v. Acree, 69 Ala. 178. The motion in this case disclosed a state of facts authorizing a summary judgment against the sheriff for failing to make the money on the execution issued on the judgment for $100. The circuit court was without jurisdiction to render such judgment for the failure to make the money on the execution on the judgment for $60. That matter presented a case for a summary judgment by a justice of the peace. The motion, as made, presents two separate and distinct causes of action, which could not be joined, and as to one of which the circuit court was without jurisdiction. The demurrer to the motion upon this and other grounds was properly sustained. But the motion could have been amended so as to cure its defects.

The circuit court erred in adjudging that the objections suggested by the demurrers could not be removed by amendment, and in dismissing the motion on that ground. A mere failure by the court to tender an opportunity to amend before dismissing the motion would not be reversible error, in the absence of any showing that the right to amend was denied. Mohon v. Tatum, 69 Ala. 466. In such case, it is not made to appear that the appellant was denied a privilege to which he was entitled. There is simply a failure to show that the question as to the existence of the right was raised in the lower court. When, however, this right is expressly denied by the court, and the motion is dismissed on this ground, it sufficiently appears that the appellant was deprived of a valuable right, and this error to his injury entitles him to a reversal. Reversed and remanded.

MEMPHIS & C. R. CO. v. JOBE.

ACCIDENT AT RAILROAD CROSSING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a railroad company for injuries to plaintiff, caused at a crossing by a train running at an unlawful speed, where the principal question is as to plaintiff's contributory negligence, it is error to charge that plaintiff, though guilty of negligence, can recover, "unless this negligence was in whole or in part the cause of the injury."

Appeal from circuit court, Alcorn county.

Action by M. J. Jobe against the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company for personal injuries. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

The injuries were alleged to have been received in a collision with one of the railroad trains, while plaintiff was crossing the track of the railroad in the city of Corinth, and when the train was running at a greater rate of speed than six miles an hour. The damages were laid at $10,000. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and several special pleas setting up the contributory negligence of Jobe at the time of the collision. Issue was joined on the special pleas. Plaintiff, at the time of the injury, was a stout and active man. He was in the habit of crossing the railroad at the point where he was injured. On the occasion of his injury he undertook to cross it when he knew the train was due. He was driving two horses, gentle, and at one time good, but then broken down and poor. The harness was plow gear, with no breeching to enable the horses to hold back. There was a descent towards the track from the direction Jobe was driving. Before going down the descent, Jobe stopped his team long enough to look and listen, and, not seeing or hearing any train, proceeded to cross the track, and, as he says: "I looked up the railroad, and then down it, and before I knew it my horses' heads were somewhere about the track," and the train then came along so rapidly that "it bolted right on me before I saw it." Jobe says he never heard the train, though there was evidence for the defendant to the effect that appellant's trains could be both seen and heard from the point at which Jobe stopped before attempting to cross the track.

Mayes & Harris and Inge & Burge, for appellant. Pitts & Meeks and J. M. Boone, for appellee.

COOPER, J. This case is another illustration of the danger of unnecessarily multiplying instructions. On this appeal we are confined to the consideration of the errors appearing in the instructions for the plaintiff, but we suggest that on the next trial counsel for both parties may, with full justice to the issue involved, reduce the number of charges requested. Several of the instructions of the plaintiff are subject to just criticism, but the voluminous and numerous charges for the defendant have probably cured their defects. But the thirteenth instruction for the plaintiff is erroneous, and is not cured by any other. By that the jury was told that, "although they may believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Jobe, was guilty of negligence in approaching the railroad at the time of the injury, still, unless they further believe from the evidence that this negligence was in whole or in part the cause of the injury, they will find for the plaintiff." There was practically but one question for decision by the jury, which was whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in going upon the track of the defendant in front of a rapidly approaching train, which was confessedly being run at a greater rate of speed than allowed by law within an incorporated town. The whole evidence shows that almost instantly after the plaintiff passed upon the road he was struck by the train. It is impossible to conceive of an absence of causal connection between the negligence of the plaintiff in going on the track (if, in fact, he did negligently go thereon) and the injury he sustained. The whole question was whether he negligently went on the track in front of the train by which he was struck. If he did, that fact, found by the jury, ends the case, for in the nature of things it contributed directly to the injury. It cannot be true, under the uncontroverted circumstances, that the jury could find that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in going on the track, and yet also find that such negligence did not contribute to the injury. This the thirteenth instruction virtually told the jury might be done, and this was erroneous. Judgment reversed.

HYATT v. LESLIE.

ATTACHMENT—CLAIMS OF THIRD PARTIES—EVIDENCE—EX PARTE AFFIDAVIT.

On the trial of a claim interposed by a third party to mules attached, an ex parte affidavit by an employe of the attachment defendant that defendant hired the use of several teams, among which were the mules in controversy, and that defendant told him (the employe) that said mules belonged to said claimant, and directed him to keep their time, was inadmissible.

Appeal from circuit court, Alcorn county.

C. J Hyatt sued out an attachment against one Howard, and the writ was levied on seven mules in the possession of said Howard. M. T. Leslie interposed her claim to the mules, and on the trial of the claimant's issue, over the objection of Hyatt, the court below permitted the claimant to introduce in evidence the affidavit of one Paul, which was, in substance, as follows: That he (Paul) took some mules to said Howard, (who was a contractor,) which had been rented to Howard by one Sadler; that he was, on his arrival, employed by said Howard to look after the stock, and to "keep time" of the teams; that Howard had at that time the seven mules in controversy, and had told him that these mules belonged to appellee, Leslie; that Howard also had a lot of mules belonging to one Jones, had pointed out to affiant the different teams, and directed him (Paul) to "keep their time," so that he (Howard) could settle properly for them; that he had always heard the seven mules were the property of appellee, Leslie, and never heard Howard "lay any claim to them." Verdict and judgment for the claimant. Hyatt appeals. Reversed.

E. S. Candler, Jr., for appellant. J. M. Boone, for appellee.

COOPER, J. It must have been because of some inadvertence on the part of the court that an ex parte affidavit was admitted in evidence. The record, however, discloses the fact that it was objected to by the plaintiff at the time. Upon what principle it was supposed to be competent we are at a loss to imagine. Judgment reversed.

STATE v. McCARTHY. (No. 10,952.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Feb. 8, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

MURDER — CONTINUANCE — JUROR — PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES — OBJECTIONS WAIVED — VENIRE — USE OF AMANUENSIS — INDICTMENT — DATE.

1. The rulings of the trial judge in matters of continuance will not be interfered with, unless manifestly wrong, arbitrary, and glaringly erroneous.

2. The right of peremptory challenge is not the right to select, but to reject, jurors.

3. The objection to a juror that he was a member of the grand jury which presented the indictment comes too late on motion for a new trial. The objection should have been urged when he was examined on his voir dire.

4. When the trial judge has heard the evidence and ruled on the admission of a confession made by defendant, he is not required to make a note of the evidence, to be incorporated in a bill, when the testimony of the witness is of such a character as not to influence his ruling on the points presented in the bill.

5. When the indictment charged that the murder was committed "on or about the 28th December, 1890," the words "on or about" are surplusage. The real date is that which is specifically charged.

6. It is not sufficient to set aside the venire when the clerk of court employs an amanuensis, who acts directly under his supervision, to write the names of jurors on the slips of paper to go into the "general venire-box." In such a case the amanuenis is not an intruder upon the deliberations of the jury commissioners.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. Landry; E. T. LEWIS, Judge.

Indictment against Luma McCarthy for murder. From a judgment on conviction, he appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing refused.

E. P. Veazie, for appellant. W. H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

McENERY, J. The defendant was indicted for murder, convicted, and sentenced to be hung, from which judgment he appeals. There are in the record 14 bills of exceptions.

The rulings of the district judge on the motions for continuance were largely within his discretion. From his statements appended to the several bills, we do not think that he abused the discretion vested in him. It will not be disturbed unless manifestly erroneous. State v. Green, 43 La. Ann. 402, 9 South. Rep. 42; State v. Johnson, 36 La. Ann. 853; State v. Clark, 37 La. Ann. 128; State v. Wilson, 33 La. Ann. 262; State v. Primeaux, 39 La. Ann. 673, 2 South. Rep. 423. The several bills to the rejection of jurors may be disposed of by stating that the obnoxious jurors did not serve on the jury which tried the accused. State v. Aarons, 43 La. Ann. 406, 9 South. Rep. 114; 43 La. Ann. 402, 9 South. Rep. 42; State v. Ford, 42 La. Ann. 255, 7 South. Rep. 696; State v. Lewis, 41 La. Ann. 590, 6 South. Rep. 536; State v. Durr, 39 La. Ann. 751, 2 South. Rep. 546; State v. Carries, 39 La. Ann. 931; 3 South. Rep. 56; State v. Ford, 37 La. Ann. 443; State v. Shields, 33 La. Ann. 1410; State v. Cazeau, 8 La. Ann. 109.

The objection to a juror that he was a member of the grand jury which found the bill comes too late on a motion for a new trial. The objection should have been urged when the juror was sworn on his voir dire. State v. Thomas, 35 La. Ann. 24.

Relying upon the doctrine in the Selley Case, 41 La. Ann. 143, 6 South. Rep. 571, the defendant took a bill of exceptions to the ruling of the trial judge, refusing him the privilege of taking down certain statements of a witness relative to the confession of the defendant. This request was made after the witness had testified, and the judge had ruled on the confession, admitting it to go to the jury. The case is not similar to the Selley Case. There is no conflict as to the statements of the judge and the defendant's counsel as to what the witness had sworn to. The trial judge emphatically states that the confession was free and voluntary, and that "there was not the slightest evidence to show that any inducements or threats were held out to the accused, or to show that the accused was in a state of mania superinduced by intoxication." While adhering to the doctrine in the Selley Case, we are not disposed to so extend it as to absolutely interfere with the trial judge in matters addressed to his sound discretion, and to require him, after he has heard the evidence and ruled on the confession, to make a note of the testimony of a witness who did not state any fact relating to the matter complained of in the bill. The ruling on this bill applies to No. 11.

The motion in arrest of judgment alleges that the indictment is fatally defective in substance, in charging the murder to have been committed on or about 28th December, 1890. The words "on or about" are surplusage. The real date is that which is specified. Time is not the essence of the offense here charged, and the time, therefore, stated in the indictment is immaterial as to exact date, if it be charged before finding of indictment. Whart. Crim. Law, § 267; State v. Williams, 30 La. Ann. 843; State v. Walters, 16 La. Ann. 401.

Bill No. 1 is presented with great force, and we have given the utmost consideration to the able argument of defendant's counsel. The defendant, on the first day of the term, filed a motion to quash the indictment, charging that the jury commissioners, in drawing the jury, disregarded the provisions of Act 44 of 1877. The complaint is that one Raoul Pavy, a minor, who was sometimes employed in the clerk's office, wrote the names and residences of some of the jurors on the slips of paper which were to be placed in the "general venire-box." If this fact stood alone and unexplained the case would be brought within the ruling of State v. Taylor, 43 La. Ann. —, 10 South. Rep. 203. In this case, we said: "The clerk omitted to perform the duties specially assigned under the act, and the box was not of that kind provided with lock and key, as the law directs; but these are irregularities only, and it was not shown that they were done for the purpose of injuring the defendant, or with any fraudulent intent, or that some great wrong had been done him. It is essential to show these facts in order to set aside the indictment for such irregularities as are alleged." We held in the case that the irregularities embraced within the meaning of section 10 of the act referred to those committed by the commission, and that when a person not a commissioner intruded himself upon their deliberations, and did acts which it was the duty of the commission to perform, these were not acts of the commissioners, but of one who had no authority to perform them, and therefore null and void. The ruling of the trial judge may well stand without impugning the decision in the Taylor Case. In the latter case, there was nothing to explain or qualify the act of the third person who performed the duty assigned to the clerk, and who, for aught that appears, acted independently and without control or supervision. But here the judge's statement in the bill says: "The evidence shows that the writing of the names on the tickets was done under the immediate supervision and direction of the clerk and jury commissioners in the clerk's office, and by an amanuensis in the regular employ of the clerk." If, as thus appears, the writing was done under the eye and direction of the clerk, by one acting merely as his amanuensis, it would be extending strictness beyond reason to hold that the venire was thereby vitiated. Under such a holding, if the clerk were temporarily disabled from writing by a wound or other injury to his hand, a venire could not be drawn, and the machinery of justice would be stopped. In the Taylor Case, we were careful to state that the omission of duties by the clerk specially assigned to him under the act were irregularities only, and embraced within the meaning of section 10 of Act 44 of 1877. Proof, therefore, of injury and fraudulent intent must be proved, in order to affect the venire. In the case at bar the amanuensis did not intrude himself upon the deliberations of the commission. He was present with full knowledge of the commissioners, and acted directly under the supervision and control of the commission, doing only an act which, in effect, was the act of the clerk of court. His act was therefore the act of the commissioners, and, if irregular, must be treated as an irregularity imputable to the commission. Judgment affirmed.

GODCHAUX v. BAUMANN. (No. 10,942.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Jan. 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

FIXING CAUSE—PRACTICE ON APPEAL—EJECTMENT AGAINST TENANT—SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS—NOTICE TO QUIT—TACIT RENEWAL—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT.

ON APPLICATION TO FIX CAUSE.

Sections 2156 and 2163 of the Revised Statutes, so far as they apply to the fixing of causes in this court, together with all other statutes on the same subject-matter, were repealed by Act No. 70 of 1884, but, considering that suits to recover possession of leased premises are entitled to speedy trial, in the exercise of the discretion vested in this court the order to fix by preference after three days' notice is granted.

ON THE MERITS.

1. The proceedings to eject a tenant are summary.

2. At the expiration of the lease the statute provides 15 days' notice to the tenant to remove.

3. Upon his failure to comply, suit may be brought, and the defendant notified by citation to appear and defend after three days.

4. The jurisdiction must be tested by the pecuniary amount in dispute, as shown by the pleadings, and as appearing from the nature of the action.

5. It may be shown on the trial, if admissible by the nature of the action, that the amount involved is within the court's jurisdiction.

6. Plaintiff had the right to ejectment proceedings against the tenant of his property after 15 days' notice upon the expiration of the lease.

7. No plea of tacit renewal for another month having been presented, the lease will not be presumed to have been continued or tacitly renewed, (reconducted.)

ON APPLICATION TO FIX CAUSE.

FENNER, J. This is a suit by a landlord to recover possession of leased premises, and an application is made to fix the same by preference after three days' notice under the provisions of sections 2156 and 2163 of the Revised Statutes. These sections of the Revised Statutes, together with all other statutes regulating the order of trial of appeals in this court, were repealed, so far as they apply to appeals in this court, by act No. 70 of 1884, which vests this court with full authority "to regulate the trial of causes before it, and to change existing rules, as, in their opinion, may be deemed advisable for a better administration of justice," and which repeals "all laws on this subject-matter, and all laws in conflict herewith." In the exercise, however, of the discretion thus vested in us, we consider that the policy of the law and the better administration of justice require a speedy trial of causes such as this, and on that ground we grant the order prayed for. Order granted.

ON THE MERITS.

BREAUX, J. The plaintiff claims from the defendant possession of the premises No. 91 Canal street. He bought the property on the 25th June, 1891, and alleges that at the time the defendant claimed to be a lessee of the property under verbal lease from plaintiff's author. He alleged a second lease, which expired on the 8th of October, 1891, and that he gave notice to defendant lessee to remove from the leased premises within 15 days. The time having elapsed, suit was brought, and the defendant was cited to answer the petition within three days, in compliance with the judge's order. The defendant filed an exception to the order of the court requiring him to answer within three days, and fixing the cause for trial on 2d November, 1891. He also excepted to the jurisdiction of the court; alleged that the petition disclosed no cause of action, and is vague. The court, under the authority of State v. Judge, 37 La. Ann. 843, ruled that all the defenses relied on, whether exceptions or merits, must be pleaded at one time, but gave to defendant's counsel opportunity to file further defense in addition to the exception filed. None other was offered. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, condemning the defendant to deliver possession of the premises. Ejectment proceedings to eject a lessee are summary. The statute provides that on the termination of the lease, to repossess his estate the lessor shall give his tenant notice to remove, and allow him the time granted by law for such removal. If the tenant shall refuse to comply after the expiration of the delay, the lessor may cite him, whenever the monthly rent exceeds the sum of $100, to appear before the district court, in order to be there condemned to deliver possession of the leased premises. On proof of these facts, the court may give judgment ordering the delivery of possession. The case is always to be tried by preference, when applied for. An appeal does not suspend execution unless the defendant has filed a special defense, supported by his oath. "The statute specifically requires that these proceedings of a landlord against his tenant be summary." State v. Judge, 37 La. Ann. 844. Article 756, Code Prac., gives to the court a discretion in relation to the trial of summary cases, with which the appellate court will not interfere. Police Jury v. Manning, 16 La. Ann. 182. The ejectment of a tenant must be tried summarily. Pesant v. Heartt, 22 La. Ann. 293. The court had the authority, in compliance with its rule relating to the trial of summary cases, to require the defendant to file all his pleas with his answer.

With reference to the citation to answer within three days. The proceedings being summary, the statute limiting the notice to three days applies to the citation, i. e., to the notice by citation, and excludes these summary cases from the delay applying to the ordinary action by petition and citation. If the time be not limited to three days to answer, cases made summary would be subject to greater delays than ordinary cases. There was no necessity of a statute to secure the speedy trial of summary cases. If the notice of the statute did not refer to the citation, and applied to the setting of the case, it was purposeless, and did not secure any right. "We are bound to presume that the law is useful, and construe it with reference to some use." Domat.

Relative to the court's jurisdiction. The monthly or yearly rental is the test of the court's jurisdiction. The lease expired September 30, 1891. The rental was $4,000 per annum. The defendant contends that, as it was not the value of the property, but the annual or monthly rent, which gives jurisdiction, and as the petition does not allege the amount of the rent, the court was without jurisdiction. Plaintiff declared on a lease, the amount of which shows the court had jurisdiction. If the jurisdictional amount was not sufficiently expressed in the petition, it has been made ample by the act of lease offered to meet the plea to the jurisdiction.

On the exception of no cause of action. Plaintiff, in his petition, alleges that he bought the property, at the time under lease; that, the lease having expired, notice to vacate had been given to the tenant. The notice and the return are annexed to the petition. The purchaser became subrogated to the rights of the vendor under the lease. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2733; Walker v. Vanwinkle, 8 Mart. (N. S.) 563. The demands for relief are consistent and conformable to the nature of the remedy. He had the legal right to ejectment proceedings against the tenant of his property, at the expiration of the lease, after 15 days' notice. The defendant contends in argument that, more than one week having elapsed, (the lease expired 30th September, 1891, and notice to vacate was served on the 8th of October following,) the lease was tacitly renewed (reconducted) for another month. Suit to eject the defendant was brought October 26, 1891. The defendant, in his pleadings, has not claimed any rights of renewal. Whatever rights he may have had under article 2689, relative to the presumption of renewal of the lease, are enforceable in accordance with the plea covering them. Act 96 of 1888, in amending section 2155 of the Revised Statutes, as to notice, necessarily amended the Civil Code on the subject,—i. e., article 2686. Upon the expiration of the lease, the notice may be given, and need not precede the period of the lease's duration by 15 days.

The last in the order of the pleas, as presented, is that of vagueness. Full notice was given to the defendant of the grounds of the action. There is a definite issue presented. The defendant could not be taken unawares by the evidence admissible under the pleadings, as the petition was explicit in substantial particulars. The lease was alleged and admitted in evidence under the allegations. The object of the demand, the nature of the title, and the cause of action were stated. There can be no just reason for maintaining that plaintiff's action is vague. Judgment affirmed, at appellant's costs.

Suit by B. Penouilh, tutor, against S. Abraham. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Modified.

E. A. O'Sullivan, for appellant. L. P. Caillouet, for appellee.

MCENERY, J. This case, on substantially the same issues, has been before this court at two terms, and the facts in the case and the law governing them are fully set forth in 42 La. Ann. 326, 7 South. Rep. 533, and 43 La. Ann. 214, 9 South. Rep. 36. In the first case all the defenses urged by the plaintiff in injunction, in the proper interpretation of the agreement therein referred to, except as to the time when the payments should commence, were effectually, and, we had hoped, finally, disposed of. In the last case the plea of res adjudicata, filed by defendants, was overruled, and the case remanded to be tried on its merits. The district judge, in his written opinion, reviewed the history of the case in the several phases of this protracted litigation. He properly concluded that in 43 La. Ann. 214, 9 South. Rep. 37, in referring to what was said in the reasons given for refusing a rehearing in the case reported in 42 La. Ann., 7 South. Rep, we made no suggestion as to the date from which the time granted to the debtor should commence to run. In this case we said: "In the course of our opinion on the application for rehearing we accepted as true the claim that under the agreement the delays granted ran from its date." The language was qualified in the succeeding paragraph, which is copied and commented on in this case. The judge a qua therefore concluded that the only issue before him was as to the time when the delay commenced. Taking it for granted that we had fixed September 12, 1888, as the time from which the delay should commence, the plaintiff, in the order of seizure and sale, alleged this date from which the maturity of the notes should date. The district judge fixed the date January 5, 1889,—the date of the purchase of the mortgaged property by Abraham,—when, as stated in the opinion in 42 La. Ann., 7 South. Rep., the status of the parties was fixed. The agreement fixed no date for the delay. Abraham was to sell to the tutor of the minors their portion of the plantation held in indivision when he should get possession and ownership of the property through the contemplated partition proceedings. The price was the amount of that indebtedness, with costs added. The partition suit was abandoned, and Abraham became the owner of the property through another judicial process. The only means of now executing the agreement is by allowing the time stipulated in it for the tutor to pay the indebtedness of the minors. The delay, therefore, could only commence from the time when Abraham was in a situation to carry out the agreement, when, if the tutor had tendered the money, he would have been able to transfer the property to him. He was in this position on the 5th of January, 1889. When the order of seizure and sale issued, one installment was due. The writ did not, therefore, issue prematurely.

The district judge rendered judgment dissolving the injunction so far as it arrested the seizure and sale of the property on the first installment, which was due, and perpetuated the injunction for the credit installments which had not matured, reserving to the seizing creditor the right to proceed upon the second and third installments at the proper time and in proper form. A special mortgage creditor, whose claim is payable in installments, may, on non-payment of any installment, have the property sold to pay the whole debt in cash, for so much as is due, and for the remainder on terms of credit corresponding with the unmatured installments. Code Prac. art. 686. During the pendency of the injunction all of the deferred payments have become due. The defendant in the injunction prays to amend the judgment so as to order the sale to be made for cash to pay all the matured installments. The court, on dissolving an injunction against an order of seizure and sale for the payment in cash for an installment due, and on time for those not due, may order the whole sale to be made for cash if the latter mature pending the injunction. Dwight v. Richard, 5 La. Ann. 365; McCleland v. Bideman, Id. 563; McCalop v. Fluker, 12 La. Ann. 551. All of the installments secured by the mortgage not due at the time the order of seizure and sale issued have matured since the issuing of the injunction. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended so as to dissolve the injunction absolutely, and to order the sale of the property mortgaged for cash to pay the entire mortgage debt and interest, and costs and attorney fees, as stipulated in the act of mortgage. In other respects the judgment is affirmed.

POLICE JURY OF PARISH OF LAFOURCHE et al. v. THIBODAUX BRIDGE CO. (No. 10,969.)

TOLL-BRIDGE ERECTED BY CORPORATION FOR TOWN —EXPIRATION OF FRANCHISE—OWNERSHIP.

1. Where a corporation builds a bridge for a town and parish jointly, and the exclusive privilege is granted to the corporation to collect toll for a designated number of years, at the end of the franchise, unless there is an express agreement to the contrary, the bridge must be delivered to the parish and town without compensation. The town and parish became the owners of the bridge when it was completed, and the corporation which built it only owned the franchise.

2. The consideration for building the bridge for the political corporation was the franchise granted to the building corporation.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Lafourche; TAYLOR BEATTIE, Judge.

Suit by the police jury of the parish of Lafourche and others against the Thibodaux Bridge Company, in liquidation, to recover possession of a bridge. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and a new judgment entered.

L. P. Caillouet, for appellants. Knobloch & Moore, for appellee.

MCENERY, J. By Act 67 of 1855 the legislature of the state authorized the police jury of Lafourche parish and the town of Thibodaux to construct a bridge across the bayou Lafourche, within the corporate limits of the town of Thibodaux; and the two political corporations were authorized to contract with any person or corporation to build the same, and to grant to the person or corporation constructing the bridge the exclusive right and privilege to collect toll as the police jury or said town might allow for a term not to exceed 20 years. The privilege to collect toll was granted, and the schedule of prices for crossing the bridge fixed. The defendant corporation was organized for the purpose of building the bridge. The company built the bridge. It was destroyed in 1862. From this time to 1867 the town of Thibodaux operated a ferry for its exclusive privilege. In 1866 the police jury of Lafourche and the town of Thibodaux were authorized by legislative act to reconstruct the bridge. The defendant company, under and by virtue of this authority, reconstructed the bridge, with the exclusive privilege to collect toll until 31st December, 1891.

The fifth section of the charter of the defendant company is as follows: "When the period has arrived for the liquidation of the affairs of this corporation, that liquidation shall be conducted by three stockholders, to be elected by a majority of the stockholders in amount, and shall be styled 'Liquidating Commissioners.' It shall be their duty to sell and dispose of the entire property of the corporation (except the bridge, that shall be abandoned to the police jury of this parish, and to the mayor and trustees of the town of Thibodaux) on terms to be fixed by a majority of the stockholders in amount at a general meeting. They shall collect all amounts then due this corporation, and, after paying all its liabilities, divide the net proceeds of sale and collection among its stockholders," etc.

On the 15th of January, 1892, plaintiffs instituted this suit, claiming the right of being put in possession, and without any compensation to defendant, of the bridge in controversy, basing their right on the above-quoted article of the charter of defendant company. The answer of the defendant is that the plaintiffs cannot go into possession without paying defendant for the value of the material and the cost of construction of said bridge, and they pray judgment in reconvention against plaintiffs therefor. The judgment of the district court decrees plaintiffs entitled to the bridge, and awards judgment in favor of defendant in reconvention for $13,500; and plaintiffs appeal therefrom.

The stipulation in the written agreement signed by counsel herein is "that the sole question submitted for decision is whether or not the plaintiffs, under the fifth article of defendant's charter, and the law in such cases made and provided, are entitled to the said bridge and pier without paying or compensating the defendant company therefor;" and it is further stipulated therein that, "in the event of it being held that payment or compensation is due, then the court shall award judgment against the plaintiffs for such sums as the evidence may establish, as being equal to the value of the materials and cost of construction of said bridge and pier." It is admitted that the bridge reverts to plaintiffs, and the question presented is whether they are compelled to pay the defendant corporation for the value of the material and the cost of construction. There was no written contract between the parties. The bridge company having been organized for the special purpose of building and operating the bridge, it seems that the contract was embodied in its charter. In the fifth section of the charter, it is stipulated that the bridge, at the expiration of the life of the company, shall be abandoned to the plaintiffs. The word "abandoned" was used in the sense that the company intended to relinquish and surrender its rights of property in the bridge to the plaintiffs. This is made evident by the fact that in said section 5 of the charter the company, in process of liquidation at the expiration of the charter, provided for the sale of all its property, except the bridge, which was to be abandoned to plaintiffs, and the distribution of the proceeds among the stockholders. No provision whatever is made for the sale of the bridge, and the distribution of the proceeds, thus showing that no proceeds from its sale were ever intended to be realized. In the legislative permission to authorize the plaintiffs to contract for the building of the bridge, there is no power granted to the plaintiffs to buy the bridge. Without this authority, conferred upon the plaintiffs by the legislature of the state, they are without power to purchase the bridge from the defendant corporation. Under the general power conferred by statute to build bridges the local authority may purchase a bridge already constructed along a highway, which it is necessary for the public to use, by private persons or a corporation. But when the structure is of that character that it is intended to bridge a navigable stream, costing a large sum of money, and it is necessary to get legislative permission to build it, the local authority cannot go beyond the power specially conferred by the act of the legislature. In a particular case, where the legislature deems it necessary to grant the power to construct a particular bridge at a designated point, it withdraws the power in the particular case to build the bridge, conferred upon the local subdivision generally to build bridges. The state issues a special mandate to build the bridge according to legislative will at the point located. The bridge constructed by the defendant connected a system of public highways. It continued a highway over a navigable stream. There is no way of vacating or extinguishing the highway except by due course of law. The highway was legally established when the bridge was built. It must remain so, and the defendants at the expiration of their franchise cannot obstruct its public use. The defendant corporation only had a right of franchise in taking tolls. The bridge, when completed, became the property of the plaintiffs. There is no obligation on the part of the plaintiffs to pay for the material and cost of construction, in the absence of an express agreement.

"It has been held that where a canal company built a bridge partly for its own use, and partly for the use of the public, the materials of the bridge, after it had been swept away from the place, and after the abandonment of the canal, belonged to the county, and did not pass to the purchaser of the canal under a decree of foreclosure." Elliott, Roads & S. p. 36. The author above quoted, on page 33, says: "If the corporation, in consideration of the grant of the franchise to gather tolls for a designated period, builds a bridge connecting with a system of public highways, the fair and just intendment is that at the expiration of the time fixed by law the bridge shall remain for the public. Nor is there any injustice in this rule; for those who accept the franchise must know, as a matter of law, that the bridge which once becomes a part of the system of highways, so as to be necessary for the public convenience, must so remain, although the period for reaping profit from it may have expired. It is in truth on this implied condition that such franchises are granted and accepted." In the case of Bridge Corp. v. City of Lowell, 15 Gray, 106, it was held that a bridge might be lawfully taken and appropriated to the use of the public by right of eminent domain, and without compensating the proprietors for the actual value of the bridge as a structure, independent of their franchise, but only for the loss of the franchise.

The consideration for building the bridge was the franchise to collect tolls for a designated number of years. The plaintiffs needed the bridge for the convenience of the public. The defendants agreed to build it for the franchise granted. The bridge, as soon as completed, became the property of the plaintiffs, and, at the termination of their franchise, defendants are compelled to deliver the bridge to plaintiffs. They asserted their duty in their charter when, in the fifth section, they agreed to abandon the bridge to the plaintiffs. The defendants owned the franchise, and not the bridge. They had the use of the bridge during the existence of their franchise, and held it in trust for the public. The defendant corporation, under their charter, stood in the same relation to the public as the plaintiffs would have done had they built the bridge.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided, and reversed; and it is now ordered and decreed that there be judgment for the plaintiffs, decreeing them to be the joint owners of the bridge across Bayou Lafourche built by the Thibodaux Bridge Company, in accordance with the prayer of plaintiffs' petition, and that the liquidating commissioners deliver to the plaintiffs said bridge, with the piers, pilings, and appurtenances belonging to the same, without delay and without cost. And it is further ordered that the reconventional demand of defendants be rejected.

O'CONNER v. ILLINOIS CENT. R. CO. (No. 10,913.)

DANGEROUS PREMISES—DUTY OF OWNER—RIGHTS OF TRESPASSER—CHILDREN—INVITATION.

1. The possessor of lands or tenements is not at liberty to plant in them dangerous instruments, which may seriously injure trespassers; but he is under no duty to keep his premises in a safe condition for others than those whom he invites, and therefore he is not liable to trespassers for injuries they may receive from defects, not amounting to traps, in such premises.

2. If a person allows dangerous implements to be exposed on premises occupied by him, he will be responsible for injury caused thereby to any person entering the premises by his invitation or procurement, express or implied, who is not notified thereof, if he is in the use of due care.

3. The owner of land or other property may properly inclose dangerous machinery upon his own premises, such machinery being an essential industrial factor; and a trespasser who meddles with such machinery cannot recover damages for the injuries his meddlesomeness has brought upon himself.

4. Railroad companies are not placed under the same degree of obligation as to care and diligence to guard against injuries to strangers as they are to those with whom they have contractual relations. To the former their obligation is, upon consideration of humanity and justice, to conform their conduct to the rights of others, and, in the prosecution of their lawful business, to use every reasonable care and precaution to avoid their injury.

5. In so far as children of tender years are concerned, no fault or blame can attach to them for entering upon the premises of another uninvited, for in all cases they may be assumed to have exercised due care; and if, upon so entering, they be injured by dangerous implements of the occupant, the question determinative of the Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; THOMAS C. W. ELLIS, Judge.

Action by Nicholas O'Conner against the Illinois Central Railroad Company to recover damages for injuries to his child. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed. Rehearing refused.

Girault Farrar, for appellant. T. J. Gilloly and Branch K. Miller, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. The father institutes this action for the recovery of $25,000 damages, as compensation for injuries inflicted upon his minor child, which resulted in the amputation of his left leg, causing great pain and suffering. This case was tried by the judge, who found $7,500 for the plaintiff, and defendant has appealed.

Plaintiff's counsel claim that the case made out by the evidence is that the accident happened on a square of ground belonging to the defendant, bounded by Magnolia, Clio, Locust, and Calliope streets, in the city of New Orleans, and which the company used for the storage of old freight-cars of sundry kinds, trucks, and wheels not in service; that, among other things usually stored in the yard, were what are called "coal-dumps," or cars of a peculiar construction, being composed of only two wheels attached together by an axle, and on which is placed a wooden frame-work, which extends fore and aft, and may be seesawed on either side of the axle; that this square is surrounded by a plank, or board fence, "which for years has at all times been full of holes, caused by missing planks," through which the children of the neighborhood would pass in and out in going to and returning from play, and where they frequently resorted, being attracted there by the coal-dumps, on which they would amuse themselves, some riding, while others pushed them along the rails; that, in accordance with the established usage of the neighborhood, plaintiff's child went into the yard, in company with a party of children, to play, and, while riding on one of these coal-dumps, which was pushed along the track by others, he fell off, and was run over by the car, receiving injuries necessitating the amputation of his leg. It will be observed from the foregoing that plaintiff's reliance is solely and exclusively, for proof of defendant's negligence, upon the customary and long-protracted bad condition of its fence inclosing the premises above described, which operated in invitation and inducement to the children of the neighborhood to resort to the dangerous proximity of these coal-dumps to play. This theory is combated by defendant's counsel on the ground that the evidence shows that the employes and agents of the defendant used every reasonable precaution to keep children out of its yards; and that the proximate cause of the accident was the acts of the child's companions and older boys, who accompanied him into the yard,—one of whom was an elder brother. That the whole front of the company's yard fronting on Locust and Clio streets is protected by a close board fence, about seven feet high, except where it is intersected with public streets, through which there are openings, so as to allow cars to be switched across said streets into other and adjoining squares belonging to the company. That on the evening of the 23d of July, 1890, the plaintiff's minor child went into the yard, with a party of little comrades, and commenced playing with the wheels on the defendant's tracks, when the accident happened, and injury resulted, as stated above.

Taking the two statements together, the solitary question of fact mooted seems to be whether the customary bad condition of the defendant's fence was such as to offer inducement to children of the neighborhood to enter their yards for purposes of amusement and play; and, this being determined favorably to plaintiff, the question of law thereon raised is the negligence vel non of defendant under the circumstances related. In this as in kindred cases there are apparently many incompatible statements of fact, which we shall not attempt to traverse in detail, and reconcile, but rest contented with the announcement of our conclusions on this particular question after recapitulating the evidence.

The plaintiff introduced several witnesses residing in the immediate vicinity of the place where the accident happened, and who were supposedly familiar with the defendant's premises from frequent and personal observation; and from their testimony we extract the following synopsis, viz.: One of them testifies that near the corner of Locust and Clio streets there were two or three of the planks broken off of the company's fence at one place, through which he saw persons frequently passing; that it was afterwards repaired by the company's employes, and then broken again; that that was the only opening he saw at that time, there being no openings in the fence on the Clio or Calliope street side. This witness was the gentleman who heard the child's cry of alarm, and ran to his relief, and removed the truck wheel from his broken limb. Another one—a little fellow of 13 years of age, who was one of the companions of the injured boy—confirms the statement of the witness just referred to, and says that it was through this opening they entered the defendant's yard on the evening of the accident. Another speaks of two or three openings in this fence, several months previous to the occurrence; "two or three big openings, and about four little ones; the larger ones being about two feet wide." But there was an opening on the Magnolia-Street side, to allow cars to be switched across the street into the adjoining yards. Another testifies, in a general way, that the fence was "always, [at] one time or another, broke," and that he frequently "passed through the yard for a short cut;" that he passed through the hole in the fence at the corner of Clio and Locust streets. He only refers to one other hole. Another describes the same two holes. Another, one place only, where there was a single plank off. Another speaks of two places; and another of three or four places, where there were planks knocked off. This is a fair summary of plaintiff's testimony on the subject. With regard to the length of time these holes remained continuously open the witnesses differ widely; some stating for a few weeks, and others for one or two years. But, on the contrary, defendant's witnesses, while admitting the existence of holes in the fence, deny that same existed for any considerable length of time, and affirm that the fence was frequently repaired, and as frequently broken down again; and, while admitting that children and boys often congregated in defendant's yard,—climbing over the fence, or passing through the holes,—they were just as repeatedly driven out, and warned against trespassing again. One of the company's employes, a car inspector, states that he has seen boys knock the fence down. Has seen them climb over the fence many a time; and that to keep them out has been a matter of great trouble to him. Has frequently seen the watchman and others drive them out of the yard. He says that he could see no possible way of keeping them out, except by the company detailing a man for that special purpose. Another, the yard foreman, states he has frequently driven the children out of the yard, and just as soon as he was out of sight they would come in again. He says it would "require an army of policemen steadily [employed] to keep them out." He states further "that when the fence was fixed they would get in by way of Magnolia street, where there is a gate, through which the cars pass to and fro, and in and out of the yard. We had locks; and every time they were fixed on the gates they would break them." Another, the night-watchman, states that he has frequently driven children out f the yard, and has himself nailed up the hole in the fence at the corner of Clio and Locust streets. "They keep me busy getting nails all the time, to keep the planks up. Whenever I saw one down, I nailed it up again." Has often seen boys climb that fence, and has thrown them off of it. Another witness, who lives opposite the corner of Clio and Locust streets, states that he has seen the hole in the fence at that place repaired frequently. Saw it open and then closed, and then saw the boys knock it down again. Another witness fully corroborates his statement. The section foreman, whose duty it is to keep the fence in repair, states that he has been engaged in that capacity for 20 years, and during that period of time has resided within a block of defendant's yard; and that he has repeatedly closed the hole in the company's fence at the corner of Clio and Locust streets; and that he closed it once in May, and again in June, prior to the happening of the accident on the 23d of July, 1890. That he had occasion to mend it 10 or 15 times a year, on account of boys knocking it down. Says he would repair it on one day, and go back on the following day and find it down again. Another witness, a master mechanic, says that on the identical evening on which the accident occurred he chased a party of children out of this yard.

On this state of facts, was the defendant guilty of negligence, or did the company's agents and employes exercise due care and caution? It must be borne in mind that the plaintiff is an utter stranger to the railroad company, claiming damages ex delicto, with whom neither the child nor its parent had any contractual, or even quasi contractual, relations at time of the accident. And just here we may with propriety advert to the views entertained by the judge a qua in respect to the testimony, and which grounded his judgment in plaintiff's favor. In recapitulating the evidence he says, among other things: "The grounds are inclosed by board fences, but in those fences were openings, caused by planks being removed, which made entrance into the grounds from the public streets a matter of no difficulty. These openings, at different places, remained unclosed for months preceding the injuries of plaintiff's child." It is proper just here to observe that on this question there is a diversity of opinion among witnesses, but the whole of it has given us an impression just opposite that which our learned brother of the lower court has received. It is true that one of plaintiff's witnesses said in a general way that the fences were "always, [at] one time or another, broke," and that he frequently and customarily "passed through the yard for a short cut;" yet he accompanies this statement with the admission that he passed through the hole at the corner of Locust and Clio streets, and refers to but one other hole in the fence around this particular yard. The proof affirmatively shows that plaintiff's child passed through this hole on the afternoon of the accident. No witness testifies that any child or adult or animal passed through any other hole into the defendant's yard. Defendant's night-watchman testifies that he nailed this hole up frequently. A gentleman who lives opposite that corner, as a witness states that he has frequently seen this particular hole repaired. Saw it open, and then saw it closed again. Saw the boys knock it down. This witness is substantially corroborated by two other witnesses, strangers to the company. In addition the section foreman, who resides a block and a half away, and whose special duty it is to keep this fence in repair, among other things, as a witness, states that he has repeatedly closed this hole; that he closed it once in May, and again in June, of 1890, just prior to the accident on the 23d of July; that he has had occasion to mend it 10 or 15 times a year, on account of the boys knocking it down; that he would repair it one day, and go back on the following day and find it down again. The judge further observes: "That the company knew all these facts, [and] took measures, at times, to mend the broken places, and to drive children from the inclosure, is [a fact] well established, [yet] it did not take the proper measures, nor make the needed repairs," as it did subsequently. But in this regard we are of opinion that it is matter of importance to be considered that two or three witnesses testified that they saw children climb over the fence to get into the yard. One witness says that he pushed little boys off the fence. One of plaintiff's witnesses states that there was an opening on the Magnolia-Street side of the square, to allow the cars to be switched through on the company's tracks; and one of the defendant's witnesses stated that "when the fence was fixed they [the boys] would get in by the way of Magnolia street, where there is a gate through which the cars pass. * * * We had locks, and every time they were fixed on the gates they would break them." It seems to us that it would be rather a difficult question to determine what, under such circumstances, would be "the proper measures" for the railroad company to take; but what is of greater importance for us to determine is whether the means resorted to were sufficient to relieve the company from imputation of negligence. The lower judge evidently did not think the proof of defendant's negligence, in reference to the openings in the fence, sufficient, because he adds another reason altogether for his conclusions, thus: "It was negligence to leave the trucks and dumpers and connected wheels on the tracks, for they were not only exceedingly dangerous, but of a nature to tempt the curiosity and invite the playfulness of children. * * * The defendant's negligence left the dangerous dumpers, wheels, and trucks in close proximity to the streets, in a thickly populated neighborhood, where they could be seen by passers-by, and where they could be easily approached by children. They were not securely inclosed nor locked, but were left exposed, where they could be set in motion by a child." The judge evidently had in mind the cases of Westerfield v. Levis, 43 La. Ann. 64, 9 South. Rep. 52, and Railroad Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, to which he makes reference. But the facts of this case, so far as we have proceeded with the discussion, render them impertinent to the question of the defendant's negligence; and so, also, is the averment of fact that it was negligence of defendant to leave the coal dumps, etc., on its tracks, or in close proximity to the streets; or that they were left exposed and unlocked, if the tracks were inside of an inclosure of sufficient height and strength to keep innocent and unsuspecting children out of their reach. And we think the proof abundantly shows that defendant's fence was adequate for the purpose, so long as it remained unbroken by mischievous persons; and we also think it fully established that the company exercised at least ordinary care to keep it in a safe condition, by making necessary repairs. In so far as the alleged negligence of the defendant in reference to the exposure of the trucks, dumps, and wheels are concerned, we do not understand that plaintiff's petition or briefs rests on such an hypothesis as that; nor could they do so.

The law of this case, as developed by the facts recited, may be briefly stated. It is founded on the law of damages ex delicto, as announced in the Code, which declares that "every act whatever of man that causes damage to another obliges him by whose fault it happened to repair it." Rev. Civil Code, art. 2315. "Every person is responsible for the damages he occasions not merely by his act, but by his negligence, * * * or his want of skill." Id. art. 2316. It is founded on fault or neglect. A distinguished author, in a treatise on Negligence, says: "It is enough to say now that a possessor of lands or tenements is not at liberty * * * to plant in them dangerous instruments which may seriously injure trespassers; but he is under no duty to keep his premises in a safe condition for others than those whom he invites, and therefore he is not liable to trespassers for injuries they may receive from defects, not amounting to traps, in such premises." Whart. Neg. §§ 344, 821. Again he says: "If a person allows a dangerous place to exist in premises occupied by him he will be responsible for injury caused thereby to any other person entering upon the premises by his invitation or procurement, express or implied, and not notified of the danger, if the person injured is in the use of due care." (Our italics.) Id. § 826; citing Coombs v. New Bedford Co., 102 Mass. 572; Id. § 350. To such a case the rule sic utere tuo, etc., applies. With reference to children of tender years, it may be conceded that in all cases they have proceeded with due care; but can it be said that the condition of defendant's fence operated as an "invitation or procurement, express or implied," to the plaintiff's child? Upon this precept another important rule has been formulated by that author, viz.: "The owner of land or other property may properly inclose dangerous machinery on [his] own premises, such machinery being an essential industrial factor. * * * Hence comes the well-established rule that a trespasser who meddles with an instrument in itself dangerous cannot recover damages for the injuries his meddlesomeness has brought on himself." Id. § 347. But the author says further: "So, with regard to leaving a dangerous instrument on a thoroughfare, it is negligence to leave such an instrument on a place of public access, where persons are expected to be constantly passing and repassing, and when persons are not required to be on their guard, or where children are accustomed to play; but it is not negligence to leave such an instrument in a private inclosure, which, from its very privacy, excludes the public, and puts on their guard all who enter." (Our italics.) Id. § 112; citing Railroad Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657. And in referring to that case the author speaks of the principle therein announced thus: "It was held that a railroad company was liable for damages sustained by a boy when playing with a turn-table left by the company unguarded and unlocked on its own grounds; it being shown that the boys of the neighborhood were in the habit of resorting to the place for play, and that this was known to the company." Whart. Neg. § 860. A parallel case is cited from Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136. These various citations from this justly celebrated author, which are predicated on the established jurisprudence of the country, are quite sufficient to show that the instant case does not disclose the defendant's negligence as matter of law; for, if little boys did resort to the defendant's premises for purposes of amusement and play habitually, it was certainly against the defendant's wishes, and over its agents' and employes' protest, made repeatedly, although ineffectually. Notwithstanding the fence of the company, inclosing the dangerous coal-dumps and wheels, was frequently open, in places, possibly for a greater length of time than it should have been allowed to remain open, yet these openings were not occasioned by the company's employes, or persons holding even quasi contractual relations to it; but they were occasioned by acts of trespassers upon their private grounds. And the proof is clear that the agents and employes exercised ordinary care in its safe-keeping. They used timely and repeated efforts to keep the apertures closed. The children were repeatedly warned against the danger, and driven away, and on more than one occasion they were pulled off of the fence. Mr. Hutchinson announces the general rule to be that railroad companies are not placed under "the same degree of obligation as to care and diligence to guard against injuries to strangers" as they are to those with whom they have contractual relations; for with regard to the former their "duty is governed by the general principle of law that every one is obliged, upon considerations of humanity and justice, to conform his conduct to the rights of others, and, in the prosecution of his lawful business, to use every reasonable precaution to avoid their injury." Hutch. Carr. p. 447. And this rule has been sanctioned in many cases. Snyder v. Railroad Co., 42 La. Ann. 302, 7 South. Rep. 582; Lott v. Railroad Co., 37 La. Ann. 337; Hoag v. Railroad Co., 85 Pa. St. 293; Cauley v. Railroad Co., 98 Pa. St. 500; Whart. Neg. §§ 300, 301; Thomp. Carr. pp. 344, 345; Hearn v. Railroad Co., 34 La. Ann. 160; Montfort v. Schmidt, 36 La. Ann. 750; Reary v. Railroad Co., 40 La. Ann. 32, 3 South. Rep. 390. To this rule the case of Westerfield v. Levis, 43 La. Ann. 67, 9 South. Rep. 52, does not apply, for in that case the negligence of the defendants was fully established by their having left a heavy iron roller, with two mules attached thereto, unattended by a driver, on an open public street, the mules not fastened, and the wheels of the roller unlocked. The aggravated question in that case was whether the child, who was mortally injured, was of sufficient age and discretion to have been guilty of contributory fault. The general rule, as announced by Mr. Wharton, that "there is no duty imposed upon the owner or occupant of premises to keep them in a suitable condition for those who come there for their own convenience merely, without any invitation, either express or which may fairly be implied" from the surrounding circumstances, has been sanctioned in many cases. Severy v. Nickerson, 120 Mass. 306; Pierce v. Whitcomb, 48 Vt. 127; McAlpin v. Powell, 70 N. Y. 126; Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. St. 74; Railroad Co. v. Henigh, 23 Kan. 347; Morgan v. City of Hallowell, 57 Me. 375; Railroad Co. v. Carraher, 47 Ill. 333; Murray v. McLean, 57 Ill. 378.

In conclusion we cannot do better than quote, in illustration of the rule stated, from the case of Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1, in which the plaintiff sued as administrator of his minor child of tender years, who was killed by falling into a cistern of the defendant, which had been left uncovered; and in stating the duty of protection and care on the part of the proprietor, the court say: "If on private property, not open of right to the public, it applies less generally, and only to those who have a legal right to be there, and to claim the care of the occupant for their security while on the premises against negligence, or to those who are directly injured by some positive act involving more than passing negligence. Cases are quite numerous in which the same questions have arisen which arise in this case, and we have found none which hold that an accident from negligence, on private premises, can be made the ground of damages, unless the party injured has been induced to come by personal invitation, or by employment which brings him there, or by resorting there as to a place of business, or of general resort, held out as open to customers or others whose lawful occasions may lead them there. We have found no support for any rule which would protect those who go where they are not invited, but merely with express or tacit permission, from curiosity, or motives of private convenience in no way connected with business or other personal relations with the occupant." On a full and exhaustive examination of the facts furnished in the record, and all the authorities appertaining thereto, we are fully convinced that the negligence of the defendant is not made out, and the plaintiff's case must fail, and the judgment be reversed. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and it is now ordered that the demands of the plaintiff be rejected, at his cost in both courts.

DEWHURST et al. v. WRIGHT.

ESTOPPEL BY DEED—RESULTING TRUST—ENFORCEMENT—HOMESTEAD ENTRY—TRANSFER OF RIGHT.

1. Where one without title has conveyed land in his own right, with covenants warranting the title, and afterwards the title comes to him in the capacity of a trustee for a different person, the newly-acquired title does not inure to the former grantor of such covenantor, nor pass to him. The estoppel arises only where the covenantor takes the new title in the same right in which he had previously conveyed it.

2. Where a person makes a lawful purchase of land for himself with his own money, taking the title in the name of another person, a trust results in favor of the purchaser, and the person in whose name the title is taken becomes a trustee of the title in favor of the purchaser; but such title does not either inure to the benefit of or pass to a third person, to whom the person in whose name the title was taken had previously conveyed the land by warranty deed.

3. A court of equity will not declare or enforce a resulting trust contrary to the policy of the law as defined in a public statute, but will leave suitors asking its aid where it finds them, if it appears that they are seeking to evade the policy of the law.

4. The provisions of the second section of the act of congress of June 15, 1880, entitled "An act relating to public lands of the United States," that "persons who have heretofore under any of the homestead laws entered lands properly subject to such entry, or persons to whom the right of those having so entered for homesteads may have been attempted to be transferred by bona fide instrument in writing," may make cash entry of the land, do not include a person to whom such right of the entryman has been transferred subsequent to such statute; and where such a transferee has entered the land with his own money, and for his own benefit, but in the name of the entryman, it not appearing that he dealt with the government officers as such transferee, a court of equity will not declare or enforce a resulting trust in favor of such transferee or his grantee, against a third person in possession of the land, and to whom the original entryman had previously to such transfer, but subsequent to the statute, executed a conveyance of the land.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Lake county; JOHN D. BROOME, Judge.

Bill by Fannie B. Dewhurst and others against William Wright to recover land. From an order dismissing the bill on demurrer plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by RANEY, C. J.:

1. The facts shown and allegations and prayer made by the bill are as follows: On June 1, 1870, the appellee's co-defendant, Polydore Dean, entered the land in question, 160 acres, now in Lake county, but then in Sumter, as a homestead, under the laws of the United States, in the Tallahassee land-office, the entry being No. 4,667 of the series of June, 1870. In December, 1878, final proof was made under section 2291 of the Revised Statutes, and the final certificate, No. 4,261, Gainesville office, was issued on December 6, 1883. Intervening the final proof and the issue of the final certificate, Dean conveyed the land to Wright on August 31, 1883, by deed, with full covenant of general warranty. In August, 1884, Dean was cited to appear at the Gainesville land-office on the 25th day of the following November, to answer a charge of fraud in the proof of his continuous residence on the land. Dewhurst, the co-appellant, appeared, as attorney for Dean, in compliance with the citation, and found that the United States officials were in possession of proof that Dean had not complied with the law as to residence, he having lived on the land for not longer than two years, although he had sworn in his affidavit of August 17, 1878, in making final proof, that he had continuously resided thereon for six years. Dewhurst prepared for Dean an appeal to the commissioner of the general land-office, praying that Dean be allowed to make new proof of his homestead entry, and obtain titles to the land embraced in the same. A letter from the receiver of the land-office at Gainesville, dated December 6, 1884, addressed to Dewhurst, "attorney for Polydore Dean," St. Augustine, Fla., states that the petition had been forwarded that day to the general land-office for consideration. This petition was refused by the commissioner, and the land-officers at Gainesville were notified of such refusal by a letter of December 29, 1884, and they on January 13, 1885, notified Dewhurst, as attorney for Dean, of such refusal, and, with a view to the cancellation of the entry, cited Dean to appear on the 23d day of February, and furnish proof concerning the alleged abandonment of his homestead entry and fraudulent proof.

2. On December 2, 1884, Dean conveyed the land in question to Dewhurst, the consideration stated in the deed being $200, and the deed being recorded in the public records of Sumter county on the 8th day of the same month. This deed is a formal conveyance of the land and of all the estate, right, title, and interest, "both vested and which may hereafter accrue, property, possession, claim, and demand whatsoever, as well in law as in equity," of the said Dean, and has full covenants of seisin, and of power to sell and convey, and of general warranty. On the last-named day Dewhurst conveyed the land to one Bradley, of Pittsburg, Pa., the consideration named being $960, and it having a covenant of general warranty.

3. The bill also alleges that Dewhurst, finding that Dean had no defense to the charges of fraud, and that the proofs of the same were unmistakable, and that his claim and interest were forfeited, and his homestead entry about to be canceled, obtained from the commissioner of the general land-office an admission that Dean had still the right to make a cash purchase of the land embraced in such entry; and as an evidence of such right the bill refers to a letter of September 26, 1884, to Dewhurst, from the acting commissioner, Smith, in reply to one from Dewhurst on the 16th of the same month. The acting commissioner, replying to Dewhurst's inquiry if Dean could purchase the land under the second section of the act of June 15, 1880, says there is nothing in the proceedings thus far to defeat Dean's right to purchase under that act. The bill states that Dewhurst so advised Dean, and urged him to make such purchase; that Dean was totally indifferent in the matter, and declined to purchase the land, urging his total inability to provide any, even a small sum, of the money necessary; that, finding that Dean could not obtain the means to purchase the land, and that otherwise it would be totally lost, and the United States would continue to retain the title against Dean, he, (Dewhurst,) for a valuable consideration, purchased from Dean the equitable title to the land, no other claim or title then remaining in Dean to said lands, except a right to make cash purchase thereof under the above act of June 15, 1880, and that he received from Dean the above deed of December 2, 1884; that Dean had not, at the date of such conveyance, nor at any other time, disclosed that he had executed any other and former deed, but had at all times declared that he had a full and clear title, subject only to the title of the United States; that Dean did declare to Dewhurst that by and with his consent one William Wright was "cropping" on the land, but was there without any claim of right thereto, he having entered thereon by permission of one Fred Williams, who had entered on said lands by consent of Dean, and to whom Dean had given permission to erect a house on the land, in which house Wright was then residing; that, relying on the statement made by Dean that he had full right to sell and convey his equitable title, the legal title being still in the United States, he (Dewhurst) did with his own money purchase said legal title, as hereinafter set forth, and did "for a valuable consideration" receive from Dean a conveyance to him of the equitable title of said Dean in and to said land, with a release of all right of dower by his wife, first having been informed over the hand and seal of the clerk of Sumter county that there was no conveyance of record in his office of or concerning such land.

4. That Dewhurst did, on January 23, 1885, with his own moneys, make payment to the United States for the legal title of said land, said payment having been made to the receiver of the United States land-office at Gainesville, Fla., as evidenced by the complainant's check of that date on Florida Savings Bank, drawn in favor of such receiver for $200; that the receiver transmitted to Dewhurst, in return for such check, his duplicate receipt, which on April 20, 1885, was transmitted to the general land-office, and thereafter, in due course of time, and according to law, the patent for said land was duly transmitted to Dewhurst, of which a copy, duly certified, will be presented on the trial of the cause.

5. That Dean, being the owner of the legal title to such land by reason of the purchase thereof by Dewhurst from the United States on January 23, 1885, having been made in the name of Dean, although for the use of Dewhurst, did, for further assurance, execute to Dewhurst, February 14, 1885, his deed of conveyance, with full covenant of seisin and general warranty for said land.

6. That on the 10th day of June, 1885, Bradley and wife conveyed the land to Mrs. Dewhurst, with covenant of warranty against all claims of all persons whomsoever.

7. That in the summer of 1886 Dewhurst learned that Wright had received from Dean a deed of conveyance "to the land owned by your oratrix," and which Dean had attempted to convey to said Wright under and by virtue of his fraudulent claim of a homestead right and title, which would have inured to said Dean under and by virtue of section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, had he complied with the provisions of said law, but, Dean having failed to so comply, the said homestead right never inured to said Dean for want of compliance with said law, as admitted by Dean in his sworn petition for leave to make new proof in support of said homestead claim, and no right or title to said lands existed in said defendant Dean at the date of his pretended conveyance to Wright on the 31st day of August, 1883.

8. That no equitable title ever existed in Dean, because the sole and only title ever derived from the United States was derived by virtue of the cash entry and payment made January 23, 1885, "with the moneys of this complainant Dewhurst, paid by him upon the strength of the covenants of said defendant Dean;" that he was in possession of the land, and had full right to sell and convey the same, and because Dean had conveyed to him (Dewhurst) the land, with full covenants of seisin and warranty upon December 2, 1884.

9. That Wright's deed was not recorded till June 23, 1885, or more than six months after the record of the deed from Dean to Dewhurst or from Dewhurst to Bradley; that the consideration named in the deed is only $20; that, even if Dean, on August 31, 1883, had had any right or title to said lands, which complainants deny, complainants are not affected in their right and title to own and possess said lands, as the pretended conveyance to Wright is void as to subsequent purchasers for value without notice.

10. That Dean did not, after the date of his pretended conveyance to Wright, acquire a title to said land which would, by virtue of his covenants in the pretended conveyance of August 31, 1883, inure to the benefit of Wright, because he never acquired any other than a bare legal title as trustee for the complainant Dewhurst, who paid all the purchase money by which was acquired the title to said land. That by such payment Dewhurst alone became the cestui que trust as to the legal title, whether such legal title remained in Dean, or, by force and construction of law and by virtue of the covenants in the deed of August 31, 1883, the legal title to said land passed to the defendant, Wright. And complainants pray the court to decide what is in law the effect of said deed of August 31, 1883, if any it has; and, if it shall decide that in law it is effective to pass the after-acquired title of Dean, to declare Wright a trustee, holding the legal title for the benefit of Mrs. Dewhurst, as the grantee of Bradley, who was the grantee of Dewhurst.

11. Complainants allege, in effect, that they took without notice of said deed, and Wright went into possession as a tenant of Dean's tenant, one Williams, and at the time when Dean occupied and claimed the land as his homestead; that Wright now holds possession of said land, but only by virtue of his original entry under and by leave of Dean, without any claim of ownership; that complainants are informed that Wright is now claiming the whole or some part of said lands adversely to Mrs. Dewhurst, and that he now claims that he held such lands adversely to Dean at the date of Dean's conveyance to Mrs. Dewhurst, but complainants believe that the possession of Wright, beginning by entry while the land was still held and claimed by Dean by virtue of his homestead entry, and such entry, being by permission of one under Dean, must be deemed to be under and in subordination to the title of Dean up to such time as Wright took action to establish by some act of notoriety the fact that he claimed to hold said lands adversely to the title of Dean.

12. That recording the deed was the first notice given by Wright that he held adversely to Dean; that Wright has never returned the land for taxes; that the title to the land may be decreed to be in Mrs. Dewhurst; that the deed to Wright be canceled, and to be void as against her, "her husband and assigns;" that Wright be ordered to execute and deliver to her a deed of conveyance of the premises; and for general relief.

13. Wright demurred to the bill as not showing a case entitling complainants to discovery or relief, and as stating a case determinable at law, and the chancellor dismissed the bill on hearing the demurrer, from which order complainants have appealed.

W. W. Dewhurst, for appellants. J. B. Gaines, for appellee.

RANEY, C. J., (after stating the facts.) The purchase of land represented by the bill was made under the second section of the act of congress approved June 15, 1880, and entitled "An act relating to the public lands of the United States." This section provides that persons who have heretofore under any of the homestead laws entered lands properly subject to such entry, or persons to whom the right of those having so entered for homesteads may have been attempted to be transferred by bona fide instrument in writing, may entitle themselves to said lands by paying the government price therefor, and in no case less than $1.25 per acre, and the amount heretofore paid the government upon said lands shall be taken as a part of said price: provided, that this shall in no wise interfere with the rights or claims of others who may have subsequently entered such lands under the homestead laws. Page 558, 1 Supp. Rev. St. U. S.

The real purpose of the bill is to have Wright declared a trustee of the title of the land in favor of Mrs. Dewhurst, and to require him to convey the same to her by proper deed.

Dean had, prior to the approval of the above act of congress, made an entry of the land, and had received his first certificate, but not a patent. Subsequent to the act, proceedings were instituted to cancel the entry for fraudulent proof as to residence on the land. He was clearly within the provisions of the above act of congress, but the bill informs us not only that he was indifferent to purchasing under its provisions, and could not provide the money to do so, but that he in fact declined to purchase, though urged to do so by Dewhurst, and that Dewhurst, with his own money, purchased the title of the United States, and took the title in the name of Dean. The bill is not framed upon the theory that Dewhurst advanced the money for Dean, or made the purchase for him, nor that at the time he paid the money he was acting for Dean in any representative capacity, nor under any agreement between him and Dean by which Dean would become the trustee of the title under an express trust in Dewhurst's favor. The theory of the bill, on the contrary, is that Dewhurst purchased the land for himself, and paid for it with his own money, as purchaser, and took the title in Dean's name, and that thereupon a trust resulted in his favor; and that by virtue of the conveyances from Dean to him, and from Dewhurst to Bradley, and from Bradley to Mrs. Dewhurst, the last-named party has become invested with the right to have a trust declared against Wright, to whom Dean had conveyed before conveying to Dewhurst, and to a conveyance from Wright.

Assuming that Dewhurst could have purchased lawfully the land for himself, and did so with his own money, and took the title in the name of Dean, the result would have been that, upon such purchase being made, Dean would have held the land in trust for Dewhurst or Dewhurst's grantees, such trust being what is known as a "resulting trust," (Perry, Trusts, § 133, and note 4;) but the title so vested in Dean in trust would not have inured to the benefit of Wright under his prior warranty deed from Dean, nor have passed to Wright from Dean. Where one without title has conveyed land in his own right with covenants warranting the title, and afterwards the title comes to him in the capacity of a trustee for a different person, such newly-acquired title does not inure to the former grantee of the covenantor. The estoppel arises only where the covenantor takes the new title in the same right in which he had previously conveyed it. 3 Washb. Real Prop. marg. p. 475, § 37; Burchard v. Hubbard, 11 Ohio, 316; Kelley v. Jenness, 50 Me. 455; Jackson v. Mills, 13 Johns. 463; Sinclair v. Jackson, 8 Cow. 543, 587; Jackson v. Hoffman, 9 Cow. 271; Marsh v. Rice, 1 N. H. 167; Rumlet v. Otis, 2 N. H. 167. We are satisfied that no benefit would have inured to Wright from the patent to Dean if the effect of such patent had been to vest the title, as between Dean and Dewhurst, or Dean and Dewhurst's grantee, in Dean, in trust for Dewhurst or such grantee; and that it would not, either of itself or through the aid of the former deed from Dean to Wright, have constituted Wright a trustee for Dewhurst, or for Dewhurst's grantee. It was Dean, not Wright, whom Dewhurst, in the eyes of the law, intended to make a trustee, and the law usually constitutes one under such circumstances. Wright's position is not only wholly disconnected from the transaction, but entirely hostile to it.

The trouble with complainants' case is that they are asking a court of equity to aid them in something which is contrary to the policy of the law. This a court of equity will not do, but, judging those who pray at its hands relief which the courts of law cannot afford by the case they make for themselves, it will leave them where they are if it appears they are seeking to evade the policy of the law as defined in a public statute. I Perry, Trusts, § 131; Proseus v. McIntyre, 5 Barb. 425; Baldwin v. Campfield, 8 N. J. Eq. 891; Cutler v. Tuttle, 19 N. J. Eq. 549; Ford's Ex'rs v. Lewis, 10 B. Mon. 127; Camden v. Anderson, 5 Term R. 709; Ex parte Yallop, 15 Ves. 60; Ex parte Houghton, 17 Ves. 251; Groves v. Groves, 3 Younge & J. 163; Childers v. Childers, 1 De Gex & J. 482; Atkins v. Kron, 5 Ired. Eq. 207; Leggett v. Dubois, 5 Paige, 114; Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh, 492; McCaw v. Galbraith, 7 Rich. Law, 74; Anstice v. Brown, 6 Paige, 448.

The purpose of the act of congress, as set out above, was the relief of persons who had previously entered for homestead lands under any of the homestead laws of the United States, and also the relief of the persons to whom the right of those having so entered lands for homesteads had been previously attempted to be transferred by bona fide instrument in writing. The policy of the act was to permit these two classes of persons to purchase for cash, or make a cash entry of the lands upon the terms stated in the act, and thus save them from the loss consequent upon failure to comply with the ordinary statutory requirements as to residence or occupation and improvement in case of homestead entries. Neither of these classes include, nor does the policy of the act embrace, a person to whom the person making the entry may have made a transfer, or a bona fide attempt to transfer, subsequent to the act. The act does not permit a person who belongs to neither of the two favored classes to avail himself of the benefits offered them, by doing for himself and with his own money, but in their name, and upon their application, and the proof of identity which the provisions of the act palpably render indispensable, that which he could not do if acting avowedly and openly for himself; nor will a court of equity, even though a patent in the name of one entitled to it under the provisions of the above statute had been secured by a person not belonging to either of the favored classes, relieve such person of unanticipated obstacles to the beneficial realization of that which the statute never intended he should acquire under its provisions.

If the bill showed that Dewhurst had applied to the government in his own name as the transferee of Dean under Dean's deed of December 2, 1884, to him, for the benefit of the act of congress, and that the land-officer had decided that he was by virtue of such deed entitled to the benefit of the act, and had actually sold to him, and made the conveyance in the name of Dean, a different case would be before us, and we do not say what our conclusion would be. As it is, the bill is not sufficient in its statement of the details of the procedure to justify a conclusion that Dewhurst has operated in this way and in his own name, and not under the name of Dean. It cannot be inferred from the statements of the bill that the government officers have dealt with Dewhurst as the transferee of Dean. The only inference legitimate, in view of the law, is that Dewhurst, after Dean's refusal to purchase, did so really for himself as between him and Dean, but actually in Dean's name. This the law did not permit him to do, and a court of equity will not sanction.

We of course do not mean to intimate any judgment as to the validity of the patent. No such question is before us. However valid it may be as between Dean and the government, (and we do not say it is not entirely so,) we only say that a court of equity will not aid complainants upon the case made by the bill, but will, as to the case made by this bill, leave all the parties in the position they occupy at law.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

JOHNSTON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Florida. March 24, 1892.)

CRIMINAL LAW — APPEAL — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS — OBJECTIONS NOT MADE BELOW.

1. An appellate court will not disturb the verdict of a jury as being contrary to the evidence when it is not contrary thereto, but is sustained by it.

2. Even admitting that there may be an error in one of the charges, the verdict will not be disturbed on account of it where it is clear that such error is corrected by other charges on the same point, and particularly where the testimony is such as to preclude the conclusion that the party is not guilty of the offense of which he has been convicted.

3. An appellate court may refuse to notice points urged in the brief of counsel for a plaintiff in error, which are not covered by the assignment of errors.

4. The striking out of immaterial testimony by the court is not error.

5. An objection not made in the trial court as to the admissibility of evidence cannot be urged in the appellate court.

Error to circuit court, Orange county; JOHN D. BROOME, Judge.

Indictment against Thomas A. Johnston for murder. From a judgment on a verdict of manslaughter in the second degree defendant brings error. Affirmed.

E. K. Foster, for plaintiff in error. William B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MALONE, Circuit Judge. At the fall term, 1890, of the circuit court for Orange county, in the seventh judicial circuit, Thomas A. Johnston, the plaintiff in error, was tried upon an indictment charging him with the murder of one William Lee, and found guilty of manslaughter in the second degree by a petit jury. He then moved the court for a new trial, but the court denied this motion, and sentenced him to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the period of five years.

Thereupon he removed said suit by writ of error to this court for review, and assigned the following errors, viz.: (1) That the verdict was contrary to the evidence; (2) that the court erred in giving charge No. 4.

A review of the testimony in this case will be necessary in order to determine whether these assignments of error are well taken. This testimony is very voluminous, and we will not undertake to repeat it all, but will repeat the substance of it only, which is as follows, viz.:

On the morning of the 9th day of May, 1890, Thomas A. Johnston, the plaintiff in error, and William Lee, the deceased, met near Yates' house, in the road leading from Orlando to Oakland, in Orange county. Both men were riding on horseback, at a moderate gait; the former going towards Oakland, and the latter towards Orlando. When within about 25 yards of each other both checked their horses to a walk, and just as they passed each other Johnston suddenly turned his horse, presented a 38 Smith & Wesson pistol to Lee's back and fired, shooting him in the back. The pistol was held so close to Lee when it fired off that it burned his clothing. Lee then fled in the direction of Orlando, hollering, "Oh Lord!" his horse running at full speed, but keeping in the road. Johnston, pistol in hand, urged his horse to a run also, and pursued Lee, and again shot him in the back while he was fleeing. After this second shot, Lee fell from his horse into the road, dead, and then Johnston checked his horse before he reached the corpse, and turned and rode off in the opposite direction to Dink Patrick's; and afterwards, during the same morning, returned to Orlando, and surrendered himself to Mr. Anderson, the sheriff of Orange county, and at the same time informed him that he had shot Will Lee in the back with a pistol, which he exhibited, and killed him.

It appears that the deceased had already threatened to kill Johnston, and that these threats had been communicated to Johnston a short time before the homicide.

The statement of Johnston himself varies very little from this testimony. His statement about his meeting the deceased in the road and the circumstances connected with the homicide is the following, viz.: "I was right up to Yates' house, and when I looked up I met Will Lee. He was close to me. I don't know whether he came around the corner of the fence or where. I never saw him until he was right there, and he said, 'God damn you, I have got you now,' and by that time he was in about three or four feet of me, and he spurred his horse up towards me, and struck at me, and missed me, just brushing my left shoulder. Then I reached and jerked my pistol out, and my horse sorter turned, and I shot him right about there, [indicating.] Then I turned my horse around, and he started to run, and my horse did, too; and I shot at him again as he went off, and both horses was running, and he fell off."

The plaintiff in error contends that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, because this testimony proved that the homicide was justifiable, and did not prove manslaughter in the second degree.

We do not think that this contention is tenable. The testimony does not, in our opinion, prove a case of justifiable homicide. It is true that it appears from the testimony that the deceased had threatened to take Johnston's life, but it also appears that at the time that he was shot and killed the deceased did nothing that evinced an immediate design to execute said threats. Indeed, there is a total absence of any testimony whatever showing any hostile demonstration or overt act of attack on the part of the deceased against Johnston that indicated an immediate design to take Johnston's life, or to do him great personal injury. Besides, it will be observed that Johnston himself did not state that he apprehended or had apparent reason to apprehend that the deceased designed to kill him, or to do him great personal injury, and that there was imminent danger of said design being accomplished, and that he slew the deceased to prevent it. It is true that Johnston stated that the deceased spurred his horse up towards him, and struck at him, but missed him, just brushing his left shoulder, but does not state what the deceased struck at him with, and we are left to infer that it was his left hand.

Now, it will be observed that Johnston did not shoot the deceased as he approached him, but waited until the deceased had passed him, then suddenly turned and shot the deceased in the back without any warning whatever; and when the deceased fled after receiving the bullet in his back he pursued him, and shot him in the back again, and continued the pursuit until the deceased fell from his horse into the road, dead.

It is evident that when Johnston fired those fatal shots he had no apparent reasonable ground to apprehend that the deceased designed to kill him, or to do him great personal injury, and that there was imminent danger of such design being accomplished.

We think that this homicide was without justification, and was wholly unnecessary. The verdict, therefore, in our opinion, is not contrary to the evidence, but sustained by it. Under these circumstances, this court will not disturb this verdict. Hicks v. State, 25 Fla. 535, 6 South. Rep. 441; Anderson v. State, 24 Fla. 139, 3 South. Rep. 884; Robinson v. State, 24 Fla. 358, 5 South. Rep. 6; Huling v. Bank, 19 Fla. 695; John v. State, 16 Fla. 554; Mayo v. Hynote, Id. 673; Sherman v. State, 17 Fla. 888.

We will now consider the second assignmen of error, viz.: That the court erred in giving charge No. 4, which is in the following words, viz.: "A person has the right to defend himself against an attack by another, and to kill such other when there is reasonable ground to apprehend a design on the part of such other person to commit a felony upon him, or to do him some great personal injury, and there shall be imminent danger of such design being accomplished. It must appear that the assault was imminently perilous, or that it would appear to be imminently perilous to a reasonable man, situated as the party assaulted was situated; and, unless there be a plain or apparently plain manifestation of a felonious intent, or intent to do great personal injury, no assault will justify killing the assailant."

The plaintiff in error has failed to point out to us any error in this part of the charge. But, even if error had been pointed out therein, not only is it corrected by the other and full charges given, but it would be harmless, and would not defeat the verdict, because the testimony is such as to preclude the conclusion that the killing was excusable or justifiable, and sustains the verdict. Wooten v. State, 24 Fla. 335, 5 South. Rep. 39; Brown v. State, 18 Fla. 472.

It is urged in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error that there was error in excluding certain testimony of a witness named Nobles, relating to the statements of the deceased as to his intention to gather the prisoner's cattle; and also that there was error in permitting a horse other than that ridden by Lee to be ridden across a bridge at the view of the scene of the killing, taken at the request of the prisoner, by the court and jury. As these points are not included in the assignment of errors, we are not required to notice them. We will, however, say that the testimony of Nobles is entirely immaterial, and could have had no effect upon the conclusion reached by the jury; and that the objection urged here as to the horse was not made at the time of the riding across the bridge at the view.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—IMPROVEMENT OF NAVIGABLE STREAM—REGULATION OF COMMERCE—ISSUE OF BONDS—SPECIAL LEGISLATION—COUNTY COMMISSIONERS—NOTICE OF MEETING—COUNTY BOND—ELECTION—RETURNS—QUALIFICATIONS OF VOTERS.

1. The purpose for which, under the act of June 11, 1891, entitled "An act to authorize Duval county to improve the navigation of the St. Johns river, and to issue bonds in aid thereof," the proceeds of the bonds are authorized to be applied, is "the work of improving the navigation of the St. Johns river, and removing obstructions therefrom, within the county of Duval." This work is a county purpose, within the meaning of the provisions of section 5, art. 9, of the constitution, that the legislature shall authorize the several counties to assess and impose taxes for county purposes, although the river is a navigable stream and public highway, and may run from its mouth in the county, and hundreds of miles beyond the limits of the county, and through other counties, and commerce is carried on as an entirety upon it from its mouth towards its source for the distance stated, and thence back, and a large portion of its commerce is to or from other states and foreign countries, and the commerce and business of the river confined within the limits of the county are very small and of no importance. The statute is not in conflict with the constitutional provision designated.

2. Commerce with foreign nations and among the states embraces, not only subjects which are national in their character and require, in order to preclude discriminating regulations by the states, uniformity of regulation affecting all the states, but also such matters, within the purview of such commerce, as are local in their nature or operation, and can be properly regulated by provisions adapted to their particular circumstances. The power of congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states is exclusive only in so far as it relates to those subjects of such commerce that fall within the former or national class. As to this class the states have no power to act, even in the absence of congressional regulation, but, as to any subject within the other or local class, the states have plenary power of control so long as congress does not act as to it. The improvement of a navigable river connecting with the ocean, and constituting a navigable water of the United States, but lying entirely within a state, is a subject falling within the second or local class, and such improvement may be made by or under the authority of the state so long as the free navigation of the river, as it may be permitted by the laws of the United States, is not impaired, or any system for its improvement provided by the general government is not interfered with or defeated.

3. The act of June 11, 1891, (chapter 4077, St.,) authorizing the county of Duval to improve the navigation of St. Johns river, and remove obstructions therefrom, is not in conflict with the provision of the constitution of the United States, which gives congress power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states.

4. If it be that the act of June 11, 1891, authorizing the county of Duval to improve the navigation of the St. Johns river, and to issue bonds, the proceeds of which are to be applied to such purpose, does not provide any means or method for paying the principal and interest on the bonds, such fact is not a good objection to the validity of the act or to the issue of the bonds thereunder, nor is the fact that such provision may not be otherwise made.

5. The courts have no power to inquire whether the notice of application to the legislature for local or special legislation, required by section 21 of article 3 of the constitution, and by the legislation thereunder, defining the method of publishing and proving the publication of such notice, (Act of May 31, 1887; chapter 3708, St.,) has been given. To ascertain and decide whether the required notice has been given is exclusively a legislative function and duty, and the passage of a special or local act is a legislative judgment that proper notice has been duly published, and that the legal evidence thereof was "established in the legislature" before the bill was passed, and the courts are concluded by such judgment.

6. A recital in the records of a special meeting of a board of county commissioners, that the meeting was "called by the chairman for the purpose of ordering an election" as to issuing bonds of the county under the provisions of a designated statute, is, in the absence of allegation and proof to the contrary, sufficient evidence that notice of the time and purpose of such special meeting was given to each member of the board.

7. A special meeting of a board of county commissioners, of which each commissioner has been duly notified, may be adjourned to a subsequent day by the members present, a majority of the entire board; and, it seems, that less than a majority may do so. The members present at such meeting have actual notice of the adjournment, and those not present are charged in law with notice thereof, and the adjourned meeting is but a continuation of the original one, and anything done at the adjourned meeting concerning the matter for which the meeting was originally called is as legal as if it had been done before the adjournment.

8. Where a regular meeting of a board of county commissioners adjourns to a subsequent day, all the members being present, each member is charged with the official duty of attending, and with notice of any lawful action to be taken at such adjourned meeting, and anything done at such meeting, within the power of the board to do, is not rendered invalid by the fact that one member did not attend it.

9. A statute providing for an election as to the issue of bonds by a county directs that the returns of the election shall, within two days after the election, be delivered to the clerk of the circuit court, to be laid before the board of county commissioners, and that the board shall publicly canvass the returns at their "next regular or special meeting," and declare the result. Held, that the purpose of the act in the use of the words quoted was to secure promptness of action upon the part of the board, rather than to exclude from any particular meeting the power to canvass the returns, and that a canvass of such returns made at an adjourned regular meeting held on a day subsequent to the election, to which day the regular meeting had been adjourned from a day prior to the election, was legal.

10. Payment of poll-taxes was not a requisite or qualification for voting at the election in Duval county as to issuing bonds under the act of June 11, 1891, for the improvement of the navigation of the St. Johns river. Though this is not expressly declared by the act, its provisions show clearly a legislative intent that no such qualification was to be required, but that all persons duly registered as voters, and retaining the qualifications which preserve the legality of registration, should have the right to vote.

11. The act of June 11, 1891, authorizing Duval county to improve the navigation of the St. Johns river, required returns to be sent to the clerk of the circuit court, and to be delivered by him to the county commissioners, and authorized the commissioners to canvass them. The county judge and supervisor of registration had nothing to do with the canvass under the general election law, and properly took no part in it.

12. That a canvassing board has before it, when making a canvass of votes cast at an election, not only the returns properly made under the statute, but also a duplicate return made to an officer which the law did not require to be made, is immaterial.

13. The mere fact that oaths of inspectors and poll-lists may have been transmitted to an officer not authorized to receive them is an irregularity which does not affect the result of an election, or the legality of the canvass of returns duly made of votes cast at the election.

14. The act of June 11, 1891, authorizing Duval county to improve the navigation of the St. Johns river, provides that the bonds to be issued under the act "shall bear the seal of the aforesaid county of Duval." The county commissioners passed a resolution that "the seal of the circuit court for Duval county, and of this board, now in use, is adopted as the common seal of Duval county." Held, that the act authorized the use of the seal of the circuit court of Duval county in sealing the bonds, and, to the extent that the resolution indicated the will of the board that it should be so used, the resolution was valid, but not further or otherwise.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Duval county; W. B. YOUNG, Judge.

Suit by Telfair Stockton against Benjamin R. Powell and others, county commissioners of Duval county, to restrain them from issuing certain bonds. From a judgment dismissing his bill on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Cooper & Cooper, for appellant. Randall & Foster, for appellees.

RANEY, C. J. I. This is a suit for an injunction to restrain the appellees, who are the county commissioners of Duval county, from issuing bonds under the provisions of an act approved June 11, 1189, and entitled "An act to authorize Duval county to improve the navigation of St. Johns river, and to issue bonds in aid thereof." Chapter 4077, p. 119, St. 1891. The purpose for which the proceeds of the bonds are authorized to be applied is "the work of improving the navigation of the St. Johns river, and removing obstructions therefrom, within the county of Duval." Section 8, p. 121. The demurrer to the bill was sustained, and, the complainant declining to amend, the bill was dismissed.

The first objection urged against the issue of the bonds is that the purpose for which their proceeds are applicable under the statute is not a "county purpose," within the meaning of our constitution; and hence that the act is unconstitutional. Counties are, according to our constitution, the recognized legal political divisions of the state, (sections 1, 2, art. 8;) and the same fundamental law (section 5, art. 9) provides that "the legislature shall authorize the several counties and incorporated cities or towns in the state to assess and impose taxes for county and municipal purposes, and for no other purpose."

If "improving the navigation of the St. Johns river, and removing obstructions therefrom, within the county of Duval," is not a county purpose, in so far as Duval county is concerned, the act is contrary to the last-stated provision of the constitution, and void, and the bonds are of no validity, and equity has jurisdiction to enjoin their issue. High, Inj. § 1282 et seq.; Chestnutwood v. Hood, 68 Ill. 132; List v. City of Wheeling, 7 W. Va. 501; State v. County Court, 51 Mo. 359; Allen v. Inhabitants of Jay, 60 Me. 124.

The bill informs us that the river named is a navigable stream and public highway, running not less than 200 miles beyond the limits of the county, and through several other designated counties, and that commerce, travel, and transportation are carried on as an entirety upon the stream from its mouth in Duval county, where it empties into the Atlantic ocean, towards its source, and from its source to its mouth, at least the distance stated, and through each and all of such counties; and that a large portion of this commerce is to or from other states and foreign countries, and that the commerce and business on the river confined within the limits of Duval county is very small and of no importance. The other averments of the bill are numerous, and will be noticed, but these give us an understanding of the character of the stream intended to be improved. It is not exclusively local, either in its being or its use, but runs through Duval, and through or between several counties, and is the highway of their local as well as their other commerce, including interstate and foreign commerce.

The authorities have formulated no generally accepted definition of a "county purpose," but leave each case involving the question to be decided as it may arise. In the case of Cotten v. County Com'rs, 6 Fla. 610, where the fourth section of article 8 of the constitution then under consideration was substantially like the fifth section of article 9, supra, of the present organic law, it was contended by the appellants that locality within the county was the true test of a work being one that is included within "county purposes," while the position of the commissioners was that anticipated benefits from the work was the proper criterion. The answer of the court to these contentions was that neither, taken by itself, "will furnish the correct rule, but, as a general rule, it requires a concurrence of both; for it will readily strike the mind of every one that a great enterprise may be embraced entirely within the limits of a county, and therefore exclusively local, without, in the slightest degree, being entitled to the distinctive character of a county purpose; while, on the other hand, another enterprise, though entirely without the county limits, may confer innumerable benefits upon and advance the best interests of the county, with as little claim to the character of a county enterprise." These observations are followed immediately by the further remark that it would be as improbable, as it is dangerous, to attempt to prescribe any definite rule to be looked to as furnishing any correct test on the subject. Pages 623, 624.

If it be that locality within the county is essential to render an improvement a "county purpose," it is clear that the work contemplated by this statute furnishes a compliance with this requirement, for under the act nothing is to be done outside of the county; and, this being so, it becomes, for all the purposes of this case, immaterial whether or not the absence of the feature, locality within the county, will always avoid as unconstitutional any legislation providing for public improvements or works through the instrumentality of a county government and county taxation, and consequently nothing should or will be said on that point.

It is not denied that an improvement must, to fall within the pale of "county purposes," be one for a public purpose, as taxation cannot be resorted to for private purposes, or for the benefit, aid, and promotion of private enterprises. This principle has never been questioned, but there has been, and always will be, more or less difficulty and conflict of opinion as to whether particular projects were or are for a public or a private purpose. In many cases the aid authorized to be given by counties in the construction of railroads was in the shape of subscription for capital stock of or of donations to the companies proposing to build the roads, and such subscriptions and donations were upheld almost invariably, (Cotten v. County Com'rs, supra; Commissioners v. King, 13 Fla. 451;) but with us it is assumed that this form of promoting the construction of highways has been inhibited by a constitutional provision, ordaining that "no tax shall be levied for the benefit of any chartered company of the state, nor for paying interest on any bonds issued by such chartered companies, or by counties, or by corporations, for the above-mentioned purpose," (section 7, art. 9.) There is, however, no feature here of aid, even in form, to any incorporated or other company, nor does the statute propose any benefit to any private purpose or private enterprise. The work is to be carried on under the direction and control of the public agencies named in the act, and no individual, natural or artificial, nor any company, incorporated or unincorporated, is the special object of the benefaction of the improvement contemplated, but it, on the contrary, is for the public without discrimination. The use of the river, when improved as contemplated by the statute, is not to be appropriated, either directly or indirectly, to or for the benefit of any one person as against another.

It was said in Cotten v. County Com'rs, supra, that to obtain a correct interpretation of the term "county purpose," as used in the constitution then in force, which constitution was framed in 1838-39, we must look to contemporaneous legislation on that subject, and the uniform action of the county courts under the territorial government, and that by making this reference it will be abundantly demonstrated that at that day county purposes were taken to embrace principally the erection and repair of court-houses and jails, the opening and maintaining public thoroughfares within the limits of their respective counties, by opening roads, building bridges and causeways, and keeping the same in repair, licensing and regulating ferries and toll-bridges. In somewhat the same strain, Judge Cooley, in treating of what constitute public purposes for which taxation may be laid, says, in his work on Taxation, (2d Ed.) p. 116, that in deciding whether, in a given case, the object for which the taxes are assessed is public or private, the courts must be governed mainly by the course and usage of the government, the objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied, what objects or purposes have been considered necessary to the support and for the proper use of the government, whether state or municipal; that whatever lawfully pertains to this, and is sanctioned by time and the acquiescence of the people, may well be held to belong to the public use, and proper for the maintenance of good government, though this may not be the only criterion of rightful taxation. And, on a subsequent page (130) of the same chapter, he observes that one of the most important functions of government is making provision for public roads for the use, of the people, the variety of which is great, and the mode of construction and operation difficult. No question, he asserts, is made of the competency of the legislature to levy taxes for the common highway, the improved turnpike and macadamized road, the planked or paved street, the canal, the tramway, or the railway, any or all of which may be constructed by the state, or, under state authority, by the municipal subdivisions of the state within whose limits they may be needed. Again, in Commissioners v. Migheis, 7 Ohio St. 109, a case characterized by Judge Dillon (section 23, Dill. Mun. Corp.) as one in which the distinction between cities and towns, or municipal corporations proper and involuntary quasi corporations, such as counties, is very clearly drawn, "the means of travel and transport" are designated among the purposes for which county organizations are created. Further, it is said in Nichol v. Mayor, etc., 9 Humph. 252, of "corporation purposes," as applicable to a city, that they include "all facilities of canals, roads, the improvement of rivers by which their navigable use is extended, by all which the commercial interests of a town are increased and expanded by reason of the increased facilities of communication thus furnished, by means of which the wealth of its population, individually and collectively, is increased, with a consequent increase of the comforts and enjoyments of life;" but, however, with the qualifying remark that these improvements must have some connection with the corporate town claiming them as corporate purposes more direct than that which would result from the general increased prosperity of the country by reason of such improvements made without a direct reference to or indirect connection with the town; and that the improvement must have such relation to the town as to be the medium through which this prosperity is attained, and must begin or terminate at the town, or pass through or so near to it as to be capable of affecting its direct interests.

Even if we were without more direct authority upon the question, it would seem difficult to hold that the improvement of the St. Johns river, within the limits of Duval county, is not a county purpose. The river is a highway, a means of travel and transport, useful to the local interests of the people of the county, and, to our minds, clearly within the local purpose for which counties and their governments are created. That the commerce and business on the river local to the county is small, or, in our judgment, of "no importance," does not change the character of the river or its improvement as a county purpose, nor affect the power of the legislature to authorize the improvement, or of the county authorities to make it in the manner prescribed. The function of the judiciary is to confine the legislature and the county authorities to the limits prescribed by the constitution, and not to control the exercise of any discretion that may be within such limits. That we might think the establishment of an ordinary road, or the widening or other improvement of an old one, or other exercise of firmly established instances of power, entirely unnecessary, or the improvement now in question unadvisable, cannot justify a usurpation upon our part of legislative or executive functions; and the same principle must control our action when we are urged to interfere on the ground that the subject of the improvement, or its result, may be of greater benefit to foreign interests than to those local to the county. That a river may be used more for intercourse and commerce between counties, or even states, than for that which appertains simply to the county proposing to improve it, and that its improvement will redound in a greater degree to the benefit of those engaged in such foreign transportation and traffic, is no stronger argument against the improvement of the river within the county than it would be to urge, as a reason for not making or improving an ordinary road, that the travel and carriage upon it affecting interests beyond the county, or by persons not resident in the county, would be more extensive than the local travel or carriage.

Still we are not without more direct adjudication upon the part of this improvement being a county purpose. The effect of the decision in Hasbrouck v. City of Milwaukee, 13 Wis. 37, is, that a legislature may authorize a city to issue bonds for the construction of a harbor, but that the construction of railroads, canals, harbors, and the like internal improvements cannot be done by a municipality without a specific grant of the power by the legislature. In Taylor v. Commissioners, 2 Jones, Eq. 141, an act authorizing the commissioners of an incorporated town to subscribe to the stock of a company incorporated for the purpose of improving the navigation of a river contiguous to the town, was held constitutional, although the improvement contemplated by the act was to begin several miles above the town, and to pass through several other counties than the one in which the town was situated. Goddin v. Crump, 8 Leigh, 120, is a case in which legislation authorizing the city of Richmond to subscribe for stock in a company incorporated for the purpose of connecting the navigable waters of the James river with those of the Ohio river, and providing for taxation to pay for the principal and interest of money borrowed to pay for such stock, was held constitutional, as being a corporate purpose. Among other observations of the opinion, it is said that the removal of the bar in James river above Warwick would be fairly a corporate act, since it would greatly redound to the advantage of Richmond, would benefit its trade, and diminish the charges which now incumber and embarrass it; for, though the work would be done beyond the limits of the city, the consequence of effects of it would be felt throughout its borders.

We fail to find in the authorities cited by appellant's counsel anything inconsistent with the above conclusions. They will be noticed in the succeeding paragraph.

Mobile Co. v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, is a case in which a statute of Alabama authorized the issue of bonds of the county of Mobile by its proper authorities, to be used by a designated board under authority granted them in the improvement, cleaning out, deepening, and widening of the river, harbor, and bay of Mobile, or any part thereof, or the making an artificial harbor. This board entered into a contract with Kimball and another for dredging a channel through Dog river bar, in Mobile bay, and the work was completed in March, 1873. Two of the contentions of appellant were (1) that the statute was invalid, as being in conflict with the commercial power vested in congress; (2) that the expense of the work could not, under the constitution of Alabama, be imposed on the county of Mobile, the work being for the benefit of the whole state. The views of the court as to the former of these objections are pertinent to the second subdivision of this opinion, and will be noticed in it. The conclusion reached as to the second objection was against it; and having previously observed that the issue of the bonds was the loan of the credit of the county for a work, public in its character, designed to be of public benefit to the state, but more especially and immediately to the county, (see, also, President & Com'rs of Revenue v. State, 45 Ala. 399,) yet it was held, assuming as true the contention that the act fastened upon one county the expense of an improvement for the whole state, that, when any public work is authorized, it rests with the legislature, unless restrained by constitutional provisions, to determine in what manner the means to defray its cost shall be raised, and that it may apportion the burden ratably among all the counties or other particular subdivisions of the state, or lay the greater share, or the whole, upon that county or portion of the state specially and immediately benefited by the expenditure, and that any injustice or oppression in the imposition of the expense on less than the whole state was remediable, not at the bar of the courts, but at the polls. In Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 107, an assessment of real estate in New Orleans for draining the swamps of that city was resisted on the ground that the proceeding deprived the owner of his property without due process of law. The court, while it avoided the danger of attempting a definition of "due process of law," held that there is due process of law when the statute requires that such a burden, or the fixing of a tax or assessment, before it becomes effectual, must be submitted to a court of justice, with notice to the owners of the property, all of whom have the right to appear and contest the assessment. Hagar v. Reclamation Dist., 111 U. S. 701, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663, decides nothing, for which notice can be taken of it here, but that it is within the discretion of the legislature of California to prescribe a system for reclaiming swamp lands, when essential to the health and prosperity of the community, and to lay the burden of doing it upon the districts and persons benefited. In the case of Board v. Weider, 64 Ill. 427, the constitution provided that the corporate authorities of counties, cities and towns, and other local subdivisions, naming them, might be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes; and it was held that, to come within the meaning of this provision, a tax for corporate purposes must be for such purposes, and such only, as are germane to the objects of the creation of the municipality, and at least such as have a legitimate connection with those objects, and a manifest relation thereto, and that a location or site for a state institution provided for by law,—a state reform school for juvenile offenders and vagrants,—in a certain township of a county, was not a county purpose justifying the issue of bonds of the county to provide such a site, and that a statute authorizing such issue of bonds was unconstitutional. Mather v. City of Ottawa, 114 Ill. 659, 3 N. E. Rep. 216, decides that, under the same constitutional provision, a municipal corporation is prohibited from levying a tax in aid of a merely private enterprise, although the purpose may be one that will add to the wealth and prosperity of the municipality. Bonds of the city were issued under an ordinance approved by a vote of the people authorizing the mayor to borrow a large sum "for the use of the said city, to be expended in developing the natural advantages of the city for manufacturing purposes," and providing for the issue of bonds for the same. The bonds were given to an agent of a private corporation, to be by him expended in the improvement of the water-power upon certain rivers within the city, and he negotiated them to a person residing in the city, and it was held that the bonds were void, not being issued for a corporate purpose. The decision in Board of Sup'rs of Will Co. v. People, 110 Ill. 511, is, in effect, as is stated in Cooley on Taxation, (page 180, note,) that a state may, by general law or otherwise, require a county to share with a town in the cost of an expensive bridge or road, though, in general, the towns bear the whole cost of such works. The question was as to the constitutionality of a statute which provided that, in certain cases, a county should pay half the expense of the construction of a bridge in a town, or between two towns, which the town authorities might desire to build, the town authorities to furnish the other half. The constitutional provisions invoked were (1) that the general assembly might "vest the corporate authorities of cities, towns, and villages with power to make local improvements by special assessments, or by special taxation of contiguous property or otherwise," and that for all other corporate purposes all municipal corporations may be vested with authority to assess and collect taxes, the same "to be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same;" (2) that the general assembly should not impose taxes upon municipal corporations, or the inhabitants or property thereof, for corporate purposes, "but shall require that all the taxable property within the limits of such corporations shall be taxed for the payment of debts contracted under authority of law," the same to be "uniform," as stated above. The reasons assigned why the statute conflicted with the above provisions of the organic law were that it attempted to confer discretionary power of local taxation upon persons other than the corporate authorities of the district to be taxed, and authorized the levy of a tax for township purposes on property not subject to the jurisdiction of the authority not levying the tax; that the legislature could not impose a debt upon a municipal corporation without its assent. The statute and tax were sustained, and while the conclusion of the opinion is that taxation, in pursuance of a general law of the state, for the purpose of building bridges, maintaining public highways, and similar objects in which the people of the state are directly interested, is not taxation for a strictly local purpose, within the meaning of the fundamental law set out, and that municipal authorities in levying taxes for such purposes, as distinguished from the mere private concerns of a municipality, are in a large sense merely agencies of the state in carrying into effect general laws enacted for the common good, it is also the conclusion and judgment of the court that the expense of such bridges and highways could be imposed on the county, as had been done in that case. The other authority referred to by appellant is section 746 of Dillon on Municipal Corporations, stating the provisions of the Illinois constitution, to the effect that "the corporate authorities of * * * cities * * * may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes, and that the supreme court of that state had held that the provision limited taxation by municipal authorities to local or corporate purposes, and restrained the legislature from granting the right of local or corporate taxation to other than the corporate authorities of the municipality or place to be taxed."

No comment on these cases seems to us necessary to show that they do not conflict with our conclusion that the improvement proposed by the act under consideration is a "county purpose," and the statute valid against the objection we have been considering.

II. It is also alleged in the bill that the general control of the river for purposes of navigation and commerce is under the general government of the United States, which has had the same surveyed, and lights and light-houses, buoys and channel marks, placed in and along said river, and has done, and is now engaged in, a large amount of public improvement in said river, both at its mouth and at different points beyond the limits of Duval county towards the source of said river, placing jetties therein, and in other respects endeavoring to improve the navigation of the river and to remove obstructions therefrom.

This part of the bill might be treated as abandoned by the appellant, as it is not legitimately within any discussion to be found in his brief. We, however, are not satisfied to permit the point to pass unnoticed; for if the statute constitutes, in view of those allegations, or for other apparent cause, an interference with the works or jurisdiction and policy of the general government, we ought to arrest promptly any attempt at its enforcement, and not leave this to be done in the courts of the United States, as it might be, at the instance of proper suitors in that forum. The obligation rests no less upon us than it would on a national tribunal having jurisdiction in the premises.

In Mobile Co. v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, cited supra, while it is held that the power conferred on congress by the commercial clause of the constitution—that giving power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states—is exclusive, so far as it relates to matters within its purview which are national in their character, and admit or require uniformity in any legislation affecting all the states, and that commerce with foreign countries and among the states, strictly considered, consists in "intercourse" and "traffic," including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities, and that to "regulate commerce," as thus defined, there must, to secure against discriminating state legislation, be only one system of rules applicable alike to the whole country and prescribable only by congress; yet it is also decided that state legislation is not forbidden touching matters either local in their nature or operation, or intended to be mere aids to commerce, and for which special regulation can more effectually provide. "The improvement of harbors, bays, and navigable streams within the states," says the opinion, "falls within this last category of cases. The control of congress over them is to insure freedom in their navigation, so far as that is essential to the exercise of its commercial power. Such freedom is not encroached upon by the removal of obstructions to their navigability or by other legitimate improvement. The states have as full control over their purely internal commerce as congress has over commerce among the several states and with foreign nations, and to promote the growth of that internal commerce, and insure its safety, they have an undoubted right to remove obstructions from their harbors and rivers, deepen their channels, and improve them generally, if they do not impair their free navigation, as permitted under the laws of the United States, or defeat any system for their improvement provided by the general government." The statute was held not to be in conflict with the constitution of the United States. The decision in Escanaba & L. M. Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 185, was that the Chicago river and its branches, although lying within the limits of the state of Illinois, are navigable waters of the United States, over which congress, in the exercise of its power under the commercial clause of the constitution, may exercise control to the extent necessary to protect, preserve, and impose their free navigation; but until that body acts the state has plenary authority over bridges across them, and may vest in the city of Chicago jurisdiction over the construction, repair, and use of these bridges within the city; and, further, that there was nothing in the "ordinance of 1787," or the subsequent legislation of congress, precluding the exercise of such power by the state. The cases of Willson v. Marsh Co., 2 Pet. 245; Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. 713; Pound v. Turck, 95 U. S. 459; Cardwell v. Bridge Co., 113 U. S. 205, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 423; Hamilton v. Railroad Co., 119 U. S. 280, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 206; and Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 125 U. S. 1, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 811,—are illustrations of the plenary power of a state, in the absence of and until congress acts on the same subject, to authorize the construction of bridges and dams, over and in navigable rivers lying entirely within its borders, and the consequent obstruction of such streams. The case of Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 543, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 313, is, however, like that of Mobile Co. v. Kimball, one involving the feature of an improvement of navigable waters under state authority. The legislature of Illinois adopted measures for improving the navigation of the Illinois river, including the construction of a lock and dam at two points on the river. The works were constructed at large expense principally borne by the state, it being represented that a small portion was contributed by the United States, and tolls were prescribed under the state legislation for the passage of vessels through the locks. The complainants owned steamboats and barges engaged in interstate commerce, which had to pass through such locks, and alleged that prior to the construction of one of the dams they were able to navigate the river without interruption, except such as was incident to its ordinary use in its natural state; and that the dams were an impediment to the free navigation of the river, and wholly impeded, except at extreme high water, the navigation of the river by steam-boats and other vessels which were previously accustomed to navigate it, unless they passed through the locks, and stating the amount they had paid as tolls imposed upon the cargoes of ice, and for the passage of their boats and barges through the locks. The toll charges were sustained. In the opinion it is said: "The exaction of tolls for passage through the locks is as compensation for the use of artificial facilities constructed, not as an impost upon the navigation of the stream. * * * For outlays caused by such works the state may exact reasonable tolls. They are like charges for the use of wharfs and docks constructed to facilitate the landing of persons and freight, and the taking them on board, or for the repair of vessels. The state is interested in the domestic as well as in the interstate and foreign commerce conducted on the Illinois river, and to increase its facilities, and thus augment its growth, it has full power. It is only when, in the judgment of congress, its action is deemed to encroach upon the navigation of the river as a means of interstate and foreign commerce, that that body may interfere and control or supersede it. If, in the opinion of the state, greater benefit would result to her commerce by the improvements made than by leaving the river in its natural state,—and on that point the state must necessarily determine for itself,—it may authorize them, although increased inconvenience and expense may thereby result to the business of individuals."

Answering the suggestion that appropriations by congress had been expended in improving the Chicago river, it is said in Escanaba & L. M. Transp. Co. v. Chicago, supra, that no money had been expended above the bridge objected to in that suit, which bridge was erected and regulated by the city under state legislation; and that consequently no bridge interfered with the navigation of any portion of the river which had thus been improved, but that, if it were otherwise, it was not perceived how the improvement could affect the ordinary means of crossing it by ferries and bridges; that, "to render the action of the state invalid in constructing or authorizing the construction of bridges over one of its navigable streams, the general government must directly interfere so as to supersede its authority, and annul what it has done in the matter." In Bridge Co. v. Hatch, supra, another case of a bridge authorized by state legislation, it is held that there must be a direct statute of the United States in order to bring within the scope of its laws obstructions and nuisances in navigable streams within a state, they being offenses against the laws of the state within which the navigable waters lie, but, in the absence of a federal statute, not an offense against the United States. That, until congress acts respecting a navigable stream entirely within a state, the state has plenary power, yet congress is not concluded by anything that the state, or individuals by its authority or acquiescence, may have done, from assuming entire control and abating any erections that may have been made, and preventing any other from being made except in conformity with such regulations as it may impose. The fact of the appropriation by congress of money to be expended in the improvement of the river, and that of making of the city, where the bridge was, a port of entry, were urged by counsel as objections to the authority of the state and the validity of its legislation, and were disposed of thus by the court: "The argument of the appellees, that congress must be deemed to have assumed police power over the Willamette river in consequence of having expended money in improving its navigation, and of having made Portland a port of entry, is not well founded. Such acts are not sufficient to establish the police power of the United States over the navigable streams to which they relate. Of course, any interference with the operations, constructions, or improvements made by the general government, or any violation of a port law enacted by congress, would be an offense against the laws and authority of the United States; and an action or suit brought in consequence thereof would be one arising under the laws of the United States. But no such violation or interference is shown by the allegations of the bill in * * * this case, which simply states the fact that improvements have been made in the river by the government, without stating where, and that Portland has been created a port of entry." See, also, Cooley, Const. Lim. (5th Ed.) 728–733.

Viewed in the light of these authorities, we fail to see in the allegations of the bill anything fatal to the statute. The statute does not attempt to regulate any matter which is national in its character, or affects all the states, and admits of or requires uniformity of regulation; or to interfere with the control of the river for any such purposes by the general government; but, on the contrary, it provides for an improvement purely local in its character. The fact that such government has surveyed the river, and established lights and light-houses, buoys and channel marks, in and along it, does not necessarily, if at all, oust a state of its jurisdiction to improve the navigation of the river, and remove obstructions from it, or to authorize the same to be done. The improvement to be effected under the act may not, and in so far as the record before us and the statute show do not, in any wise, affect such surveys, nor the purposes of such lights, light-houses, and buoys, and channel marks; and surely, if it be that their establishment has the effect to prevent an improvement by the state which would interfere with their purposes, a statute which does not specify an inconsistent improvement will be construed to intend and authorize only those improvements not interfering with them, and will be upheld for such purposes, and the responsibility will be upon the agencies authorized to make the improvements to do it in such a manner as not to result in an interference, and this, too, at the peril of being arrested in the prosecution of their work.

The allegations of the bill as to the jetties and other improvements of navigation of the river by the United States are answered by the observations just made, and those quoted in the next preceding paragaph, from the cases of Escanaba & L. M. Transp. Co. v. Chicago and Bridge Co. v. Hatch. The fact that the general government may have made or may be making improvements at one or more places on a navigable river, lying, as does the St. Johns, entirely within a state, does not, of itself, preclude the right of the state to make improvements at different places. Neither the bill nor the statute shows any interference with the operations, constructions, or improvements of the general government, or any violation of any law of the United States.

The bill alleges also that any and all work done upon the St. Johns river under this act must and will be controlled by the government of the United States, and except as that government, and its officers and agents, may prevent, the defendants, appellees, nor any officers or agents of Duval county, will be permitted to conduct and carry on the proposed work upon the river, except under the direction of the general government, its agents and officers. This allegation, whether considered as an inference from that immediately preceding it, and set out at the head of this subdivision of the opinion, or as an independent assertion, is a mere conclusion of law, which is justified by nothing stated in the bill or appearing on the face of the statute.

III. The validity of the statute is also assailed on the ground that it does not provide any means or method of creating a sinking fund or other fund to pay the principal and interest on the bonds. There is no express provision of this kind in the act. If it be, however, that this power is not otherwise given or is not implied by the authority given to contract the stated debt, or, in other words, to issue not exceeding $300,000 of coupon bonds of the county, in denominations of $500 and $1,000, the principal of which is to be payable at the end of not less than 20, nor more than 40, years, and to bear interest at not more than 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, the bonds to be engraved, signed, and sealed as directed in the statute, the same to be sold at not less than their face value, and the proceeds applied to improving the navigation of St. Johns river and removing obstructions therefrom, we still do not think this a valid objection to the act or to the issue of the bonds.

IV. Another objection to the act is the alleged non-compliance with the local legislation clause of the constitution, § 21, art. 3, which is: "In all cases enumerated in the preceding section all laws shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the state, but in all cases not enumerated or excepted in that section the legislature may pass special or local laws: provided, that no local or special bill shall be passed unless notice of the intention to apply therefor shall have been published in the locality where the matter or thing to be affected may be situated, which notice shall state the substance of the contemplated law, and shall be published at least sixty days prior to the introduction into the legislature of such bill, and in the manner to be provided by law. The evidence that such notice has been published shall be established in the legislature before such bill shall be passed."

An act of May 31, 1887, c. 3708, p. 73, St. 1887, defines the method of publication and of the proof thereof under this provision of the organic law. It requires that it shall be published in a newspaper in the county or counties where the person, matter, or thing to be affected resides or is situated, at least once a week for at least 60 days, or by posting the same at not less than three public places therein, one of which is to be the court-house door of the county or counties, and another the locality or localities where the person, matter, or thing may reside or be for the time stated, such notice to contain a short statement of the object desired by said special or local legislation. The evidence required of the publishing in a newspaper is the affidavit of the publisher, and that required of the posting is the affidavit of the person posting, such affidavits to be appended to a copy of the notice.

The notice alleged to have been published in this case, as shown by an exhibit to the bill, is as follows: "Notice. Notice is hereby given that an application will be made to the legislature of the state of Florida at its next session for the passage of an act enabling the county of Duval to issue bonds, not exceeding two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the purpose of deepening and otherwise improving the channel of the St. Johns river, within the county of Duval, and for other purposes of public improvement." February 21, 1891.

There is attached to this copy of the notice an affidavit made December 11, 1891, by the business manager of a designated newspaper published in Duval county, and states that the notice, which is annexed, had been published in the paper once in each week "for ninety-seven days, beginning on the 21st day of February, 1891, and ending May 28th, 1891."

The objections are: (1) That the notice does not state the substance of the act, as it gives notice of application for an act enabling the county to issue, not exceeding $250,000 of bonds, to be used for the purpose of deepening and otherwise improving the channel of the river, whereas the act as passed authorizes the issue of bonds to an amount not exceeding $300,000, and the application of the proceeds thereof to the work of improving the navigation of the river, and removing obstructions therefrom, within the county of Duval. (2) That the notice was published once a month, beginning February 21, 1891, and the act was introduced into the legislature May 2d of the same year. (3) That the records of the proceedings of the legislature do not show that evidence that the notice had been published as required by law was established and proven in the legislature before the act was passed, nor any evidence of such notice.

The obligation resting upon the legislative department of the government to conform to the requirements of this provision of the constitution, and to the statute law enforcing the same, cannot be questioned. No local or special bill, within the purview of the proviso of this section of the organic law, should be passed, except and until notice of the intention to apply for the passage of the same has been given in the manner contemplated by the constitution, and authorized legislation thereunder; nor is it ever to be presumed that any branch of the legislative department will give its sanction to any such local or special legislation until legal and satisfactory evidence that such notice has been published shall be "established in the legislature." This feature of the fundamental law is as binding upon the consciences of those intrusted with the legislative function of the government as is any other part of the constitution, but this truth is by no means conclusive that power has been given the judiciary to sit in judgment upon the performance of the duty thus imposed upon a co-ordinate branch of the government. No such power has been given to the judiciary. To decide whether or not the notice has been given is a legislative function, not only in its nature, but as a result of the provision that "the evidence that such notice has been published shall be established in the legislature before such bill shall be passed," which provision, as excluding any interference in the matter by the judiciary, supplements the inhibition pronounced by the second article of the constitution, that no person properly belonging to one of the departments of the government shall exercise any powers appertaining to either of the others, except in cases expressly provided for by that instrument.

We are not without authority sustaining this conclusion. The constitution of North Carolina, framed in 1868, provided (section 12, art. 2) that "the general assembly shall not have power to pass any private law unless it shall be made to appear that thirty days' notice of application to pass such law shall have been given under such direction and in such manner as shall be provided by law." In Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244, where the objection to an act was that it had been passed without 30 days' notice of the application, the conclusion of the court was that, taking the statute to be a mere "private act," the ratification certified by the lieutenant governor and speaker of the house of representatives made it a matter of record which could not be impeached before the courts in a collateral way; that there could be no doubt that acts of the legislature, like judgments of courts, are matters of record; and the idea that the "verity of the record" can be averred against in a collateral proceeding is opposed to all the authorities. The first constitution of West Virginia ordained (section 12, art. 7) that no new county should be formed having an area of less than 400 square miles; or if another county be thereby reduced below that area; or if any territory be thereby taken from any county containing less than above number of square miles; and that no new county should be formed containing a white population of less than 4,000; or if the white population be thereby reduced below that number; or if any county containing less than 4,000 white inhabitants be thereby reduced in area. A suit was brought to restrain the collection of county and township taxes of Lincoln county, the bill alleging that, at the time of the creation of the county, A. D. 1867, it did not contain 400 square miles, or 4,000 white population, and that by its creation the county of Cabell was reduced below the area of 400 square miles; and that, although by an act of 1868 sufficient territory was added to Lincoln county to give it an area of 400 square miles, its population was still below 4,000, and Cabell county was still further reduced in territory by that act; and that, though by an act of 1869 additional population and territory were added to each of the named counties, the county of Cabell still contained less than 400 square miles. The supreme court of that state in Lusher v. Scates, 4 W. Va. 11, held that the subject of creating new counties belonged to the legislature alone, and, to exercise the power conferred, it must inform itself of the existence of the facts, including those as to area and population, and others indicated above, prerequisite to enable it to act on the subject; and that how it might do so, and upon what evidence, the legislature alone must determine, and that its determination, when made, concluded all further inquiry by all other departments of the government; and that its final action, terminating, in an act of legislation in due form, must, of necessity, presuppose and determine all the facts prerequisite to the enactment. That the courts could not go into an inquiry as to the truth or falsity of the facts upon which the legislation is supposed to be predicated, where the legislature has sole jurisdiction of the subject. In Rumsey v. People, 19 N. Y. 41, it was held that the question whether the territory of a new county contained a sufficient representative population, such question involving the legality of its organization, was one which the legislature determined as a question of fact, and that its determination was not reviewable elsewhere; and in De Camp v. Eveland, 19 Barb. 81, the decision was that the presumption that the legislature acted on good and sufficient evidence of there being the population required by the constitution was conclusive. See, also, Advisory Opinion, (Matter of Impeachment,) 14 Fla. 289; People v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44; Day v. Stetson, 8 Me. 365; McClinch v. Sturgis, 72 Me. 288; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 163, note 2.

If there is any defect in the notice or in its publication, or in the proof thereof, we have no jurisdiction to consider it. That jurisdiction is in the legislature, and has been exercised, and that department of the government has, by the passage of the act under consideration, the validity or formality of which passage is not otherwise questioned, pronounced its judgment, evidenced by the journals and the act, a record of the highest character, that the special or local legislation clause of the constitution, and of the legislation thereunder, have been fully complied with, and we are concluded by that judgment. Charges in a bill in equity, and the admission of them by demurrer or otherwise, that these constitutional and statutory provisions have not been complied with, cannot extend our jurisdiction. The legislature, not the courts, is the guardian of the interests which the fundamental law has sought to protect by requiring notice of local or special legislation, and that department is responsible to the people for the due protection of these interests by seeing that the constitution and the law are complied with.

As to the objection that the records of the proceedings of the legislature do not show that evidence of the publication of the notice was established in the legislature before the act was passed, it is enough to say that the constitution does not require that the legislature should make its record do so, and the courts are without jurisdiction to require it. Cooley, Const. Lim. 163, 164; Const. Fla. 1885, §§ 12, 17, 21, art. 3.

V. There are also certain objections concerning the election held under the statute, the canvass of the votes, and the resolution as to the issue of the bonds, which can be more satisfactorily dealt with after stating certain provisions of the statute and the averments of the bill as to such matters.

The act (section 1) authorizes and directs the board of county commissioners to call an election to be held by the registered voters of said county, at which the registered voters are authorized to vote for or against the issuing of the bonds provided for; such election (section 2) to be held at indicated places, provision being made for the appointment or selection of inspectors. It then (section 3) provides that "the election shall be conducted and returns made thereof in the manner prescribed by law for conducting elections, and canvassing and making returns of votes cast," and (section 4) that any person "whose name is not already enrolled as a registered voter in said county, and who is entitled to be registered as a voter," shall be allowed to register at the office of the supervisor of registration at any time after the ordering of the election, and until the third day prior to the holding of the election; and directs that the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the sheriff a paper book for each election district, containing, in alphabetical order, the names "of all persons registered as voters of such districts, including the names of all persons previously registered whose names remain upon the registration books in the office of said supervisor;" and makes it the duty of the sheriff to deliver these books to the inspectors, and the duty of the supervisor to keep open his books daily except Sunday, from the day of the ordering of the election, to and including the third day previous to the day appointed for the election, and to "register as voters all persons who apply to be registered and are entitled thereto, and to deliver to each person registered a certificate of such registration, as provided in the law on that subject, free of expense to persons registered." It also enacts (section 5) that "every person whose name shall appear on the registration books, and every person holding a certificate of registration showing that he is a registered voter, and who has not lost the right to vote for any cause as provided by law, shall have the right to vote at such election." The sixth section of the statute enacts that the board of county commissioners, at "any regular or special meeting" after the passage of the act, shall, by resolution to be recorded in their minutes, appoint a day for the holding of the election, such day to be not less than ten days after the first publication of a copy of the resolution in three or more newspapers in the county; and that the board shall appoint the inspectors "to conduct the election, and make returns of the votes cast;" and that such returns shall show the whole number of votes cast at the election, and how many of them were cast "For bonds," and how many "Against bonds;" and that said returns shall, within two days after said election, be delivered to the clerk of the circuit court, to be laid before the board of county commissioners, which board shall publicly canvass the same at their next regular or special meeting, and declare the result of the vote, which vote shall be recorded by the clerk. The seventh section declares what words, viz., "For bonds" or "Against bonds," shall be printed or written on a ballot, and that every such ballot shall be counted as lawful without regard to the form or size of the paper, or the color thereof, "to the end that the true expression of the will of the voter may be ascertained;" and the eighth section provides that, if a majority of the electors vote "For bonds," the county commissioners shall issue the bonds, as provided by subsequent sections of the statute.

The bill, including the records of the county commissioners made part thereof as an exhibit, shows that "the board met this 12th day of November, in special session, called by the chairman for the purpose of ordering an election" as to issuing bonds under the act in question, and that there were present three members, Powell, the chairman, Baer, and De Cottes, but the other members, Kelly and Pickett, were absent, and the board, in consequence of their absence, adjourned to the 14th day of the same month; on which day it met again, all the members, except Kelly, being present, and passed a resolution calling an election to be held Thursday, December 3, 1891, and appointed inspectors of the election.

Notice of the election was given, and the election was held on the day appointed. The bill states that the total number of votes cast was 2,198, of which 1,455 were "For bonds," and 714 "Against bonds," and 20 "Not for bonds," and 8 blank. That on December 2, 1891, the full board met in regular session, and adjourned to the 9th day of the same month, on which day they met in adjourned session for the purpose of canvassing the vote of such election, at which adjourned meeting only four commissioners, Powell, De Cottes, Kelly, and Pickett, were present, and at such adjourned meeting proceeded to canvass the returns, which were presented by the clerk under seal, from every election district in the county except one, at which no election had been held, and declared the result of the election as set forth above; and at the same meeting a resolution, reciting the law and the facts and the result of the election, and directing the preparation and issue of $300,000 of bonds in accordance with such act and election, was passed.

With the above statement we will present the objections made in the bill and brief, and our views of the same.

It is objected in the bill that the minutes of the board of county commissioners do not show "what notice was given" of the special meeting of November 12th, and also that the commissioners were not authorized by the statute in question, or other law, to take the action had at the meetings of November 14th and December 9th. And it is said in the brief of appellant's counsel that the ground mentioned in the bill is that the meetings of November 14th and December 9th were not "regular or special" meetings, and that the action taken at the meeting of November 14th, calling the election, was unauthorized and void; and it is further said that the proceedings of the commissioners attached to the bill show that on November 12th, and without any record or showing of a previous call of the board, three commissioners, Powell, Baer, and De Cottes, met in an alleged "called" meeting of the board, and that they adjourned this called meeting to November 14th, but that their record does not show that notice of the call or adjournment was given; and that on the 14th of November they met and issued the call for an election. "The question here presented," says counsel for appellant, "is, had these three commissioners power to adjourn the alleged called meeting, and at the adjourned meeting to order this election?"

In Douglass v. County Com'rs, 23 Fla. 419, 2 South. Rep. 776, it was held that a special or called meeting of county commissioners, in which all the members participated, the same having been held before the day to which the board adjourned at a preceding session, was valid. If it be that personal notice to each commissioner of both the time of the meeting and the subject-matter to be considered is necessary to the legality of a special or called meeting, (a proposition which we do not mean to deny,—Dill. Mun. Corp. § 236; Smyth v. Darley, 2 H. L. Cas. 789,) or if it be, as implied by the objection, that the record of the commissioners must show such notice as an essential to the validity of the meeting, (a point not affirmed by the authorities found in our investigations,—Sargent v. Webster, 13 Metc. (Mass.) 497, 504; Insurance Co. v. Sortwell, 8 Allen, 217; Chosen Freeholders v. State, 24 N. J. Law, 718,) our opinion still is that the statements of the minutes of November 12th, quoted above, is sufficient evidence of such notice having been given, where, as here, it is not charged and proved that notice was not given. The board having then met legally or upon due notice to all the members, the three members, a majority of the board, then present had authority to adjourn the meeting to a subsequent day, which it seems a majority could have done. People v. Common Council, 5 Lans. 142. Each member present had notice of the adjournment, and those not present at the adjourned meeting were charged in law with notice thereof. Smith v. Law, 21 N. Y. 296. The adjourned special meeting was a continuation of the former one, and anything done at it concerning the election was as legal as if it had been done before the adjournment. Scadding v. Lorant, 5 Eng. Law & Eq. 16; City of New Orleans v. Brooks, 36 La. Ann. 641; Ex parte Mirande, 73 Cal. 365, 14 Pac. Rep. 888; Chamberlain v. Dover, 13 Me. 466. The power of adjournment is incident to special meetings, (Dill. Mun. Corp. § 285,) as it is to regular meetings, (People v. Martin, 5 N. Y. 22; Goodel v. Baker, 8 Cow. 285; Chamberlain v. Dover, supra,) and it is from this power that adjourned meetings arise.

As to the meetings of November 14th and December 9th not being either "regular or special" meetings, within the meaning of the statute, it is, of course, entirely clear that the former was an adjourned special meeting, and the latter an adjourned regular meeting, as is shown by copies of the minutes of the commissioners annexed to the bill. In Ex parte Mirande, supra, it was held that an ordinance passed at an adjourned meeting was not invalidated by the fact that the clerk of the board described the adjournment, in the record of the proceedings, as a "recess." So, of course, the use of the word "session," instead of "meeting," in the record of the proceedings, does not invalidate the meetings. Besides this, the canvass of the returns and the adoption of the resolution on the 9th of December were at a regular or special meeting, within the meaning of the statute; or, in other words, the adjourned meeting of that day was a lawful meeting for such purposes. It is to be observed by the minutes that the "regular monthly session" of December 2d was attended by all the members, and, after transacting all the regular monthly business, they adjourned to meet on the 9th day of the same month, at 10 o'clock A. M. The minutes of December 2d do not show the purpose of the adjournment, but the presumption is that it was for a lawful purpose. Moreover, each member was charged with notice of any action lawful to be taken at such adjourned meeting; and anything done at such adjourned meeting which it was within the power of the board to do was as lawful as if it had been done by a full board, instead of only four members. Smith v. Law, 21 N. Y. 296. Each member was as much charged with notice of lawful action to be taken at such adjourned meeting as he would have been had the meeting not adjourned, but had continued in session from day to day until the last day mentioned; and the public are as much bound as if a full board had been present on that day. By the adjournment each member was in law charged with the official duty of being present at the time to which they adjourned, to attend to any business within the power of the board; and if it was within the power of the board to act on these returns, or to pass the resolution as to the bonds, the absence of one of the commissioners, Mr. Baer, from the adjourned meeting, does not impair the legality, for he and the other members adjourned to the time for the purpose of doing any lawful business. The remaining inquiry, under this head, consequently is whether the statutory grant of power is so limited as to preclude the board from exercising the authority at a meeting originating prior to the election, but extended by a full board beyond the receipt of the returns. We do not think the purpose of the provision that the board "shall, at its next regular or special meeting, canvass the returns, and declare the result of the vote," was, even in so far as the words italicised can be taken to indicate a legislative intent, to exclude from a meeting originating before, but continuing after, the election, or the receipt of the returns by the clerk, the power to make the canvass; but, in our judgment, the purpose was to secure promptness of action in the matter, and the law made it the duty of the clerk to lay the returns before the board as soon as it should be in session after he received them, and made it the duty of the board to canvass them whenever they should be in session, whether it should be a regular or a special meeting, and it charged each member with notice that such duty would be incident to any meeting, whether regular or special, at which the returns might be received, regardless of the fact that the meeting may have originated before the election or receipt of the returns, or, if a special meeting, may have been called for another purpose. The power to canvass was given to the board, and the mere fact that a meeting originated before the election or the receipt of the returns is not made the ground for excluding the exercise of the power. Had the board remained in session till after the election, and then received the returns, they could have canvassed them, and the power to do it was not lost by the adjournment. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 287. In view of the fact that, having finished all the regular monthly business, yet they adjourned to the day stated, and on that day took up these matters, is of itself presumptive evidence that they were the purpose of the adjournment, and this presumption is aided by the statement upon the minutes of the adjourned meeting that they met for the purpose of canvassing the returns, which statement is not sufficient to exclude the idea that the cognate and dependent matter of issuing the bonds was within the purpose of the adjournment. This adjourned meeting was certainly tantamount to a subsequent special meeting, of whose time and purpose all the members were notified.

The result of the election, as ascertained by the canvass, was that 2,198 were the whole number of votes cast, and that for bonds there were 1,455, and against bonds 714, not for bonds 21, and blank 8, votes. The third objection, as stated in the bill, is that 1,772 of the voters had not paid the capitation or poll-tax for the year 1890, and only 426 voted who had paid it for that year, and 2,132 voted who had not paid such tax for the year 1891, and 60 persons voted who had paid it, "as shown by comparison of the poll-lists with the record of payment of poll-taxes." That no person was entitled to vote at said election who had not paid the poll-tax for 1890 and 1891, and that by reason of the above-stated number of votes having been cast at said election for bonds by persons who had not paid said poll-taxes, and were not entitled to vote, the alleged majority was obtained in favor of issuing said bonds, and, if said votes had not been received, a majority of votes were not cast for bonds. That the public records in the office of the tax collector of Duval county show that, of the persons who voted at said election, only 426 had paid their poll-tax for 1890, and only 60 had paid it for 1891.

The question presented by this objection is whether or not the payment of the poll or capitation tax was a qualification for voting at the election.

The constitution (section 8, art. 6,) provides that the legislature shall have power to make the payment of the capitation tax a prerequisite for voting. The legislature of 1889 passed a statute (chapter 3850, approved May 25th) enacting that a capitation tax of one dollar shall be assessed against all male citizens of the state, of 21 years and upwards, and that, 30 days prior to any general, special, or municipal election to be held in this state, the collectors of revenue of each county shall furnish to the supervisors of registration in each of their respective counties a list of all persons who have paid their capitation taxes for two years next preceding the year in which any general or special or municipal election is to be held, and that the supervisors shall note, on the registration books now required by law to be furnished to inspectors of elections, the names of all persons who have paid their capitation or poll taxes, and only such persons shall be deemed qualified electors and authorized to vote at any general, special, or municipal election; it being provided, however, that no person who was not a resident of this state for any years for which a poll-tax is by this act required to be paid, but is otherwise a qualified voter, shall be prevented from voting by reason of not having paid such taxes; and, further, that all persons who may have arrived at the age of 21 years after the year for which a poll-tax is required by this act to be paid shall not be prevented from voting by reason of not having paid such poll-tax. There is also a provision that the poll-tax of 1889 alone need be paid, in so far as the general election of 1890 is concerned. It also directs the preparation of tax-receipts, to be issued by the collectors of taxes to all persons upon payment of taxes hereinbefore required, and the presentation of such tax-receipts, obtained at least 30 days prior to any general, special, or municipal election, by a registered voter whose vote is challenged on the ground that his name does not appear on the lists provided for above as having paid his capitation tax, is made an answer to such challenge.

Recurring to the act for the improvement of the St. Johns river, as it is set forth in the first part of this subdivision of the opinion, we find that it is a complete system of itself, and that there is in it no requirement that the payment of any poll-taxes shall be a qualification or prerequisite to voting, nor any provision that the collectors of taxes shall furnish supervisors of registration with the names of persons who have paid their capitation taxes, or that the latter officers shall note on the registration lists or paper books furnished inspectors the names of such persons. There was no previous law providing for an election of this kind; neither the general election law of 1889, c. 3879, nor the county bond act of 1877, (McClel. Dig. 129-132,) do so. This election is not one within the meaning of that provision of the poll-tax act which directs the supervisors of registration to note on the registration books, "now required by law to be furnished to inspectors," the names of persons who have paid the tax. The notice of election prescribed by either of these acts, nor the time for registration provided by the act of 1889, or by the other, if it makes any provision, nor the mode of making and canvassing returns of election under either, in so far as the officers to whom they are to be made, or by whom they are to be canvassed, or as to requiring duplicate returns, have not been adopted by the statute under consideration. It is a perfect system within itself, and adopts no provision of any other statute, except in so far as its third section appropriates, for supplying any deficiency in its own provisions as to the conduct and returns of the election, the existing law on those subjects. When we consider this, and the fact that the legislature, though it made it the duty of the supervisor of registration to furnish inspectors with lists of registered voters, but did not require that he should note the names of persons who had paid the poll-taxes as is required by the act of 1889, as to special or other elections to which it is applicable, and, further, that it made no requirement that the collector of taxes should furnish him with the information necessary to the performance of that duty, the only reasonable conclusion is that the law-makers did not intend to make the payment of the tax a prerequisite to or qualification for voting at such election. There is in the act nothing inconsistent with this conclusion; but, on the contrary, there is apparent upon its face the intent that persons duly registered as voters, and retaining the qualifications which preserve the legality of their registration, should vote independent of any question of paying the poll-tax. This is the result of the provisions of the first, fourth, and fifth sections of the statute, supra; and when, in the last of these sections, it is said that "every person whose name shall appear on the registration books, and every person holding a certificate showing that he is registered as a voter, and who has not lost the right to vote for any cause as provided by law, shall have the right to vote at such election," the meaning of the words last italicised is the loss of the qualifications which preserve a person's right to have his name kept on the registration list; or, in other words, any of those which would, had they existed at the time of his registration, have rendered it illegal. Sections 1, 4, 5, art. 6, Const.; section 1, c. 3879, p. 88, Laws 1889. Legal registration, with a retention of the requisites therefor, is the qualification, and nothing not essential to it is a disqualification. Payment of the poll-tax is not such an essential.

Another objection is that certificates of the above election were returned to the county judge, supervisor of registration, and the clerk of the circuit court, and the oaths of inspectors and poll-lists of persons who voted were returned to the supervisor of registration, together with the ballots in the ballot-boxes used. That the canvass of the votes was made by the county commissioners from the returns made to the clerk of the circuit court and county judge, and no canvass was made by the county judge and supervisor of registration, and a member of the board of county commissioners, or in any manner pointed out by the acts "to provide for elections generally, and for returns of elections," (chapters 3879, 4040, St. Fla.,) and that the canvass was therefore illegal.

It was unnecessary for the inspectors to send certificates of the result of the election to the county judge and supervisor of registration, but entirely immaterial that they did so. The provision of the general election law requiring certificates to be sent to them was rendered inapplicable to this election by the provision of the act in question requiring the return or certificate of result should be delivered to the clerk of the circuit court. That the oaths of inspectors and poll-lists were sent to the supervisor of registration, with the ballots and ballot-boxes, is entirely immaterial, if irregular; yet we are not prepared to say that the general election law did not require that this disposition should be made of the poll-lists and oaths of inspectors. Such irregularities do not affect a canvass of returns by a body authorized to perform the function, and doing it properly. It was the duty of the board of county commissioners to canvass the returns, and the county judge and supervisor of registration had nothing to do with it, and the fact that the commissioners had before them a return made to the county judge, as well as that made to the clerk, was immaterial.

VI. The only point to be noticed is that involved in a statement made in the bill to the effect that the statute provides that the bonds "shall bear the seal of the aforesaid county of Duval," and that at the time the act was passed the county had no seal, but that the defendants on their meeting of December 9th attempted to adopt the seal of the circuit court for the county as the seal of the county, and intend to attach the impression of this seal to the bonds. The action of the board on this subject was a resolution "that the seal of the circuit court for Duval county and of this board now in use is hereby adopted as the common seal of Duval county."

The constitution of 1868 provided for circuit courts, dividing the state into seven circuits, and directing that at least two terms should be held every year in each county, and for a clerk of the circuit court in each county; and for county courts in such county, and for a county judge, who was judge of the county court; and these county courts were given criminal jurisdiction, civil jurisdiction in certain cases at law, and surrogate or probate powers. The same organic law also made the clerk of the circuit court in each county "clerk of the county court, and of the board of county commissioners, recorder, and ex officio auditor of the county." The legislature of 1868 (McClel. Dig. pp. 931, 932) made it the immediate duty of the attorney general to devise suitable seals for the use of the circuit courts, and county courts in each county, or to approve and adopt the seals then in use in any county where the same might be appropriate, and to deposit in the office of the secretary of state, and that of the clerk of the supreme court, immediately after he should devise or adopt the same, a true description of each of such seals, with an impression thereof in wax, wafer, or other material. The act also authorized the attorney general, whenever it should be necessary to devise a new seal for the circuit court of any county, to cause to be manufactured the necessary seal and press for using the same, and directed that he should cause to be manufactured the necessary presses and seals for the several county courts, and that he should transmit to the clerks of the courts in each county the presses and seals devised for each county, and that, from and after the day of receiving such seals by the clerk of any county, such seals should be, respectively, the seals of the circuit court and of the county court, as the same should be designated by the attorney general. The statute also enacted that the seal provided for each county court should be the official seal of that court in all criminal and civil, including probate, matters wherein seals are required to be used, and "the official seal of the clerk as clerk of the board of county commissioners." Another provision of the act was that until such seals should be devised and procured, and received by the clerks as aforesaid, the seal heretofore used as the seal of the circuit court in each county shall be continued to be used as the seal of that court, and "the seal heretofore used as the seal of the probate court shall be recognized as the seal of the county court, and of the clerk of the board of county commissioners, until a new seal shall be procured and received as aforesaid."

In 1875 the constitution was so amended as to take from the county courts their criminal jurisdiction, and civil jurisdiction except in probate matters, and county judges were retained and given a limited civil and criminal jurisdiction. In the revision made of the constitution in 1885, circuit courts are retained as a part of the judicial system, and county judges (sections 16, 17, art. 5) are given a limited civil jurisdiction, and general surrogate or probate powers, and jurisdiction of such criminal cases as the legislature may prescribe. The legislature is also authorized to create, in any county where it may be necessary, a county court having jurisdiction in all cases at law, where the demand or value of property involved does not exceed $500, and of forcible entry and unlawful detainer, and of misdemeanors, and appellate jurisdiction in civil cases arising before justices of the peace, and of this court it is provided that the county judge shall be the judge. The same fundamental law ordains (section 15, art. 5) that the clerk of the circuit court "shall also be clerk of the county court, except in counties where there are criminal courts, and of the board of county commissioners and recorder and ex officio auditor of the county." Where there is a criminal court of record in a county, its clerk is made clerk of the county court, if there is a county court there. There is no county court in Duval county, although there is a criminal court there. There has been no legislation since the act of 1868, supra, concerning the seal of the county court.

Relying upon the act of 1868, counsel for appellant contend that the seal of the county judge of Duval county is the proper seal to be used, and that the resolution was unauthorized. There is no doubt that the attorney general devised and procured seals for county courts under the above statute, yet without questioning that such seals, where they were received by the clerks of the county courts under the act, are now the seals of county judges, as courts of probate, under the present constitution, and of the clerks of the board of county commissioners, still such a seal is not now and never was the seal of the county any more than, or to the exclusion of, the seal of the circuit court. Technically speaking, there is not, and has not been, within the period covered by the organic or statutory law referred to, any seal of Duval or of any other county; yet it is true that in a certain sense, and for certain purposes, both the seals of the county court or county judge and that of the circuit court have been and are seals of the counties. They are used by county officers, and in connection with official functions of such officers, and are seals of the county, as distinguished from any other territorial subdivision of the state or of the state itself. The circuit court seal is used by the clerk of the circuit court in all functions whose performance requires a seal, and, among others, those of auditor of the county, which he is by virtue of his office as such clerk. Ray v. Wilson, 29 Fla. —, 10 South. Rep. 813; McClel. Dig. p. 179, § 31, and § 12, p. 317. In our judgment, either of these seals is, within the meaning of the statute under consideration, the seal of Duval county, and might be adopted or used by the commissioners in sealing the bonds; and the resolution, to the extent that it indicates the will of the board of county commissioners that the seal of the circuit court shall be so used, is valid and proper; but that it is effectual for any further purpose, or as establishing a distinctive county seal, we fail to perceive.

We have given to the questions raised by the bill the careful investigation and deliberate consideration merited by their character and by the interests involved, and our judgment is that the decree dismissing the bill should be affirmed. It will be decreed accordingly.

GARRETT et al. v. JONES.

WHAT CONSTITUTES HOMESTEAD.

A house built in the business part of a town, and used principally as a store-building, though the owner sleeps in a small back room and takes his meals elsewhere, is not a homestead.

Appeal from circuit court, Tallapoosa county; J. R. DOWDELL, Judge.

Garrett & Sons, having recovered a judgment against L. D. Jones, levied on a lot and store-building. Jones claimed the property levied on as his homestead. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Upon the levy of an execution issued on a judgment recovered by Garrett & Sons against L. D. Jones, Jones filed his declarations of exemptions, claiming the land levied upon as his homestead; and upon the filing of this claim, the said Garrett & Sons inaugurated a contest of said claim of exemptions, assigning as grounds of said contest that the property so levied upon was occupied as a storehouse, and was not a homestead, as contemplated by the statute. The property levied upon, and which is claimed as the homestead of said Jones, is sufficiently described in the opinion. At the written request of the defendant the court gave the general charge in his behalf. There was judgment for the defendant, and on this appeal, prosecuted by the contestants, the giving of this charge by the court is assigned as error.

H. J. Gillam, for appellants. W. D. Bulger, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. Whether the house and lot involved in this case constitute the homestead of the defendant Jones depends upon the character of the building, and the uses to which it is adapted and to which it was devoted. The purposes for which it was erected by Jones, the fact that it was built by him "to be used as his home and residence and for a business house," can exert no influence in determining whether it was "a home and residence," now that it has for long been a completed structure and subjected to whatever occupancy was originally contemplated by the claimant. Its status as being a homestead or not must be adjudged by what he did,—by the character of house he built, and the uses to which he in fact devoted it,—and not by what he intended to do. Moreover, the fact that he built it for a home and residence cannot be proved by evidence of his mere purpose to conserve that end, but can only be found inferentially from his visible acts in the premises, and his testimony that such was his purpose must be taken to mean only that he intended to build such a home and residence as he did in fact build; and, however his mind may have been imbued with the idea that he was proposing a home for himself, it will not be held to be a homestead unless, dissociated from his own purposes, the house and lot in question fills the definition of a homestead under our laws. The evidence of his intentions, found in this record, must therefore be wholly disregarded; and the inquiry must proceed with reference solely to the kind of house which is on the lot, and the nature of its occupation by Jones, it being admitted that as to location, area, and value the house and lot is within the exemption secured to Jones against the claim which the plaintiffs seek to enforce upon it. The house is in the business portion of the town of Camp Hill. It is not inclosed, as residences in towns of this class usually are. Its dimensions are about 40 by 20 feet. It is divided by partition walls into two rooms, one of which is in a corner of the building, and is about 16 by 14 feet. The other and larger room covers the remainder of the building, and this is fitted up with counters, etc., as for a business house. Between these rooms there is a door leading from one to the other. Each room has a fire-place served by a stack chimney, constituting a part of the partition between them. Such was the character of the house,—essentially an ordinary business house with the usual smaller room at the back of it. Now as to the uses to which it was put: When the building was completed, about 1887, Jones carried on the business of a retail liquor dealer in the front room, and had an illustrated sign painted on the outside of the building, proclaiming his business. In 1890, and thence up to the time of the levy and trial, Jones rented the front room, with its bar, fixtures, etc., to one Landrum, who continued the liquor business therein. In 1887, Jones, who is an unmarried man, fitted up the back room as a bedroom, and has continued to occupy it as such ever since. This room was not let to Landrum along with the other, but, since he has been Jones' tenant of the main room, he has, by permission of the latter, also slept in the back room. Jones does not and never has taken his meals in this bedroom or in the house, but boarded at the house of one Dawson situated in another part of the town.

On these facts there can be no doubt that the primary adaptation of the building is to the purposes of business, and that its principal uses are and have always been the uses of trade, and not those of domiciliary occupation. The authorities are by no means uniform as to what will or will not be considered a homestead when the building claimed as such is in part adapted and devoted to business pursuits, and in other part used as a dwelling; but we think it may be laid down as a safe and conservative rule on that subject that where the trade adaptation and use of a building is incidental or secondary only to its habitation as a dwelling, where the chief use of the structure is that of a home for the owner, and some part only, not essential to this end, is fitted up and used as a shop, an office, or salesroom, it is a homestead. But when this state of facts is reversed, and the residence feature is only auxiliary to the business use, where only a relatively small part of the building is devoted to the uses of a habitat, and the chief adaptation and use are those of business, the building is not a homestead, even though the occupant have no other home, and uses this for all the purposes of living. Illustrations will readily suggest themselves. For instance, the owner of an hotel erected for and adapted to the purposes of public entertainment would not have homestead therein, though he resides there with his family; but the owner and occupant of a private house would not be deprived of the exemption through the fact that he rented rooms to lodgers, and entertained them, or even travelers, at table, for a consideration. A professional man would not lose the exemption by reason of devoting some part of his dwelling to the uses of his profession; but if a physician, for instance, should make a public infirmary of his residence, and continue to live there merely as an incident to the conduct of the hospital, we apprehend homestead would be lost. Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 181; Lazell v. Lazell, 8 Allen, 575; Mercier v. Chace, 11 Allen, 194; Goldman v. Clark, 1 Nev. 607; Harriman v. Insurance Co., 49 Wis. 71, 5 N. W. Rep. 12; Laughlin v. Wright, 63 Cal. 113; Pryor v. Stone, 70 Amer. Dec. 341, and notes 348 et seq. Guided by this rule, our conclusion would be against the defendant's right of homestead, even if he had used the house in question for all the purposes of residence. A fortiori must that conclusion be reached in view of the fact that the only occupation of the premises by the defendant consisted in the fact that he with another, thereby his licensee, used a small back room of this store-house as a bedroom, and kept his personal effects there, while he ate at another place, situated in a distant part of the town. The case presented, in view of this fact, is the usual one of the occupation of the back room of a store-house for sleeping purposes only; and it would be anomalous to a degree to hold that to be the residence, the home, of the occupant, which is saved to him by our homestead laws. This precise point has been ruled by the supreme court of Texas, and we cannot do better than close this opinion by quoting the language there employed: "We think that the facts in the present case show that the premises in controversy in this suit did not constitute the homestead of the appellee. He used the premises for business purposes, and slept in one of the rooms of the house, but at the same time took his meals habitually at another place. A man's homestead must be his place of residence; the place where he lives; the place where he usually sleeps and eats; where he surrounds himself with the ordinary insignia of home, and where he may enjoy its immunities and privacy. We do not think that the facts in this case show that the appellee used the premises as a homestead at the time of the sale under execution." Philleo v. Smalley, 23 Tex. 498.

The circuit court erred in giving the affirmative charge for the defendant, and its judgment must be reversed. The cause is remanded.

FREIBERG v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Feb. 25, 1892.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—SALES TO MINORS—INDICTMENT—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

1. Under Code, § 4038, as amended by Act 1891, (Acts 1890-91, p. 1209,) which makes certain sales of liquor to a minor unlawful, an indictment charging defendant with such sale to a minor, "without the consent of the parent or person having the management or control of such minor," etc., is good on demurrer.

2. Defendant was charged with selling liquor to N., a minor. There was evidence that defendant had previously done business with N. as manager of an ice company. The court instructed the jury "that the fact of N.'s having done business on his own account, or for the ice company, is not sufficient, alone, to show that he was 21 years old, but may be considered along with the other testimony as a circumstance tending to show whether defendant believed, at the time of the sale, that he was of age." Held, the instruction was not within the meaning of Code, § 2754, which forbids a charge on the effect of testimony.

3. In a prosecution for selling liquor to a minor, the burden is on defendant to show the consent of the parent or the person having control of the minor, rather than on the prosecution to show the want of such consent.

4. Whisky is a spirituous liquor, within the common knowledge of all men, and juries may so find, without specific proof.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; B. F. CASSADY, Judge.

Alexander Freiberg was convicted of unlawfully selling liquor to a minor, and appeals. Affirmed.

Defendant was tried and convicted at the October term, 1891, of the Anniston city court, under the following indictment: "The grand jury of said county charge that, before the finding of this indictment, that Alex. Freiberg, alias Alexander Freiberg, sold, bartered, exchanged, or gave spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors to a minor, Samuel Nobel, alias Sam Noble, without the consent of the parent or person having the management or control of said minor, and not upon the prescription of a physician, against the peace and dignity of the state of Alabama." There was demurrer to this indictment, on the ground that it failed to charge that the alleged sale of liquor to the alleged minor was without the consent of a guardian. This demurrer was overruled, and the defendant excepted thereto. The state only examined one witness, one Sam Noble, who stated that he bought some whisky, in the city of Anniston, from the defendant, 12 months before the finding of the indictment, and since the amendment of the statute went into effect; that he was between 17 and 18 years of age; that he was superintendent and general manager of the Anniston Ice Company, a corporation doing business in Anniston; that he had done business with the defendant as said superintendent, and had made contracts with the defendant, and with the firm of which the defendant was a member, and had never told the defendant his age. The defendant, as a witness in his own behalf, testified that he did not remember whether he ever sold said Sam Noble any liquor; that he had known said Noble for only a few months, and had done business with him as superintendent and general manager of the Anniston Ice Company; that, from his position and his general appearance, the defendant took said Noble to be over 21 years of age, and that he honestly believed said Noble was 21 years old. The defendant separately excepted to the portion of oral charge given by the court, and to the refusal of the court to give the two charges requested by him, which said charges are stated in the opinion.

McLeod & Tunstall, for appellant. Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., and J. H. King, for the State.

CLOPTON, J. The ground of demurrer to the indictment is evidently founded on the phraseology of section 4038 of the Code, without observance of, or reference to, its amendment by the act of February 18, 1891. By the amendatory act, the words "or guardian" are omitted, leaving the statute, as amended, to read, "without the consent of the parent or person having the management or control of such minor." Acts 1890-91, p. 1209. The indictment negatives the consent in the language of the amending act. But without the negativing clause the indictment would have been sufficient. The form of an indictment for selling or giving liquor to a minor, as laid down in the Code, contains no such negative averment; and an indictment conforming to that form has been held to be sufficient. Spigener v. State, 62 Ala. 383; Tatum v. State, 63 Ala. 147. In the general charge the court instructed the jury, ex mero motu, "that the fact of the witness Noble having been doing business on his own account, or for the Anniston Ice Company, is not sufficient, alone, to show that he was 21 years old, but may be considered along with the other testimony as a circumstance tending to show whether defendant believed, at the time of the sale, that witness was 21 years old." The charge, when considered as an entirety, and construed in reference to the testimony, is not a charge upon the effect of the evidence, in the meaning of section 2754 of the Code. The facts that Noble, the person to whom the liquor was sold, was superintendent and general manager of the ice company, and had often, as such, made contracts with the defendant, were admissible, not for the purpose of showing that he was an adult, but to enable the jury to determine whether he honestly believed that Noble was 21 years old, which if true, though mistaken, would render the act of selling excusable. The charge merely limits the operation of the evidence to the purpose for which it was admissible. Neither is there error in refusing to charge the jury "that it is incumbent on the state to prove that the liquor was sold to the minor, Sam Noble, if they find it was so sold without the consent of the parent or person having the management or control of said Sam Noble, before they can find the defendant guilty." The burden is on the defendant to prove the consent, and not on the prosecution to prove the want of it. Farrall v. State, 32 Ala. 557; Atkins v. State, 60 Ala. 45. Neither is there error in the refusal to charge the jury that they are not to infer that whisky is a spirituous, vinous, or malt liquor, unless it be proved by the evidence. That whisky is a spirituous liquor is within the common knowledge of all men. The courts will take judicial notice of what everybody else is presumed to know, and juries are permitted to find such fact, without specific proof being adduced in its support. Wall v. State, 78 Ala. 417; Adler v. State, 55 Ala. 16.

BRIDGEPORT LAND & IMP. CO. v. AMERICAN FIRE-PROOF STEEL CAR CO. OF ALABAMA.

VENDOR'S LIEN—ENFORCEMENT.

Plaintiff filed a bill to enforce a vendor's lien for land conveyed by him by absolute deed as part consideration for an agreement by the vendee, which was never fulfilled. The remaining part of the consideration was never paid. No separate value was fixed upon the land by the parties, and there was no data from which its relative value could be specifically ascertained. Held, that the bill would not lie; the different considerations being so blended that they could not be separated.

Appeal from chancery court, Jackson county; THOMAS COBBS, Chancellor.

Action by Bridgeport Land & Improvement Company against the American

Fire-Proof Steel Car Company of Alabama. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The bill in this case was filed by the appellant against the appellee, and sought to enforce a vendor's lien. The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion. The defendant demurred to the bill on the grounds that it does not show that at the time of the filing there was any unpaid purchase money due from the defendant to the complainant; that the bill shows only a claim against defendant for unliquidated damages; that the bill fails to allege that there was any fixed sum of money agreed upon between the complainant and the defendant as purchase money for the land described in the bill; that the complainant has a complete and adequate remedy at law; and that the bill is without equity. Upon the submission of the cause on the demurrers, the chancellor sustained the demurrers. This appeal is prosecuted by the complainant, and the chancellor's decree is assigned as error.

J. E. Brown, for appellant. Cumming & Hibbard, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. The bill was filed to enforce a vendor's lien upon 50 acres of land sold by appellant to the appellee. The court sustained a demurrer to the bill, and from this decree the appeal is prosecuted. Complainant conveyed the land to defendant by absolute deed of conveyance, with covenants of warranty. In such cases the vendor's lien is a mere creature of equity, not founded on contract, as is understood when the legal title is reserved by the vendor as a security for the purchase money. The real foundation for a mere equitable lien of a vendor for the purchase money of lands is that it is against good conscience for one man to get and keep the lands of another man without payment of the agreed consideration. The only consideration expressed in the deed of conveyance, and upon which it was made, when the deed alone is considered, is the "erecting and operating of a car factory, within 12 months from date, by the American Fire-Proof Steel Car Company, of Alabama." The bill avers that the car factory was never completed or operated, and the consideration is averred to be of the value of $100,000. Has a vendor an equitable lien upon land for the enforcement of such a claim, and is a court of equity of competent jurisdiction to enforce it? In Thomasson v. Cooper, 57 Ala. 563, 564, the court uses this language: "To maintain a bill to enforce a vendor's lien there must be a debt due to the complainant, contracted in the purchase of the land, still unpaid, and which the purchaser, either at the time, or at some prior date, was liable to pay as a primary debtor, without condition." The rule has long prevailed in this state, and has been uniformly held, that a vendor's lien attaches to the land when it is conveyed in consideration of the transfer and delivery to the vendor of chattels, choses in action, and the like, which are capable of reduction to a money value, to secure the transfer and delivery or payment, in accordance with the terms of the contract. Coal Co. v. Long, 91 Ala. 542, 8 South. Rep. 765; Neel v. Clay, 48 Ala. 252; Smith v. Vaughan, 78 Ala. 201; Burns v. Taylor, 23 Ala. 255. The authorities are not uniform upon the question as to whether the equitable lien exists as a security for unliquidated and uncertain damages. 4 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 322. In Jones on Liens (volume 2, § 1071) the rule is stated, "that when the sale is not made for a sum of money, but in consideration of a covenant or agreement to do certain things, the covenant or agreement is then itself the consideration, and in obtaining the covenant or agreement the vendor has been paid all he contracted for." "Thus a covenant or agreement to erect buildings on the land creates no lien on it for the performance of the covenant or agreement." The text cites the case of McDonald v. Land Co., 78 Ala. 382. In the same section (section 1071) the remedy given in such a case is: "If the vendor has conveyed the land, his remedy is an action for damages for breach of the covenants; but if he has not conveyed the land, he may refuse to execute a conveyance." In Williams v. Crow, 84 Mo. 298, the facts were that William Baily, Sr., sold and conveyed by deed of warranty to Ann W. Crow, a tract of land for $1,000, which sum was paid. When the deed was executed, the lands were under a lease of 10 years to William Baily, Jr. At the time of the execution of the deed of conveyance, and as a part of said deed, George R. Crow and Ann W. Crow, his wife, consented and agreed "to hold and keep said William Baily, Sr., grantor in said deed, harmless on account of the execution of said deed, and on account of any claim for damages, or otherwise, of said William Baily, Jr., against said William Baily, Sr., on account of a breach of said contract, * * * and will pay any judgment and cost recovered thereon against said William Baily, Sr.," etc. William Baily, Jr., sued William Baily, Sr., on the lease, and, including cost, etc., recovered a judgment for damages, which, with the cost and expenses, aggregated $697.36. The judgment was paid by William Baily, Sr., and he filed a bill in equity to enforce a vendor's lien for this amount upon the land sold to Ann W. Crow, the grantee. It was held that the complainant was entitled to relief; that the agreement to save Baily, Sr., harmless constituted as much a part of the purchase money as if the land had been incumbered by a mortgage debt which Crow assumed to pay as a part of the purchase money. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Lewton, reported in 20 Ohio St. 401, the contract for the right of way provided as follows: "For and in consideration of the right of way, and the right to enter upon and construct said railroad, the said railroad company agree to pay the said Lewton fifteen hundred dollars; * * * and also to make a road crossing and two cattle-guards at or near station 600; * * * and also to make a culvert or bridge crossing at a branch at station 615 large enough for a wagon track." The facts show that the grantor, Lewton, recovered a judgment for $500, as damages for the failure of said company to construct its road in the manner provided in the contract. The court held (1) that a vendor's lien would attach against an easement as well as any other interest in land; (2) that the judgment for damages for not constructing the road in the manner provided for in the contract is as much the price of the interest sold to the railroad company as was the $1,500 agreed to be paid in money. The only difference is that the amount of cash was ascertained and agreed upon by the parties, while the amount of the damages was not ascertained till judgment. Both sums arose in contract, and constituted the compensation the vendee was to return to the vendor for the interest purchased." The principle here stated was reaffirmed in a later case. Elliott v. Plattor, 43 Ohio St. 209, 1 N. E. Rep. 222. In 2 Warv. Vend. p. 706, c. 27, § 14, the reason and the rule is stated as follows: "Inasmuch as the vendor's lien is based upon the theory that it would be unconscionable that the vendee should hold the land, and not pay for it, and as equity regards the substance rather than the form of contracts, it is immaterial, on principle, what shape the refusal or neglect may take. Unless the vendor has evinced an intention, by the acceptance of other security, to release the vendee, it must be presumed that he holds the land in trust to pay what he had agreed as the purchase price; and in the case of conditions annexed to a grant, and assumed by the vendee, if the performance of the condition constituted an inducement to the sale, it is as much a part of the compensation to be paid as if the promise had been to pay the vendor, as part of the purchase money, a sum equal in amount to the damages sustained by their breach; and the equitable lien will, it is held, attach to the land sold, as well for such damages as for the purchase money." In the case of Hooper v. Railroad Co., 69 Ala. 529, the railroad company stipulated in writing to pay the complainant a stated amount in cash, "and to fill, level, or grade every street which leads to or around block A, where George D. Hooper resides, which is cut by said railroad," etc. It was held that the complainant could enforce a lien for the diminished value of the lots because of the obstruction or interruption of access to them, holding in the opinion that the agreement to do this w rk was as much of the compensation to be paid for the right of way as the cash to be paid. In the case at bar, if the plaintiffs had obtained a judgment in a court of law against the respondents for a breach of contract for failing to perform the covenants agreed to as the consideration for the conveyance of the land, and there were no other difficulties in the way, we hold that a vendor's lien could be enforced against the land to secure the payment of the judgment. We are of opinion that a bill for a specific performance would not lie, under the facts, as they appear in the present case. The consideration expressed is the "erecting and operating of a car factory," etc. To carry out this agreement requires the exercise of labor and special skill, judgment, and discretion; and the averments of the bill show that defendant "is unable, from the lack of means, to perform said agreement." A court of equity is powerless to enforce a specific performance of an agreement which the party is unable to perform, and, furthermore, a court of chancery will not undertake to enforce a specific performance "when it involves the exercise of special skill, judgment, and discretion." Iron Age Pub. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 83 Ala. 498, 3 South. Rep. 449, and authorities cited; Clark's Case, 12 Amer. Dec. 214; Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 358.

It is unnecessary to further consider this view of the case. There is one feature presented by the averment of the bill in its present condition which seems fatal to plaintiff's right to relief. We have considered the agreement of the parties only as it appears from the deed of conveyance. Exhibit A to the bill, and which is made a part of it, evidences a contract between the parties, executed at the same time as the deed of conveyance. This contract must be construed together with the deed of conveyance. Robbins v. Webb, 68 Ala. 398; Walker v. Struve, 70 Ala. 172. When the two instruments are construed together as parts of the same agreement, it becomes evident that the "erecting and operating of a car factory" did not constitute the sole consideration for the 50 acres of land described in the conveyance. In addition to the land, the complainant agreed to pay to the defendant $40,000 in cash, and also to turn over to the defendant $300,000 of Bridgeport Land & Improvement Company stock. It was in consideration of the cash, the company's stock, and the 50 acres of land that the defendant agreed to erect and operate a car company. No separate value was fixed upon the land by the parties, and there is no data from which its relative value could be definitely and specifically ascertained. When, by the contract, the vendor and vendee do not distinguish the considerations, when they are blended and combined, and it is impossible to separate them, the presumption must be that the vendor did not look to the lands for payment, but relied upon the personal responsibility of the vendee. Stringfellow v. Ivie, 73 Ala. 209; Betts v. Sykes, 82 Ala. 380, 2 South. Rep. 648. The judgment must be affirmed.

VENDOR AND VENDEE—AGREEMENT TO CANCEL OUTSTANDING MORTGAGE—RIGHT TO TRANSFER.

1. The purchaser can compel the vendor to comply with his obligation expressed in the act of sale to cancel the mortgage appearing of record against the property he sells.

2. The purchaser choosing to allow the mortgage to remain and the promise to cancel to continue uncomplied with, his creditor, who has a mortgage on the property, and has caused it to be seised, can recover judgment to clear the title of incumbrance, and to enforce the cancellation, as required by the terms of the sale.

3. The proceeding is proper, and arises ex necessitate rei, in the absence of any law to the contrary.

4. The agreement which plaintiffs seek to have carried into effect gives rise to a real right which can be conferred by the creditor.

5. It is not an obligation strictly personal, which none but the obligee can enforce, but a right of property which can be exercised by those who have a right of mortgage on the property.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; THOMAS C. W. ELLIS, Judge.

Charles Macready and others obtained a judgment against William S. Benedict, Bernard Klotz, and Lee Clark, and to enforce the same the sheriff seized certain land. Bernard Klotz & Co., a corporation, sued out injunction restraining the sale of the machinery and contents of a factory placed on the land. From the judgment Benedict and Klotz appeal. Affirmed.

H. C. Cage, Lewis Guion, and W. S. Benedict, for Benedict, appellant. Thos. J. Semmes, for succession of Margaret, appellee. Bayne & Denegre, for Lee Clark, appellee.

BREAUX, J. The defendant having obtained a judgment against the plaintiff for the sum of $31,341.65, with interest, subject to a remittitur of $624.42, and the sheriff, in enforcing it, having seized certain parcels of land, with the buildings and improvements thereon, Bernard Klotz & Co., a corporation, limited, sued out an injunction restraining that officer and the defendants from proceeding further to dispose of the machinery and contents of a factory, placed thereon, by them while lessees. The injunction was maintained, except as to machinery and certain implements stated in the judgment, which were not placed on the said land by the lessees. The evidence maintains the correctness of that judgment. It will be affirmed.

The defendants, in the proceedings before us, sued William S. Benedict, Bernard Klotz, and Lee Clark, and aver that their judgment has been duly recorded. That in an act of sale dated the 9th of January, 1889, the price at which the property was sold to Bernard Klotz by W. S. Benedict was $50,000, of which $10,000 was paid in cash, and the remainder was to be paid in notes of $1,000 each. Nine of these notes have been paid. The mortgage securing them has not been canceled. They further aver that there was a note of $10,000, secured by mortgage on the property at the time of the sale, which the vendor to Klotz promised to have canceled. It was his indebtedness, and an incumbrance on the property, which he promised to cancel. This note was held by Lee Clark, one of the defendants. The plaintiffs, in their suit, claim the right to have the amount of the vendor's mortgage ascertained and fixed, and to compel the defendant Benedict to extinguish the note for $10,000, and cancel the mortgage on the property under seizure. The defendants have filed separate answers. Prior to answering, one of the defendants (Benedict) filed the plea of no cause of action. In his answer he avers that the claim for $10,000 is valid, and that a tender of the amount due was made. It was not accepted. The exception and merits were tried together. Klotz, the vendee, denies the right claimed; and Lee Clark, in his answer, alleges that he is the holder of the note for $10,000, secured by privilege and mortgage, and prays to be paid by preference over all others. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs, overruling the exception, and decreeing the mortgage in favor of W. S. Benedict, resulting from the act of sale by him to Bernard Klotz, dated January 9, 1889, be reduced to the extent of $9,000, being the nine notes paid of $1,000 each. He was also condemned to pay to Lee Clark the amount of the two notes and interest, and other charges secured by privilege and mortgage on the property as before mentioned. The defendants Benedict and Klotz appeal.

The facts needful to the decision of the case are sufficiently set forth by the statement that the amounts are due and secured as alleged, and that it is declared in the act of sale of January 9, 1889, that Benedict, the vendor to Klotz, "promised to cancel the mortgage for $10,000 resting on the property he sold." It is not alleged in the pleadings, nor was it contended in argument, that there were any equities between Klotz and Benedict. Having sold the property, and promised to cancel existing incumbrances, there can be no question as to the right of the purchaser to require compliance. The agreement made was certain, fair, and just. It cannot be renounced by Klotz to the detriment of the interest of his creditors, whose claims are secured by mortgage on the property. Having a right which he does not choose to enforce, the question arises as to whether his creditor, whose claim is secured by mortgage, can compel compliance. The Civil Code does not, in express terms, authorize creditors to exercise all the rights and actions of their debtors. This court has not heretofore decided that only such rights and actions of creditors may be exercised as are expressed. In Morris v. Cain, 35 La. Ann. 759, the proceedings were in the nature of a bill of interpleader in chancery practice, not provided in our Code of Practice; "but under article 21, Rev. Civil Code, and on general principles, this court has often held that the Code of Practice does not exclude all other remedies than those therein provided for, and that the courts will afford other appropriate remedies where not prohibited; and they have repeatedly enforced remedies identical with the one here invoked." If not maintainable on equitable grounds, "there is a principle of the civil law obtainable in Louisiana, by the aid of which there can be no doubt of its being maintainable." New Orleans v. Gaines' Adm'r, 131 U. S. 213, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 745; Fortier v. Slidell, 7 Rob. (La.) 399. There are rights, says the Code, which the creditor cannot exercise even should the debtor refuse to avail himself of them. Article 1991. The excepted rights do not include such a right as the one involved in this suit, for it is not similar. The Revised Civil Code expressly reserves to a creditor the right of intervention in all suits which may arise between usufructuary and the owner. Article 623. He may cause to be annulled any renunciation made by his debtor of the usufruct to his prejudice. Article 624. He may accept an inheritance the debtor refuses or neglects to accept. Articles 1021, 1990, Rev. Civil Code. Despite the debtor, he may plead prescription his debtor declines to plead or may choose to waive; the property of the debtor being the common pledge of his creditors; the obligation being attached to immovable property. Privity being the "mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property," it is consistent with the articles referred to to include among the rights of creditors that compelling the vendor of property to his debtor to cancel a mortgage on property mortgaged to secure his claim, and which the vendor promised and obligated himself to cancel, instead of classing it as a strictly personal obligation which the creditors cannot exercise; such as requiring the separation of property between husband and wife, or compelling him to accept a donation inter vivos, etc. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1991.

It is not alleged nor is it claimed by defendants Benedict and Klotz that specific performance is an issue involved in this case. The defense is a denial of any right of the debtor against Benedict which the creditor can have enforced; in other words, they contend that a creditor cannot exercise the rights of his debtor when the latter, to the detriment of the former's interest, fails to exercise them. That being the defense, to that extent we decide the issue, and hold that it is not a strictly personal obligation, but one the creditor can exercise.

A question of tender of an amount to take up the $10,000 note secured by the mortgage the vendor promised to cancel comes up as one of the issues. The tender was made in the name of a third person, not shown to have had any interest. The tender was made to the attorney of Lee Clark. A question arose between the attorney and the party making the tender about distinguishing the payment from a sale or transfer. The attorney was without authority to transfer the note and merely change the creditor. It was a matter of payment vel non. Payment consists in the discharge of an obligation. The attorney of the holder could, before accepting the amount, insist upon payment. Judgment affirmed, at appellants' costs.

NEW ORLEANS, FT. J. & G. I. R. Co. v. RABASSE. (No. 10,915.)

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — LOCAL PREJUDICE — RIGHTS OF ALIENS — CONDITIONS OF BOND — VERDICT — EXPROPRIATION.

1. Act Cong. Aug. 13, 1888, authorizing the removal of causes to the circuit court of the United States on the ground of local prejudice, makes no provision for a removal by an alien.

2. One of the conditions of the bond for removal is that the principal shall pay all costs that may be awarded if said court should hold that the suit was wrongfully or improperly removed.

3. A bond without that condition is defective.

4. The verdict of a jury is responsive to the issues when rendered with reference to the pleadings.

5. The verdict is presumed to be correct.

6. The party who wishes it set aside has the onus of establishing that it is incorrect.

7. In expropriation proceedings, the jury of freeholders have to some extent the character and authority of experts.

8. Although their finding is not conclusive, it must be given due weight.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Plaquemines; A. E. LIVAUDAIS, Judge.

Suit by the New Orleans, Ft. Jackson & Grand Island Railroad Company against Eugene Rabasse to expropriate a road over his land. On application by defendant for a removal of the cause. From a judgment denying the application defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Louque, for appellant. James Wilkinson, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. This suit was brought to expropriate a road over the land of defendant. The land sought to be expropriated is part of a tract measuring 5 arpents front, on the Mississippi river, by 40 arpents in depth. Plaintiff avers that it measures 25 feet in width, and in all contains 83-100 of an acre, for which the company offered $50, and claims the increased value to defendant's property, resulting from the building of the railroad, as an offset for any damages sustained by him. Plaintiff, in the petition, sets forth that the improvements on the right of way consist of 30 orange trees. The defendant, alleging that he is a citizen of the republic of France, applied for the removal of the cause. He avers in his brief "that before going on with the trial defendant filed his petition for the removal of the cause to the circuit court, on the ground of local prejudice, as is provided for by the act of congress of 1888." 25 St. at Large. In a supplemental brief it is argued that there is no good reason why an alien should not be included in the denomination of "a citizen of another state." Extract from the said statute reads: 'Any defendant, being such citizen of another state, may remove such suit into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district, at any time before the trial thereof, when it shall be made to appear to said circuit court that from prejudice or local influence he will not be able to obtain justice in such state court, or in any other state court to which said defendant, under the laws of the state, have the right, on account of such prejudice or local influence, to remove said cause." The conditions of the bond for removal are that the principal shall file full and complete copies of all pleadings and other proceedings in the case in the circuit court of the United States at its next session, and shall pay all costs that may be awarded. The plaintiff controverts defendant's application for removal on the ground that he has not alleged that he could not obtain justice in the court a qua, or in any other court; that the bond for removal is not framed in compliance with law; that evidence was taken, without objection, on the trial of the application to remove, which disproved the affidavit. The application for removal was overruled.

The act of congress of August 13, 1888, authorizing the removal of causes on the ground of local prejudice, requires the affiant to state that he could not obtain justice in the court a qua, or in any other state court to which the defendant had a right under the present state law. Sections 3901, 3902, Rev. St., provide a change of venue in civil cases. Evidence was heard, as alleged.

On the subject of removal we limit our decision to the following: In the several laws relating to the removal of causes from the state to the circuit courts, the words "citizens of a state" are used as designating citizens of the commonwealths of the federal republic. The word "state" is used as distinguishing the states of the American Union, and do not designate foreign countries. The act adopted in 1888 is similar to that adopted March 2, 1867, in so far as relates to the citizenship of the applicant. With reference to the latter, we find in Spear on the Law of Federal Judiciary, p. 469," that there is no provision for a removal by an alien under this act."

In the second place, the bond furnished does not secure the payment of costs. This, by the act in question, is made one of the conditions of the transfer. On that subject, in Meyer v. Construction Co., 100 U. S. 457, it was held that "nothing was, therefore, to be secured by the bond but the filing of the transcript in the circuit court, * * * and the payment of any costs, as required by statute." Field, Fed. Prac. § 177. The amount of the penalty and the required conditions should be inserted in the bond. Until then, there is no right of removal. Id. We affirm the overruling of the application for removal.

The plea in reconvention is referred to in argument, and it is urged that the defendant's evidence in its support should have been admitted. The records do not contain any bill of exceptions, or any proof that evidence was offered to sustain that plea, or that the court made any ruling whatever in the matter. The plea is, therefore, not before us for decision.

In compliance with an order issued under section 2148 of the Revised Statutes, a jury was drawn, and the case was tried. The verdict was for plaintiff, expropriating the right of way, and for the defendant for the sum of $50, value of the land, and the further sum of $200 and costs. From the verdict and the judgment of the court defendant prosecutes this appeal. The road is 25 feet in width, and the area sought to be expropriated is 83-100 of an acre. It passes in the rear of the dwelling, at a distance between 100 and 200 feet, through the stable lot, changing its dimensions, and touching the stable. From the upper line of defendant's place the road curves to the rear. This direction was followed to avoid the unsafe, caving banks of the river. The records do not disclose that the jury have overlooked the fact that the said course gave an irregular shape to the front of the place, or that they have overlooked the allegations of the damage it occasions, and the evidence on the subject. The plaintiff contends that the law of expropriation is such that a railroad company cannot expropriate lands through a yard, garden, and other appurtenances, unless the jury shall find by their verdict that the line of the proposed railroad cannot be diverted from that proposed by the company without great public loss or inconvenience. Rev. St. 1870, § 1486. The plea authorized by this section of the statutes was clearly presented by the defendant. The testimony shows that there was a caving point, which made it necessary to leave the river, and run further to the rear. To reach their conclusion, the jury must have accepted this testimony as true. While the verdict does not set forth, in so many words, the finding in the terms of the law, it does in effect, by returning for the expropriation as proposed. Construed with reference to the pleadings and the testimony, the verdict is responsive to the issues. Downes v. Scott, 3 Rob. (La.) 88.

The value of the orange trees within the road's limits is one of the issues. The following is a summary of the testimony, both as to the value of the trees and of the land expropriated. The superintendent of the road testifies that there were on the land 29 or 30 trees, large and small, valuable and valueless; of the valuable there were only 4 or 5. The second witness, a notary public, employed in that capacity by the defendant, testified that the value of property in the vicinity of the defendant's place has been enhanced 25 per cent. or 30 per cent. by the building of the road of the plaintiff company. He states that the number of trees cut down were 35; that 17 of them were not bearing, and were worth about 45 cents each; that the land sought to be expropriated was worth $50. The third witness, a manager of a plantation near the defendant, testifies that the value of lands in the vicinity has been enhanced by the building of the road. The fourth witness, a surveyor, called by the defendant, testifies that there were 74 trees of different sizes on the road lines; some measuring in diameter as many as 12 inches; others 1 inch. The fifth witness only knew that there were some large and some small orange trees on the place. The sixth witness, a dealer in oranges, testifies that he offered $1,500 for the orange crops on this and another of defendant's places, or $2,000, if he would consent to deduct whatever damages to the crop would be made by the railroad company by the expropriation. The offer was not accepted. This testimony loses importance in establishing the value by the additional statement of the witness that he at the time made a rough calculation, and did not know the number of trees that would be cut down. The defendant testifies in general terms in his behalf, and at most corroborates the allegations of his petition. Such being the testimony, we have not reached the conclusion that the verdict is erroneous.

A verdict is presumed to be correct. The party who wishes it set aside has the onus of establishing its incorrectness. We have not concluded that there is error in the finding. The members of the jury, it is fair to presume, knew something of the value of orange trees. The question is one of fact, of which they should be competent judges, after hearing the testimony of witnesses.

In a recent case, we have had occasion to hold: "It has long been held in this state that the jury of freeholders authorized by our laws to act in expropriation proceedings have to some extent the character and authority of experts, supposed to have some personal knowledge of the matters submitted to them, and authorized to rely on their own opinions as well as on the testimony adduced before them. Their verdicts are, indeed, subject to review by appeal, and may be amended when manifestly inadequate or excessive; but they are entitled to great respect, and will not be interfered with except in case of gross or manifest error." Postal Telegraphic Cable Co. v. Louisville, N. O. & T. Ry. Co., 43 La. Ann. 525, 9 South. Rep. 119. As in the case from which we quote, we deem it proper to rely upon the verdict of a jury, who, in the discharge of their functions, from their personal knowledge were enabled to decide as to the weight of the testimony of the witnesses who appeared before them.

Judgment affirmed.

PUGH v. MOORE et al. (No. 10,870.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Jan. 18, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

FACTORS AND BROKERS—FAILURE TO DISCLOSE PRINCIPALS — LIABILITIES — ASSIGNMENT OF NEGOTIABLE BOND — FRAUDULENT ISSUE OF STATE BONDS—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS.

1. If a broker or other agent transfer paper by delivery without disclosing who is his principal, he is himself to be regarded as a principal in the transaction, and the party responsible to refund money paid for bonds which were valueless.

2. The term "assignment" is applied to the transfer of instruments which are negotiable without indorsement. If a bond is not a valid subsisting obligation according to its purport, the assignor is liable in a suit to recover the amount paid him as the price, because it was not that which it was held to be, and the assignee did not receive any consideration.

3. A state bond in negotiable form, which has come into the hands of innocent holders, after having been fraudulently reissued from the treasurer's office, is subject to defense.

4. An officer cannot ratify an irregular issue of securities of the state, or give value to paper issued ultra vires or fraudulently, as he could not originally issue the paper.

5. The state is not liable for its paper promises fraudulently issued and put into circulation, not even when put in circulation by its treasurer.

WATKINS, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Suit by Sallie C. Pugh against Moore, Hyams & Co. to recover the amount paid for certain alleged worthless bonds. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bayne, Denegre & Bayne, for appellants. Charles F. Claiborne, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiff sues to recover of defendants the amount paid them for five state bonds she alleges are worthless. They were bought by her on the 24th of April, 1889, for the sum of $4,443.75. She subsequently discovered that these bonds were not valid, and that the state claimed them, as they had been fraudulently reissued. Four of them are numbered 742, 842, 866, and 883, and are part of the consolidated bonds held by the treasurer of the state of Louisiana for the use of the Agricultural and Mechanical College, and which are null and void, since the 1st day of January, 1880, under article 233 of the constitution. In addition to their nullity, this article prescribes that the general assembly shall never make any provision for their payment and that they shall be destroyed. Another of the bonds bought is numbered 5,611, and is a consolidated bond, which had been exchanged under Act 121 of 1880 for a constitutional bond. The act just quoted orders in matter of the exchange of constitutional for consolidated bonds that the treasurer, before delivering the former, shall designate in blank, kept for the purpose on the face thereof, the number of the old consolidated bond for which the new was given in exchange, and shall stamp the consolidated bond received, after having detached from it the coupon which fell due on the 1st of January, 1880. Reports were to be made by the treasurer to the auditor at the end of each quarter, showing the number and denomination of all the consolidated bonds stamped, as required. They were to be destroyed. It was under the provisions of the said act that this bond—5,611—was received by the treasurer. Plaintiff tendered the bonds to the defendants, and demanded valid bonds in lieu, or the price. The defendants, in their answer, plead that they acted as brokers, and not as vendors; that these bonds were negotiable instruments, not yet due, transferable by delivery, and did not entail any liability or warranty upon the vendor; and that they had been issued by the state, and put in circulation by its officers, for full value; and that their rights are protected by the constitution and laws of the United States and the law-merchant, by which they must be decided. There was judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed.

With reference to the capacity in which the defendants acted,—whether as brokers or principals,—we summarize the evidence as follows: That defendants are brokers by occupation, and that at the date of the sale of these bonds to the plaintiff they were engaged in buying bonds for themselves and others. That plaintiff's agent asked a member of the defendant firm to let him have some of these bonds for his principal at cost price. That this was declined unless a broker's commission was paid. That this the agent finally consented to pay. This is corroborated by another member of the firm. The agent corroborates these statements in some particulars, but denies that he dealt with the defendants as brokers, and that there was any brokerage compensation. It appears that no statement of the purchase was made and handed to the purchaser, as is customary when brokers act for third parties. That the defendants did not at any time make known to plaintiff who was the principal and owner of those bonds, if they were not. With reference to the fraudulent reissuing of the Mechanical and Agricultural College bonds, Nos. 742, 842, 866, and 883, and the possession of the state, the facts are that they were designated in Statement E of the report of the state treasurer to the governor for the year 1879, from which we copy: "To his Excellency, F. T. Nicholls, Governor of the State of Louisiana—Sir: In accordance with the requirements of law, (Act No. 96, Extra Session, section 80, of 1877,) I respectfully submit the following report of the financial operations of this department of the past fiscal year, commencing the 1st day of January, 1879, to the 31st day of December, 1879, inclusive, embracing its receipts, disbursements, etc., from the various funds, as provided by existing laws. The treasurer's report consists of Statements A, B, C, D, and E. Statement A shows an account * * *. Statement B shows an account * * *. Statement C shows an account * * *. Statement D shows an account * * *. Statement E shows a detailed statement of the bonds held 'by the state treasurer in trust for the Mechanical and Agricultural College, and the bonds belonging to the Louisiana State University; also of the bonds returned by A. Luria, cashier Louisiana National Bank, on June 7, 1878, in exchange of warrant No. 2,222, as per judgment of the third district court of New Orleans, No. 25,115, and of the supreme court of Louisiana, No. 7,149, and pledge of the lessees of the Louisiana state penitentiary, etc.' [The residue of the report is a compilation of the monthly reports of the banks, banking institutions, savings banks, etc., published in accordance with the provisions of Act 91, section 6 of 1877.] All of which is respectfully submitted. [Signed.] E. A. BURKE, State Treasurer." Extract from the said report: "Statement E. Description of bonds on hand in the state treasury, held by and belonging to the Agricultural and Mechanical College and to the Louisiana State University, etc. Mechanical and Agricultural College: 196 bonds, of $1,000 each, issued by the state of Louisiana under Act No. 8 of 1879, Nos. 710 to 905, inclusive, $196,000."—necessarily including the bonds involved in this suit, viz., Nos. 742, 842, 866, and 883. Other official reports, of subsequent dates, were offered in evidence. They were objected to on the ground that they were not the best evidence which could be produced. The court overruled the objection, and admitted the testimony.

The first report—that of 1879—shows that the bonds were in the treasury at the time it mentions; and, while those made subsequently do not, from personal knowledge, establish that they were in the treasury in 1879, nevertheless they tend to prove the correctness of that of 1879. The records of the state make proof of the verity of their contents, unless proven incorrect. Best, Ev. p. 454. The fact that the treasurer was indicted in 1888 for alleged criminality in the fraudulent reissue of these bonds, and that he is a fugitive from justice, will not destroy the effect of records as evidence, accepted at all times as correct previous to 1888. With reference to the consolidated bond, (5,611,) it is proven that in 1883 it was presented to the state treasurer, to be changed for a constitutional bond. It was exchanged and extinguished. The state claims its return, and refuses to recognize it as a debt.

The Brokers' Responsibility in Transferring Bonds by Delivery. The first proposition presented by the defendants is that they acted as brokers, and are not indebted for the amount claimed. In considering this defense it is necessary to determine what are the functions of a broker. He is an intermediary, employed to negotiate a matter between two parties, and for that reason is considered a mandatary of both. When he is the mandatary of the purchaser, and buys from a third party, the agency must be disclosed, either at the time of the contract or on the trial, in order that he may be considered the broker, and relieved from all responsibility as principal. If the plaintiff has a right of action, it cannot be defeated, as in this case, by withholding the name of the principal, and pleading the exemption of a broker. We quote from 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. p. 684: "It is quite clear that if a broker or other agent transfer property by delivery, without disclosing who his principal is, he is himself to be regarded as principal in the transaction, although the party dealing with him may have known that he was the broker or agent for some person." "And this doctrine has been applied to compel a broker to refund money paid for notes sold by him to the plaintiffs, although he had paid over the money to his principal."

Liability of the Assignor of Bonds Payable to Bearer. In the order of the defense the defendants next contend that it is well established that the buyer has no cause of complaint if he gets the exact thing he buys; that each had the same means of information; neither had any suspicion that there was anything wrong with the bonds; that it was an ordinary case of bargain and sale, but essentially a transaction in which both took their chances of loss; that these bonds were current in the market as Louisiana state bonds. The representations made by vendors were in good faith, and believed by both parties to be true, that they were selling valid bonds of the state of Louisiana. The unquestioned intention of the plaintiff was to buy valid obligations of the state. Instead she received five bonds that were null and void. For these she paid a price for which she did not receive any consideration. The question for our decision on this point is whether a purchaser who buys bonds in the market must lose the price if he receives fraudulent reissues of bonds, instead of valid and binding obligations upon the state, which he intended to buy. This question involves the necessity of deciding what are the liabilities of assignors of instruments payable to bearer. The assignor of such an instrument guaranties that he has a good title to the instruments, and has a right to sell them. The illegality of the instruments constitutes a failure of consideration. Knowledge of the illegality on the part of the vendor is not essential to make him liable for the price received. "We think whoever gives negotiable paper, transferable by delivery, warrants that the signatures are genuine;" and Mr. Justice Story, in his work on Promissory Notes, lays it down that there is a warranty of title. Prom. Notes, par. 118. He warrants "by implication, unless otherwise agreed, that its face is a true description of its character, both in respect to its genuineness, to its validity and legal operation, to the competency of the parties; and also that he is the lawful holder, having a valid title and right to transfer it; and that he has no knowledge of any facts which prove the paper, if originally valid, to be worthless, either by the insolvency of the principal or by having been paid, or otherwise by having become void and defunct." Daniel, Neg. Inst. (3d Ed.) par. 737. The assignor engages that the instrument is what it purports to be, i. e., the valid obligation of those whose names are upon it. The rule, says Judge Parsons, is of universal application that the vendor, without indorsement, warrants that the paper is of the kind and description it purports to be. This is a well-settled principle of commercial law, i. e., implied warranty in sales, as applicable to negotiable instruments transferable by delivery. An exception arose under a decision of the United States supreme court, and a different rule was announced as applying to assignors and assignees of government securities, i. e., that the assignor does not impliedly guaranty that the officers had authority to issue the securities he transferred by delivery. In Otis v. Cullum, 92 U. S. 447, a city bond issued in Kansas was sold to plaintiffs. The court held the bond void on the ground that the legislature had no power to adopt the act authorizing its issue. The transferees sued to recover back what they had paid for the invalid bond. The court held that in such cases there is only an implied warranty of title and genuineness, and that, if there was no guaranty, and no fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the vendor, the transferees were without right to recover. This case followed Lambert v. Heath, an English case, (15 Mees. & W. 486.) The rule is the same in both. In the last case the defendant bought for the plaintiff certain certificates of Kentish Coast Railway scrip. The directors repudiated the scrip on the ground that the secretary had acted without authority in issuing them. An action was brought to recover back the money paid for these invalid scrips. The court said: "The question is simply this Was what the parties bought in the market Kentish Coast Railway scrip? It appears that it was signed by the secretary of the company; and, if this was the only Kentish Coast Railway scrip in the market, as appears to have been the case, and one person chooses to sell and another to buy, then the latter has all he contracted to buy." In both of these cases all the securities were null and void. In the case at bar only comparatively few bonds were worthless, and it happens that in buying a large number these sued on were of the worthless. In a Nebraska case the distinction was made that there were two sets of securities in the market of the same general description, one legal and the other illegal; proof of which fact entitled the purchaser of the illegal securities to recover back the purchase money on the ground that he had purchased something very different, viz., the legal security of the same description. Rogers v. Walsh, (1881,) 12 Neb. 28, 10 N. W. Rep. 467. Judge Daniel, referring to the case, says, (1 Neg. Inst. par. 734*a*:) "The distinction is a clear one; and the decision of the supreme court, limited to the facts of the case before it, is not irreconcilable with the general principles stated in the text," which we have had occasion to refer to as applying to this case. While an assignment is not equivalent to an indorsement, a transfer without indorsement is of the same force as a sale of goods, and does not fall under mercantile law. 2 Rand. Com. Paper, p. 442. The principle of implied guaranty by the assignor of securities payable to bearer is but slightly removed, if at all, from those laid down in the Rev. Civil Code respecting the liability of the vendor. The seller is bound to warrant the thing which he sells, to maintain the buyer's peaceable possession, and to guaranty against the hidden defects of the thing sold. He who sells a credit or incorporeal right warrants its existence at the time of the transfer, though no warranty be mentioned in the deed. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2646. The authorities agree that the assignor of a security transferable by delivery warrants that it is not fictitious.

The defendants contend that plaintiff had the knowledge they had with reference to these bonds; each had the same means of information; neither had any suspicion that there was anything wrong about these bonds. That is undoubtedly true. Against each of the parties to the suit the same presumption arises,—that they had knowledge of the laws relating to these bonds. They had the notice every one is presumed to have of the law. The fact remains that in an intended purchase plaintiff has paid an amount for which she did not receive anything in return.

The State is not Responsible for Bonds Fraudulently Reissued in Violation of her Laws. The third and last ground of defense is that the defendants were holders for value before maturity of negotiable paper of the state of Louisiana; and that, applying the law governing commercial paper, she is liable, and has incurred all the responsibilities of private persons under the same circumstances. While this is in the main true, the state is not lightly exposed to pay its securities twice. These bonds could not have any legal validity after they were withdrawn from commerce. The theft committed in reissuing them, and the flagrant violation of the law, made them valueless in any hands. It is settled that debts unlawfully contracted by a municipal corporation are not binding upon it, although negotiable in form. If there is no authority to issue its bonds or commercial paper, there can be no bona fide holder, in the commercial sense of the term. Township of East Oakland v. Skinner, 94 U. S. 255; Marsh v. Fulton Co., 10 Wall. 676; School Directors v. Fogleman, 76 Ill. 189; Cecil v. Board, 30 La. Ann. 34. In Chisholm v. City of Montgomery, 2 Woods, 594, it was held that the negotiable form of the security did not preclude the defendant from denying the authority of the officers by whom the faith of the city had been pledged. That the officers and agents of private corporations, intrusted by them with the management of their own business and property, may subject their principals to the consequences of their unauthorized act, but that the body politic is not thus bound by the acts or declarations of its agents. "If it could be, unbounded scope would be given to the peculations and frauds of public officers." That third persons, holders of the bonds, were bound to take notice of the defects. These and other exceptions have led us to the conclusion that all the responsibilities of private persons do not form part of the obligation of a municipal corporation on its bond, nor of the state. In Cagwin v. Town of Hancock, 84 N. Y. 532, it was held that there can be no bona fide holder of town bonds within the meaning of the law applicable to negotiable paper, as they are only binding upon the town when issued in the way pointed out by statute. In Moffat v. U. S., 112 U. S. 25, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10, the court decided that the United States do not guaranty the integrity of its officers, and hold themselves bound by their misconduct or fraud. Says the court in that case: "The position that, as the frauds charged were committed by officers of the United States, the court erred in not holding their acts to be binding, and in not giving to the patents the force of valid conveyances, is certainly a novel one. The government does not guaranty the validity of the acts of its officers. It prescribes rules for them, requires an oath for the faithful discharge of their duties, and exacts from them a bond with stringent conditions. It also provides penalties for their misconduct or fraud; but there its responsibility ends. They are but the servants of the law, and if they depart from its requirements the government is not bound. There would be a wild license to crime if their acts, in disregard of the law, were to be upheld to protect third parties." District of Columbia v. Cornell, 130 U. S. 655, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 694. The state government required similar formalities to be complied with by its officers. The required oath was taken, and bond furnished. The criminal statutes provide punishment against their frauds. If, with these requirements, the responsibility of the United States ends, for similar reason that also of the state ends. "It has been held in England in recent cases that a corporate bond in negotiable form, which has come into the plaintiff's hands for value after having stolen from the rightful owner, was subject to defense." Rand. Com. Paper, par. 327. Free-school bonds were sold by the auditor and treasurer under Act 81 of 1872. The court declared the act unconstitutional, and denounced it as an act of spoliation, intended and designed to deplete the treasury of every available asset or fund. State v. Board, 29 La. Ann. 81. The Sun Mutual Insurance Company became the owner of 11 of these bonds before maturity for valuable consideration. Suit was brought by the company against the board of liquidation to have them funded. The court decided against the application to fund, and held that the laws of 1855 and 1857, setting aside these bonds for the schools, took them out of commerce, and that third persons, however innocent, could not hold them as owners. These bonds were sold under some color of law. The sale had legislative sanction, and the auditor and treasurer acted in compliance with a statute which was subsequently declared unconstitutional. In matter of the bonds now under consideration, their reissue from the treasurer's office was an outrageous fraud, which absolutely vitiates them in any hands in which they may be found.

By taxation private property is appropriated to public ends and legitimate purposes. The element of negotiability of bills, notes, and bonds makes a contract, founded upon paper adopted for circulation, different in many important particulars from other contracts known to the law. That element loses all force when paper has been placed in commerce in violation of law to perpetrate a fraud upon the state. The holder of a bond of a municipal corporation is bound to look to the action of the officers, and ascertain whether the law has been so far followed by them as to justify the issue. The right of a state cannot be less. The decisions relating to private corporations and to persons do not apply against the state. The state's authority to issue bonds is founded on law of which every one is presumed to have knowledge. These who deal in state securities will be presumed to have examined them, and to have known whether they could be in commerce. The dealer in bonds of private corporations, or in bills and notes of individuals, has not the same opportunity of examination, and the same presumption of law does not arise. The by-laws of corporations are not open to inspection by those who deal in securities issued by them, and therefore the reason for distinction. Those who deal in state securities had opportunity to know whether the treasurer had any lawful right to issue them, for the reason that his authority, if any existed, was to be found in public statutes; and, if they did not in fact examine, as it was their privilege to do, before buying, they will be presumed to have done so, and to have known that they were issued without authority of law, and therefore void in the hands of any holder either with or without notice. The bonds sued upon are the property of the state, and were within her reach and in her possession when they were ordered to be destroyed. In argument it is urged that the state is estopped by the information given by one of her officers that the bonds sued upon were valid bonds. If that plea were maintained, it would be equivalent to maintaining a ratification. No such ratification could be made. We have found no grounds to reverse the judgment appealed from. Judgment affirmed, at defendants' costs.

FENNER, J., (concurring.) The case presents two questions, viz.: First. Are the bonds in controversy valid and subsisting obligations of the state of Louisiana? If so, plaintiff has received all that she bought or intended to buy, and has nothing to complain of. Second. Even if said bonds are invalid, are the defendants bound to reimburse the price they received for them?

1. It is shown that four of the bonds are consolidated bonds of the state, which, on and prior to the 1st day of January, 1880, were held by the state "for the use of the Agricultural and Mechanical College Fund." As to these bonds, the constitution of the state (article 233) declares: "The consolidated bonds of the state, now held by the state for the use of said fund, shall be null and void after the 1st day of January, 1880, and the general assembly shall never make any provision for their payment, and they shall be destroyed in such manner as the general assembly may direct." The remaining bond in controversy is a consolidated bond, which had been surrendered to the state in exchange for a constitutional bond, in pursuance of the provisions of the state debt ordinance, which, by virtue of its ratification by the people, became a part of the constitution. At its first session after the adoption of the constitution the general assembly passed an act providing for the cancellation and destruction of the bonds so surrendered and exchanged. Act 121 of 1883. Instead of retaining, canceling, and destroying these bonds, which had thus been conclusively extinguished and rendered null and void by the mandate of the constitution, it appears that the then treasurer of the state fraudulently abstracted them from the treasury of the state, and placed them on the market. The proposition that such fraudulent act could have effect to revive the extinguished obligation of the state upon these bonds or could confer upon the existing government of the state any right or power to make provisions for their payment, in the teeth of the positive prohibition of the constitution, seems, to me at least, to involve the assertion of nothing less than an extravagant impossibility. What function or power has this court except to administer and apply the constitution and laws of the state? We have quoted the provisions of constitution and law bearing on this case. Are they ambiguous? No. Are they beyond the legislative authority which adopted them? No. Then whence can this or any court derive the power to nullify them? We might rest our conclusion with absolute security upon two prior decisions of this court, rendered in cases absolutely analogous to the instant one in every feature save that in those cases there was no intended fraud, but that the bonds had been emitted in virtue of authority conferred by an act of the legislature, regularly passed, but which the court held to be unconstitutional; and surely no one could contend that the illegal act of an executive officer could have greater effect in defeating the constitutional rights of the state than a like act of the general assembly, approved by the governor. In the cases referred to, as in this, the bonds were originally valid bonds of the state. They belonged to a series of bonds of which many were still rightfully outstanding, and from which they were indistinguishable in any respect except as to the numbers which they bore. They were negotiable in form, and were held by purchasers in open market and before maturity, and with no other notice "than would result from their presumed knowledge of the acts and proceedings of the state and its officials." The same arguments, based upon the law of negotiable instruments, were addressed to the court then as now; but the court, after reciting the constitutional and legal provisions which prohibited the emission of those particular bonds, said: "These laws, to all intents and purposes, took these bonds out of commerce. They were placed in the special and joint custody of the secretary of state and treasurer, who were required to execute duplicate receipts therefor, and to be and remain a perpetual fund, inviolably appropriated to support of public schools. They ceased to be negotiable by virtue of these positive declarations of legislative will, and the usages and laws of commerce relative to negotiable paper are superseded by these positive enactments, and are inapplicable to the case. We follow the commercial law only when it does not conflict with statute laws of the state, but no further. It is within the power of the state to destroy the negotiability of all paper, and to withdraw from commerce such things as it may deem proper." Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. Board of Liquidation, 31 La. Ann. 175; State v. Board, 29 La. Ann. 77. These decisions are, for us, the highest of all judicial authority as to the subject-matter of which they treat; higher even than that of the supreme court of the United States, unless it can be shown that they involve some federal question, on which we acknowledge the paramount authority of that high tribunal. We can discover no federal question in those cases or in this. Nobody would seriously question the power of the state to modify, repeal, or abrogate the law-merchant, except, at least, in so far as such action might impair contract rights existing at the date of such legislation; and, inasmuch as the rights here involved necessarily arose after the date of the legislation, and after the facts which gave effect thereto, this possible exception cannot apply. In absence of any federal question it may be confidently asserted that in such a case, involving simply the interpretation and application of the constitution and laws of the state, the supreme court of the United States, in accordance with its conservative and settled policy, would adopt and follow the decisions of this court. Such, nevertheless, is my respect for that court, and my desire to maintain harmony between federal and state jurisprudence, that any clearly conflicting decisions rendered by it would arrest my grave attention to the merits of such a conflict as determining whether we should maintain or overrule the prior decisions of this court. I fail to find anything in the federal decisions referred to which conflicts with the decisions above referred to. The supreme court of the United States has emphatically repudiated the doctrine that the government can be bound by the frauds of its officers. We quote its language: "The position that, as the frauds charged were committed by officers of the United States, the court erred in not holding their acts to be binding, and in not giving to the patents the force of valid conveyances, is certainly a novel one. The government does not guaranty the integrity of its officers, nor the validity of their acts. It prescribes rules for them, requires an oath for the faithful discharge of their duties, and exacts from them a bond with stringent conditions. It also provides penalties for their misconduct or fraud; but there its responsibility ends. They are but servants of the law, and if they depart from its requirements the government is not bound. There would be a wild license to crime if their acts, in disregard of the law, were to be upheld to protect third parties, as though performed in compliance with it." Moffat v. U. S., 112 U. S. 24, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10. From this doctrine it has never deviated by a hair's breadth save in one case, viz., Cooke v. U. S., 91 U. S. 389. That case, like the case of State v. Wells, 15 Cal. 337, involved no question of constitutional prohibition, and none of the power of the government to pay. Both were cases in which the government had actually paid the obligations, and was seeking to recover the amount so paid to bona fide holders. In Cooke's Case, the instruments which had been illegally issued, and had been actually redeemed by the United States, were treasury notes, printed by the government, perfect in form, complete, and ready for issue, intended to circulate and take the place of money, not differing, as the court said, "from coins of the mint when fully stamped and prepared for issue," and made a legal tender for the payment of government dues. We can well understand the vast importance to the government of preserving the circulating money of the country from all taint of possible doubt or suspicion; and under the stress of that motive the majority of the court denied the right of the United States to recover. But even in that case Justice MILLER took no part, and Justices CLIFFORD, FIELD, and BRADLEY dissented on the trenchant ground "that the United States are not liable for its paper promises, fraudulently or surreptitiously put into circulation; not even if the fraudulent act was perpetrated by treasury officials." A like question came before the court in a later case, and reference was made to the decision in Cooke's Case, and the unanimous court there referred to the particular circumstances presented therein, and which I have recited above, and said, "We are not prepared to extend the scope of that decision." The court then held that the District of Columbia could not be held bound to even a bona fide holder of its negotiable paper not due, which had been redeemed and canceled by the district, and had thereafter been abstracted, the cancellation mark erased with detersive soap, and fraudulently put in circulation. District of Columbia v. Cornell, 130 U. S. 655, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 694. Although, in the instant case, the fact of cancellation is wanting, I fail to perceive any distinction between a fraudulent failure to cancel when the law required it and a cancellation so made that it could be fraudulently effaced. In both cases the instruments found their way into circulation through the fraud or fault of the officers, and the bona fide taker was no better protected by an inefficient cancellation, the evidence of which had been destroyed, than by the absence of any cancellation at all. I consider, therefore, that the decision in Cooke's Case, restrained as it is by the later decision referred to, has no application to the facts of this case, and that the last decision does apply to the facts here, and confirms the decisions of our own court. The instant case, however, presents one feature which separates it by an impassable gulf from the Cases of Cooke and Cornell, viz., the fact that the constitution of the state extinguished these obligations, and forbids the general assembly from ever making any provisions for their payment.

2. On the question of the obligation of the defendants to refund the price received for these invalid bonds, I consider it incontestable.

First. The views above expressed and the decisions quoted hold that the bonds in question had lost the character of negotiable instruments. It follows that defendants' obligations are governed not by the law-merchant, but by the provisions of the Civil Code regulating the contract of sale of non-negotiable incorporeal rights. A mere reference to the articles of the Code clearly shows that the vendor of such a right warrants its existence and validity. Rev. Civil Code, arts. 2474–2476, 2500, 2520, 2646.

Second. Even were it admitted that the bonds retained the characteristics of negotiability as between the parties to dealings in them, I consider that, under the law-merchant, the assignor warrants the genuineness, the validity, and legal operation of the negotiable instruments assigned by him. Benj. Sales, (4th Ed.) p. 695; Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 730 et seq.; Tied. Com. Paper, § 244 et seq.; 2 Pars. Notes & B. pp. 87, 42; Young v. Cole, 3 Bing. N. C. 724; Westropp v. Solomon, 8 C. B. 345. This question also has been decisively settled by this court, in a case where the assignor held in good faith a treasury note of the United States, which, it subsequently appeared, had been redeemed and canceled by the United States, but had been fraudulently purloined, the cancellation erased, and put in circulation. His assignee, after discovering these facts, sued him to recover the price, and this court awarded it. Knight v. Lanfear, 7 Rob. (La.) 172. The court said: "It is clear that the sale must be rescinded on account of the error of the plaintiff [and, we believe, of defendant also] as to the substance of the object of the sale. * * * If the character of the note, and all the circumstances attending its redemption, the purloining of it, and the conduct of the officers of the United States before and after the purloining, had been disclosed to the plaintiff when he purchased the note, it is clear he would not have bought. He wished to purchase, and believed he was purchasing, an unadulterated treasury note, receivable in payment of duties, and salable at the market price; one which he could not be compelled to take back after he had sold it. He was in an error when he received the note which is the subject of the present suit. His error prevented his consent, and the absence of his consent deprived the sale of all its effects and consequences." The case of Otis v. Cullum, 92 U. S. 447, which is relied upon as counter to the doctrines above enunciated, is clearly distinguishable, and rests upon an entirely different principle, viz., that "the plaintiffs in error got exactly what they intended to buy and did buy." The facts showed that they bought bonds of the city of Topeka, which had been issued under certain laws of the state of Kansas, which were subsequently decided to be unconstitutional, and the bonds annulled. All the bonds issued under these laws stood in the same case. It was not a case where some were good and some bad. The plaintiff simply bought bonds issued under these laws, and he received bonds so issued, and just as good as any other bonds so issued. He got what he bought and intended to buy, and could not complain; his information as to the matter being the same as that of his assignor. But here the bonds sold are part of the consolidated bonds of the state of Louisiana, all of which are valid and binding obligations of the state except those which have been annulled or redeemed. Obviously the plaintiff here intended to buy good bonds; not worthless similitudes, which had been extinguished by constitutional mandate or by valid redemption. She did not get what she bought, and her assignor cannot keep the good money which he received for bad bonds. The supreme court of Nebraska has, in a forcible opinion, shown the inapplicability of Otis v. Cullum, to cases like this. Rogers v. Walsh, 12 Neb. 28, 10 N. W. Rep. 467.

Yielding the utmost force that can be claimed to the equitable considerations which might influence the state in assuming responsibility for the wrongs inflicted on third persons by the fraudulent acts of its own chosen officers, the stubborn fact remains that the existing government is not bound, and even lacks the power, to make any provisions for the redemption of these bonds. This leaves the case within the inexorable grasp of the authority of the decision in Knight's Case, where the court went much further than we can go in this case, and said: "We have considered the defense in the most favorable view in which it can be placed for the defendants. We have assumed, for the sake of argument, that the conduct of the officers of the treasury department, of the custom-house, and of the bank at which the interest was paid, had been such as to entitle the fair holder of the note to demand its amount from the United States." But even on this hypothesis the court said the purchaser did not buy "the chance of a successful application at Washington for the reimbursement of what he advanced. He wished to purchase, and he believed he was purchasing, an unadulterated treasury note, receivable in payment of duties at the custom-house, and salable at the market price; one which he could not be compelled to take back after he had sold it. He was in error when he received as such the note which is the object of the present suit. His error prevented his consent, and the absence of his consent deprived the sale of all its effects and consequences." It is apparent that plaintiff intended to buy, and defendants to sell, untainted and unquestioned bonds of the state, the redemption of which in principal and interest is provided for in the existing constitution and laws; not bonds which the government of the state, as organized under that constitution, cannot and will not provide for, and which can never be recognized or redeemed by any power short of an amendment of the constitution. For these reasons, as well as for those more elaborately stated in the principal opinion, I concur in the decree, and Justices MCENERY and BREAUX also concur in this opinion.

WATKINS, J., (dissenting.) It appears that on April 24, 1889, the plaintiff bought of defendants five bonds of the state of Louisiana, of $1,000 each, for which she paid $4,443.75; and, alleging her subsequent discovery of the fact that said bonds were not valid, and that the state had refused to recognize them, she demands of defendants restitution of the price paid therefor. The grounds of nullity assigned are, viz.: First. That four of said bonds —those numbered, respectively, 742, 842, 866, and 883, which heretofore formed a part of the consolidated bonds held by the state for the use and benefit of the Agricultural and Mechanical College—were, by the 233d article of the state constitution, declared to be null and void after the 1st day of January, 1880, and for the payment of which the legislature was, in terms, prohibited from making any provisions; and that it also commanded that same should be destroyed in such manner as the general assembly may direct. Second. That the bond numbered 5,611, being one of the series of consolidated bonds which had been exchanged under Act 121 of 1880 for constitutional bonds, is, quoting from plaintiff's brief, page 3, "paid and extinguished." Against this action three defenses are set up, viz.: First, that defendants acted as brokers, and are only liable for frauds or faults, and are free from both; second, that, if the transaction is deemed a sale, it was of a specific thing, and defendants delivered exactly what the plaintiff bought; third, that the bonds in question are valid outstanding obligations of the state.

1. On the first proposition, my opinion is in accord with that of the majority of the court, for the reasons stated, that, if defendants acted as brokers in the transaction, and sold the bonds to plaintiff for other persons than themselves, their liability is that of vendors, for the reason they failed to disclose the fact of their having acted in that capacity, or the names of their principals. Brokers buy and sell on their own account, customarily, as well as upon the account of others. If they sell on their own account, they are evidently responsible; and to avoid such responsibility they must show who their undisclosed principals are.

2. On the second proposition I am also in accord with the majority of the court, —that is to say, if the transaction is to be viewed as one of sale or assignment, and therefore governed by the precepts of the Civil Code, and not as a transfer of negotiable instruments, and therefore controlled by the principles of the law-merchant; for, as vendors of bonds as articles of merchandise, defendants are bound, under the law of warranty, to protect plaintiff; while as bona fide holders and transferrers of negotiable securities a different rule obtains; for, say the supreme court, speaking through Mr. Justice SWAYNE, in Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. 110: "The general rule of the common law is that, except by a sale in market overt, no one can give a better title to personal property than he has himself. The exemption from this principle of securities transferable by delivery was estab lished at an early period."

3. But on the third proposition I cannot agree with the majority of the court. The proof is clear to the effect that the bonds in question are genuine consolidated bonds of the state of Louisiana, regularly and properly issued under and in pursuance of the funding laws and the corresponding constitutional amendment; that they were duly signed by the governor, auditor, and secretary of state, and the interest coupons thereto attached were signed by the state treasurer and auditor, as required by the provisions of section 3 of the funding act of 1874; that they were apparently issued by the board of liquidation, provided by section 2 of that act, and were by said board regularly exchanged for "valid outstanding bonds of the state," and possessed, primarily, a good consideration; that they were payable to bearer at 40 years from the 1st of January, 1874,—regularly numbered, and bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent., payable semi-annually; that they composed and represented a part of the bonded debt of the state, the amount of which was fixed in the funding act of 1874 at $15,000,000, and which was intended to "constitute a systematized issue of bonds, having uniformity in date, maturity, and form." Hope v. Board, 43 La. Ann. 763, 9 South. Rep. 754. These facts are not questioned by the opinion of the majority, nor by counsel for the plaintiff; the theory of the latter being that said bonds heretofore formed a part of the consolidated bonds of the state, but, for reasons assigned as subsequently happening, same had ceased to be legal and valid obligations of the state. It is this latter proposition that the defendants deny. In order to test the validity of said bonds in the hands of defendants as holders thereof, on the 24th of April, 1889,—the date plaintiff purchased them,—the status of the bonds, primarily, must be ascertained and first determined. For on the foregoing state of facts the defendants' contention is that they were bona fide holders of the negotiable paper of the state of Louisiana, maturing at a date in the future, and are entitled to the protection of the law-merchant, on the theory that a state, like the United States, when she makes herself a party to negotiable instruments, through her duly-authorized officers, acting under constitutional and statutory warrant, incurs all the risks and responsibilities of an individual maker or indorser of such instruments under like circumstances. While, on the other hand, counsel for the plaintiff, admitting "that, as between holders of said bonds, they are governed in all particulars by the jurisprudence applicable to negotiable instruments," denies that, "as regards the state, the principles can be so sweeping;" for, says he, "to admit such a proposition would concede the power of an officer charged with the mission of certain state or municipal securities to overwhelm the state or municipalities with an unlimited and incontestable debt." Therefore the first question to be solved in the effort to test the primary validity of the bonds under consideration is the capacity and character of the state as maker thereof.

(aa) Apparently these bonds are invested with the fullest sanction that could be given to any piece of paper which a sovereign state could issue and put upon the markets of the world. They have the fullest possible sanction of the legislature of the state, as expressed in the funding statutes. At the same session of the general assembly whereat the funding laws were enacted, a constitutional amendment was proposed, which declared, inter alia, that "the issue of consolidated bonds authorized by the general assembly of the state at its regular session in 1874 is hereby declared to create a valid contract between the state and each and every holder of said bonds, which the state shall by no means impair; and that "the said bonds shall be valid obligations of the state in favor of any holder thereof, and no court shall enjoin the payment of the principal or interest thereof, or the levy and collection of the tax therefor," etc. (Italics are mine.) Act 8 of 1874; Act 4, p. 42. This amendment was adopted as a part of the organic law, prior to the date of the issuance of said consolidated bonds, and constituted and remained a part thereof until the 1st of January, 1880. Hence the whole series of consolidated bonds was not only authorized by statute and constitutional amendment, but in said amendment the bonds are declared to be "valid contracts between the state and each and every holder thereof," and also "valid obligations of the state in favor of any holder thereof." It were, in my opinion, a vain effort to search out words of more evident and emphatic import with which to clothe a statutory or constitutional mandate, authorizing certain designated state officers to bind the state to a solemn contract, than are those I have just quoted from the funding statute and constitutional amendment. Manifestly, it was upon the faith of these laws—statutory and constitutional—that the public creditors of the state accepted such consolidated bonds, and gave in exchange therefor other warrants and obligations of the state. Then, what is the position the state occupies in such a contract towards its creditors and other persons who acquire possession of such paper in market overt? An examination of the authorities will attest the truth of the rule to be that the government of a state, like that of the United States, when she makes herself a party to negotiable paper, incurs all the risks and responsibilities of an individual maker or indorser of such instruments under like circumstances. One author states the rule to be that "government bonds, payable to bearer, or otherwise negotiable in form, are negotiable instruments, and may be transferred as such." Rand. Com. Paper, p. 449, § 348. "The government of the United States, it has been held, may, by its authorized officers, become a party to negotiable paper, with all the rights and liabilities of an individual, except the liability to be sued." Id. § 350. Another states it thus: "Except in so far as the power of the government may be restricted by constitutional limitation, there can be no doubt that both the state and federal governments may, by their duly authorized agents, become parties to any species of commercial paper." Tied. Com. Paper, p. 129, § 132. Another author puts it thus: "There is no doubt that when an officer of the government, federal or state, who is authorized to bind the government as drawer, maker, or acceptor of a negotiable instrument, draws or accepts a bill, or makes a note, in behalf of the United States or the state which he represents, its validity cannot be questioned when it has passed into the hands of a bona fide holder for value, without notice of any defect. The government would then be bound by its negotiable paper, just as an individual would." 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. p. 330, § 436. The foregoing opinions of text-writers are founded, in the main, on the authority of U. S. v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet. 377, and Floyd's Acceptances, 7 Wall. 666. And, in my opinion, I cannot do better than quote a single paragraph from the former case, as presenting in the clearest light the view entertained by the supreme court on the question. They say: "When the United States, by its authorized officer, become a party to negotiable paper, they have all the rights and incur all the responsibilities of individuals who are parties to such instruments. We know of no difference, except that the United States cannot be sued. But if the United States sue, and a defendant holds its negotiable paper, the amount of it may be claimed as a credit, if, after being presented, it has been disallowed by the accounting officers of the treasury; and, if the liability of the United States upon it be not discharged by some of those causes which discharge a party to commercial paper, it should be allowed by a jury as a credit against the debt claimed by the United States." Citing Peters v. Insurance Co., 1 Story, 464; Bank v. Dunn, 6 Pet. 57; U. S. v. Barker, 12 Wheat. 561. And one selected from the latter case puts the governing rule in even a stronger light, for in that case the court, speaking through Mr. Justice MILLER, said: "It must be taken as settled that when the United States becomes a party to what is called 'commercial paper,'—by which is meant that class of paper which is transferable by indorsement or delivery, and between private parties is exempt in the hands of innocent holders from inquiry into the circumstances under which it was put in circulation,—they are bound in any court to whose jurisdiction they submit by the same principles that govern individuals in their relations to such paper." (Italics are mine.) Those two cases involved time-drafts, or bills of exchange, drawn, one by a contractor, for army supplies, on and accepted by the secretary of war, and the other by a mail contractor, on and accepted by the postmaster general, and in possession of third holders for value, before maturity. But in Vermilye v. Express Co., 21 Wall. 138, the court dealt with United States treasury notes, and in the course of its opinion said: "We cannot agree with counsel for the appellants that the simple fact that they were the obligations of the government takes them out of the rule which subjects the purchaser of overdue paper to an inquiry into the circumstances under which it was made, as regards the rights of antecedent holders;" thus reaffirming the same doctrine as that announced previously. This principle has been announced in many recent cases, and notably in Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 432, in which the court employed this emphatic language, viz.: "The truth is, states and cities, when they may borrow money, and contract to repay it with interest, are not acting as sovereignties. They come down to the level of ordinary individuals. Their contracts have the same meaning as that of similar contracts between private persons. Hence, instead of there being, in the undertaking of a state or city to pay, a reservation of a sovereign right to withhold payment, the contract should be regarded as an assurance that such a right will not be exercised. A promise to pay, with a reserved right to deny or change the effect of the promise, is an absurdity." In Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 711, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 128, the supreme court, in speaking of the identical issue of consolidated bonds we are now considering, said: "Whatever may be, ordinarily, the effect of a promise or a pledge of faith by a state, the language employed in this instance shows unmistakably a design to make these promises and these pledges so far contracts that their obligation would be protected by the constitution of the United States against impairment."

I have gone into this question very thoroughly on account of its overshadowing importance, in my opinion, in this case; and in so doing I have confined myself to the views of text-writers and opinions of the supreme court; not because I was dealing with a federal question, but because I regarded them as the best exposition of the law-merchant, with respect to negotiable securities of the governments of the United States and of the states. Having, as I confidently submit, made a demonstration of the proposition that prefaces this paragraph,—that is to say, in the execution of negotiable instruments, payable at a future date, governments come down to the level of ordinary persons, and incur all the responsibilities of individuals who are parties to such instruments, while possessing all of their rights,—I will next address myself to the charges of nullity and illegality which the plaintiff assigns as the ground she relies upon for recovery of defendants; and, at the risk of being tedious, I will restate the case, as presented by the pleadings, and then analyze the evidence that is furnished us in the transcript of the nullity and illegality of the bonds in suit. We will first examine the case as applicable to the four bonds which are denominated "Agricultural and Mechanical College Bonds," of $1,000 each.

(bb) The plaintiff alleges that she purchased of the defendants, as brokers in bonds, doing business as such in the city of New Orleans, 20 bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each, "known commonly as four per cent. bonds of the state of Louisiana," with interest coupons attached, and for which she paid 88⅞ cents on the dollar; that being the marked price therefor at that date. That said bonds have since remained in her possession, and "she discovered only recently that four of said bonds, numbered, respectively, 742, 842, 866, and 883, are not legal bonds of the state of Louisiana; that they have never been lawfully issued; that they were not, at the time of said sale, and have never since been, valid and legal obligations of the said state; and that they are a part of the consolidated bonds which were formerly held by the treasurer of the state of Louisiana for the use of the Agricultural and Mechanical College fund, and that said bonds were declared by the 233d article of the constitution of Louisiana to be null and void after the 1st day of January, 1880, and that the general assembly of Louisiana was prohibited by said article from ever providing for the payment of said bonds." In addition, her petition contains the distinct admission that she collected the interest coupons on said bonds maturing on the 1st of July, 1889, subsequent to her acquisition of them from defendants; and avers that she presented those coupons maturing on the 1st of January, 1890, to the fiscal agent of the state for payment, but payment thereof was refused. It thus appears that plaintiff's charges are founded exclusively upon the nullity resulting from the declaration of the constitution, and not upon any specific charge of fraud upon the part of any officer of the state government, or upon any averment of embezzlement or theft of said bonds from the custody of any state fiduciary or depository. There is no averment that defendants acquired said bonds, or any one of them, male fide, or with knowledge of the alleged nullities, other than such as may have been conveyed to them by the said constitutional provisions. Defendants' answer alleges that they are, and have been, large dealers, as brokers and otherwise, in the bonds of the state of Louisiana, which are negotiable securities, not yet due, and customarily bought and sold in open market, here and elsewhere; and that, as such, they passed daily from hand to hand, without other warranty than that the signatures thereto are genuine. They aver that these bonds are such negotiable instruments as were put in circulation by and through the duly-appointed officers of the state for value; and that, in their hands, same are and were good and valid obligations of the state, and unimpeachable as to all equities existing between the state and her officers, and consequently plaintiff is without any right of complaint. Now, what is the evidence furnished by the transcript on the issues thus presented?

Taking the facts chronologically, I find the following, viz.:

(a) That on the 30th of November, 1874, there were presented to the board of liquidation 327 Agricultural and Mechanical College bonds of $1,000 each, for exchange in consolidated bonds, under and in conformity with the provisions of the funding act of 1874.

(b) That up to and inclusive of the date March 11, 1889, the following is the exact status of the bonded indebtedness of the state of Louisiana, viz.:

Whole amount of consolidated.....	$12,110,500 00
Less constitutional bonds.....	290,200 00
Difference.....	$11,820,300 00

And that of that amount there had been issued consolidated bonds of the denomination of $1,000; bonds numbered from 1 to 10,000. To this effect was the report of the present state treasurer to the secretary of the New York Stock Exchange on the date specified.

(c) A like statement is contained in the auditor's report for the years 1888 and 1889, from which is deducted the sum of $196,200 as representing Agricultural and Mechanical College bonds.

(d) The official report of the treasurer, made for the year 1879, shows that there were, in general terms, on hand at that date, viz.: "196 bonds of $1,000 each, issued by the state of Louisiana under Act 8 of 1874, numbered 710 to 905, inclusive; 2 bonds of $100 each; * * * total held for account of Agricultural and Mechanical College, $196,200.

(e) The present auditor and treasurer—

the former having been the incumbent for eight or ten years consecutively—state, as witnesses, that they "have never seen any of these bonds until recently, and that all of their knowledge in that respect is derived from official documents."

(f) The treasurer states that the interest coupons upon the bonds in question maturing on the 1st of July, 1888, and the 1st of January, 1889, were paid by the banks in New Orleans, that were acting as fiscal agents of the state; and the plaintiff's agent states as a witness that he collected the interest coupons falling due on the 1st of July, 1889, but that those falling due on the 1st of January, 1890, were refused payment.

(g) The treasurer states that there is in his office no evidence of his predecessor having made any report under Act 121 of 1880, in reference to the surrender of consolidated bonds.

(h) While there was a joint committee of the general assembly of 1880 appointed, and which, in a general way, represented in its report that the Agricultural and Mechanical College bonds, inter alios, were on hand, and recommended the appointment of a committee with authority to destroy them, this appears never to have been done. House Jour. 1880, p. 472.

(i) Another joint committee of the general assembly of 1882 adopted a resolution authorizing the auditor and treasurer to destroy the bonds referred to in the resolution of 1880, but no action seems to have been taken under it. Resolution of 1882, No. 127.

(j) Up to July, 1888, all the coupons carried by the banks, as stated in paragraph f, were subsequently destroyed by a joint committee of the general assembly.

(k) On the 20th of September, 1889, the said treasurer sent to the secretary of the New York Stock Exchange a communication, stating that "the following consolidated bonds of the state of Louisiana were declared null and void after the first day of January, 1880, by article 233 of the constitution of 1879, viz.: College and seminary funds, 196 bonds of $1,000 each, Nos. 710 to 905;" but he failed to state that said bonds were on hand, and then concluded his letter thus, viz.: "The foregoing bonds are null and void, and, as coupons of some of them have been presented for payment, it would appear that [some of the] bonds were on the market."

(l) On the 7th of September, 1890, previously, the auditor had given formal notice to the treasurer, and to the fiscal agents of the state, of suspicions he entertained in reference to these bonds of the Agricultural and Mechanical College.

(m) Contemporaneously an investigation was put on foot by the auditor and treasurer, which disclosed that a number of interest coupons corresponding with these bonds had been paid by the banks.

(n) At page 16 of the joint report made by said officers I find the following, viz.: "Only since the adoption of the report of the joint committee appointed under concurrent resolution No. 5 of 1888, have coupons, paid by the state's agents in London, New York, and New Orleans, been turned over to the auditor for cancellation, and it was when entering these coupons, taken up between January 22nd and July 30th last, (1889,) that numbers corresponding with the numbers of several of said bonds on the coupon-books which were marked 'Canceled' were found." (Italics are mine.) "A further investigation disclosed the fact that these coupons are not counterfeit, but coupons clipped from bonds which are supposed to have been destroyed as required by Act 121 of 1880, and concurrent resolution 127 of 1882."

(o) The treasurer, in answer to a further communication from the secretary of the New York Stock Exchange, making inquiry "as to the days and dates when the information contained in his previous letter was promulgated, designating the numbers of the bonds which were declared null and void," stated on the 29th of October, 1889, that "the information had been previously published in the New Orleans daily papers, and had been obtained from the banks which represent the state in the payment of the current coupons. The official report to the governor of the state, which was published on the 29th ultimo and copied in the daily papers, was the first official publication of the numbers of the illegal issue of bonds." (Italics are mine.)

(p) The purchasing agent of the plaintiff, as witness, states that he collected the interest coupons on July 1, 1889, "previous to any suspicions about the invalidity of the bonds;" adding that his first intimation as to their invalidity was in August or September, 1889, and that it was obtained from the newspapers.

(q) One of the defendants' firm states as a witness that the first intimation he had of any of the bonds his firm had been dealing in being fraudulent was in September, 1889, while he was in New York, and that "up to that time they had passed unquestioned from hand to hand," and that same "had been dealt with by the stock exchange like bank-notes." "They looked at the signatures, and, if they were all right, the bond passed." Both Moore and Wheeler circumstantially state that the defendants purchased said bonds on the same day and date on which they sold same to the plaintiff.

This analysis of the evidence clearly and indisputably demonstrates that there is no proof of any particular fraud or act of embezzlement on the part of any one in the emission of the four consolidated bonds in question, either alleged or proved. A comparison of these four bonds, made with bond 5,611,—which is not alleged to be one of the series of Agricultural and Mechanical College bonds,—will show them all to be of identically the same tenor and physical appearance; the four possessing no insignia of their being specially dedicated to said college fund. They are parts and parcels of the whole systematized series of the state's consolidated debt of $11,820,300. Aside from the report of the treasurer in 1879, there is no evidence tending to show that the $196,000 of Agricultural and Mechanical bonds were at any time physically in the possession of the state treasurer since they were issued by the board of liquidation in November, 1874, though the proof is abundant that they have been extant since 1880. The fact that they were not destroyed by the officers designated by legislative committees of 1880 and 1882—the bonds being in the original before the court, and in no manner defaced—definitely suggests their absence from the treasury then. That same have been in circulation is evidenced by the payment of interest coupons by the state's fiscal agents,—even to the plaintiff herself. Since the passage of the act of 1888 all interest coupons have been destroyed by legislative committees, apparently without examination or question. Not until the 20th of September, 1889,—subsequently to the plaintiff's purchase,—was official notification furnished by the treasurer to the New York Stock Exchange that the $196,000 of Agricultural and Mechanical College bonds of $1,000 each, bearing the numbers 710 to 905, had been declared null by the terms of the constitution of 1879. Not until the 7th of September, 1889, did the treasurer himself and the fiscal agents receive any notification of their supposed illegality. It was only by careful scrutiny of the coupon-book, and a comparison of the numbers of the coupons thereon registered as canceled with the numbers of the bonds in circulation, that the auditor made the discovery at all, and the fraudulent bonds were identified by their numbers. The treasurer officially states to the New York Stock Exchange, over his signature, under date October 29, 1889, that the "first official publication of the numbers of the illegal issue of bonds" was made to the governor on the 29th of September, 1889. The proof is clear that at the date of the defendants' acquisition of these bonds and their sale to the plaintiff, and antecedent to that time, neither party to this suit entertained the slightest suspicion of them; that they passed from hand to hand in market without question, and had been theretofore dealt with by the stock exchange in New Orleans like bank-bills.

The following is an extract from the 233d article of the constitution of 1879, which is relied upon as annulling the Agricultural and Mechanical College bonds, viz.: "The debt due by the state to the Agricultural and Mechanical College fund is hereby declared to be the sum of one hundred and eighty-two thousand three hundred and thirteen and 3-100 dollars, being the proceeds of the sales of lands and land scrip heretofore granted by the United States to this state for the use of a college for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts. Said amounts shall be placed to the credit of said fund on the books of the auditor and treasurer of the state as a perpetual loan, and the state shall pay an annual interest of five per cent. on said amount from January 1st, 1880, for the use of said Agricultural and Mechanical College. The consolidated bonds of the state now held by the state for the use of said fund shall be null and void after the first day of January, 1880, and the general assembly shall never make any provision for their payment, and they shall be destroyed in such manner as the general assembly may direct." Let me for a moment consider this constitutional mandate in reference to the bonds in question, and see what it is. First. It fixes the amount of the debt of the state at $182,313.03, and directs that that sum shall be placed to the credit of the Agricultural and Mechanical College fund on the books of the auditor and treasurer of the state, as a perpetual loan at interest. Second. It declares that "the consolidated bonds of the state now held by the state for the use of said fund shall be null and void after the first day of January, 1880." Third. It declares that "the general assembly shall never make any provision for their payment." Fourth. It further declares that said bonds "shall be destroyed in such manner as the general assembly may direct." The first thing that strikes my mind is that there is a marked inconsistency between the 1879 report of the state treasurer, that is so much relied upon, and the article of the constitution, in this: the constitution fixes the debt of the state to the Agricultural and Mechanical College fund at a little over $182,000, whereas the treasurer's report fixes the amount of the Agricultural and Mechanical College bonds at $196,000,—the amount of the bonds exceeding the amount of the debt recognized by $14,000. What has become of the surplus of bonds, which did not come within the reach of the constitutional fiat? Who is to venture the assertion, ex gratia,—for there is no evidence on that subject in the transcript,—that the bonds in suit are not of that surplus. Keeping in mind that in the treasurer's official announcement to the secretary of the New York Stock Exchange on 29th of October, 1889,—several months subsequent to the defendant's acquisition of their bonds, in open market,—"the first official publication of the numbers of the illegal issue of bonds" was made to the governor of the state on the 29th of September, 1889, and how can it be possible for any one to have known, in anticipation of that event, that these bonds did not form a part of the surplus of $14,000? even conceding for the argument that the remaining $182,000 were annulled. In the second place, as the article in question treats them as "the consolidated bonds of the state," and only declares that they "shall be null and void after the first day of January, 1880," they were admittedly and necessarily valid antecedent to that date. And if they went into circulation while esteemed to be valid by the terms of the constitution,—and nothing is shown to the contrary,—any attempt to annul them, in the hands of innocent third persons, would justly be considered an attempted impairment of a protected contract. Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 711, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 128. In the next place, it is perfectly plain that the general assembly has failed to carry out the constitutional mandate to destroy said bonds, and thus left it in the power of others to put them into circulation, and thus practice a fraud upon the state. For one of two propositions is clear: (1) The bonds were not in the state treasury in 1880 or subsequently, and therefore were unaffected by the article of the constitution; or (2) if they were, the general assembly was at fault in not having caused them to be destroyed, and thus put out of the reach of the thief and embezzler. In the last place, it is also plain that the failure of the general assembly to cause these bonds to be destroyed has resulted in the payment of their interest coupons during the years since 1880, and thus accomplishing, by indirect means, a violation of the constitutional prohibition that "the general assembly shall never make any provisions for their payment," as well as to induce the commercial world to put its trust in them as valid state securities, relying on the knowledge and good faith of the state's fiscal agents in paying the coupons. And just here a question arises as to the effect the public records and other official data hereinbefore mentioned have as matter of law upon dealers in such public securities; and I will, en passant, express my views upon it. My belief and deliberate conviction are that they do not affect them with any notice at all. Mr. Daniel states the rule thus: "Parties negotiating for negotiable instruments are not bound to take notice of public records and litigation which would affect them with notice were they dealing with the subject-matter. And therefore, when there is nothing on the face of the bill or note giving notice of any defects, the fact that the deed of trust securing its payment contains recitals which show the equities or offsets existing between the original parties does not weaken the position of a bona fide holder without notice." 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 880. This doctrine has been accepted and approved by this court in Morris v. Cain's Adm'rs, 39 La. Ann., at pages 731, 732, 1 South. Rep. 797, and 2 South. Rep. 418. In a previous case this court also took occasion to announce the same principle in a different form of expression, thus: "Had the note been paraphed to identify it with the act of pledge, the defendant might, perhaps, have charged that the pledgee was thereby put on his guard, notified of the declaration contained in the act of sale, and bound thereby, etc. * * * What he was bound to know was what he could have known, and, in point of fact, did know." Schepp v. Smith, 35 La. Ann. 3. These are matters a purchaser of negotiable instruments is not bound to know, as they appertain to matters dehors the instruments themselves, arising subsequent to their execution and issuance by competent authority.

(cc) I will now retrace my steps, and take up the consideration of bond 5,611. The treasurer and auditor state, as witnesses, that there are no reports or other evidence in either of their offices of the surrender of any consolidated bonds in exchange for constitutional bonds under and in pursuance of Act 121 of 1880, and consequently there is none in reference to this particular bond 5,611, against which the plaintiff brings the charge of nullity, because of its surrender under the provisions of the debt ordinance. There is, however, some parol testimony tending to show that this bond was surrendered for exchange on the 6th of July, 1883. In the communications of the treasurer to the New York Stock Exchange in 1889, it is stated that there were 21 consolidated bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each, surrendered for exchange in constitutionals, under Act 121 of 1880, and among the numbers furnished is found that of 5,611; and then it is announced that they are all null and void. But there is no proof that any legislative or other proceeding was undertaken, subsequent to the date specified, looking to the destruction of such surrendered bonds as the statute required. Then it is perfectly clear that this bond must be treated, in this discussion, just as it was evidently dealt with in market,—as a valid consolidated bond,—appearing, as it does here, in the original, without a mark or blemish of any kind upon it, and possessing all apparent indicia of a negotiable state security not yet due. This bond does not come under the nullifying ban of the constitution. Therefore all five of the bonds in suit (or under consideration in this suit, to speak more accurately) may be put on the same basis, and disposed of similarly.

(dd) What are the defenses that can be successfully urged against negotiable state securities in the hands of an innocent holder for value before maturity? That is the precise question we have confronting us here. The general rule, as formulated by Mr. Daniel, in reference to individuals, is as follows, to-wit: "By 'purchaser' or 'holder' of a negotiable instrument is intended any one who has acquired it in good faith, for a valuable consideration, from one capable of transferring it * * * in the ordinary course of business, * * * without notice of facts which impeach its validity as between antecedent parties." Such a holder possesses a title "unaffected by those facts, and may recover on the instrument, although it may be without any legal validity as between antecedent parties; as, for example, even though it was originally obtained by fraud, theft, or robbery." 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. p. 556, § 769. He extends that doctrine still further, and says: "It is to be observed, as a general rule, the purchaser can never be placed on a worse footing than his transferrer, although he himself could not, in the first instance, have acquired the vantage ground occupied by such transferrer. And therefore, even if he have notice that there was fraud in the inception of the paper, or that it was lost or stolen, or that the consideration had failed between some antecedent parties, or the paper be overdue and dishonored, he is nevertheless entitled to recover, provided his immediate vendor was a bona fide holder for value, unaffected by any of these defenses." Id. § 803. That principle was announced upon the authority of numerous adjudicated cases by the highest courts in many states,—our own among the number,—and of the supreme court, in Commissioners v. Clark, 94 U. S. 285. That section was quoted from Daniel with approval in Levy v. Ford, 41 La. Ann. 870, 6 South. Rep. 671, and upon the correctness of that principle I feel that I may rest with confidence. Thus it is that the possession of a negotiable instrument by such a holder carries with it a title that is fully protected against charge of fraud or theft or failure of consideration between antecedent parties; and that rule of property in such paper is so strong that such holder can convey to another a valid and indefeasible title, although the latter knew of its inherent defects. Not only so, but any one charging mala fides in such holder has the burden of proving it put upon him. Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 769. Having announced the general rule as above, the author then proceeds to deal with other grounds of defense, and says "that suspicion of defect of title, or knowledge of circumstances which would excite suspicion in the mind of a prudent man, or gross negligence on the part of the taker at the time of the transfer, will not defeat his title, * * * subject to the following modifications or qualifications, viz.: (1) That where it is shown by the defendant that the instrument originated in fraud or illegality, the burden of proof will be shifted to the holder, and he must then prove that he is a bona fide holder for value. (2) Where it is shown that the instrument was given for a consideration which by statute is declared void, the original taint follows it, and it is void in the hands of every holder, however innocent. And that no party can enforce a negotiable instrument, if it be not genuine, or if it be executed by a party incapable of entering into the contract on which it was given." (Italics are mine.) Id. p. 557, §§ 769, 806. Then he generalizes the principle, and says: "But the rule of the text is, we think, in conformity with the current and weight of authority, and the law-merchant. The fraud which shifts the burden of proof must be in the consideration or representations used in obtaining the execution of the instrument, and not in the after-breach of trust in diverting it from the uses for which it was intended." Id. p. 596, § 792. This precise distinction has been taken substantially in many cases decided by our predecessors. Oliver v. Andry, 7 La. 495; Dick v. Leverich, 11 La. 576; Jackson v. Bank, 2 Rob. (La.) 128; Bank v. Bank, 16 La. 457; Laborde v. Association, 4 Rob. (La.) 190; Bullit v. Hewitt, 11 La. Ann. 327. It finds complete sanction in the recent jurisprudence of the supreme court, as attested by the following cases: Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. 110; Orleans v. Platt, 99 U. S. 676; Shaw v. Railroad Co., 101 U. S. 557; Collins v. Gilbert, 94 U. S. 753; Cromwell v. County of Sac, 96 U. S. 59; and numerous other decisions. Mr. Randolph, in his treatise on Commercial Paper, says: "In order to constitute a valid security, any bond or negotiable obligation of the state must be issued on authority of the constitution and statute law." 1 Rand. Com. Paper, p. 494, § 348. And he lays down the general proposition that the powers and duties of officers and agents "of the government, whether federal or state, are defined by statute, which is notice to the world of the limitations to their authority." Id. § 440. The same author states the rule with regard to the negotiable instruments of a municipal corporation thus: "It may be laid down as a general principle that debts unlawfully contracted by a municipal corporation are not binding upon it. * * * So a municipal bond issued without authority is invalid, although it be negotiable in form. And the defense of original want of authority to issue the bond is available against all holders." Id. p. 488, § 343. Mr. Dillon, in treating of the same question, says: "And it is a general and fundamental principle that all persons contracting with a municipal corporation must, at their peril, inquire into the power of the corporation and its officers to make the contract; and a contract beyond the scope of the corporate power is void, although it be under the seal of the corporation." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 372, 381. Against such a contract the plea of ultra vires may be successfully interposed. Id. § 381. "In favor of bona fide holders of negotiable instruments, the corporation may be estopped to avail itself of irregularities in the execution of the power conferred; but it may always show that under no circumstances could the corporation lawfully make a contract of the character in question." (Italics mine.) Id. §§ 381, 416. After announcing the foregoing rule, the author proceeds to state what I conceive to be the proper line of demarkation that is to be drawn between the authenticity of state and municipal bonds in respect to the protection of the holder against latent equities, that is, as to when the power does exist; there being embarrassments and difficulties in respect to the evidence of compliance on the part of the officers of a municipal corporation that do not exist in respect to the acts of officers of a state. He says: "Such a power is frequently conferred, to be exercised in a special manner, or subject to certain restrictions, conditions, and modifications; but if it appears that the bonds show by their recitals that the power was exercised in the manner required by the legislature, and that the bonds were issued in conformity with those regulations, and pursuant to those conditions and qualifications, proof of non-compliance with same will be unavailing to the corporation." Citing, as the leading authority on the question, Commissioners v. Aspinwall, 21 How. 539, the author then proceeds as follows, viz.: "Obviously, then, the most important inquiries to be considered are those which relate to the question, when the power exists or arises, who is to decide whether it existed or had arisen, when the bonds were issued, and what will estop the corporation which issued them to set up in defense a non-compliance with antecedent or preliminary conditions." Id. § 416. This was, in my opinion, necessary to be observed, because of what I deem to be the inapplicability of very many decisions that are cited, in reference to defenses urged against municipal bonds in the hands of third holders. In respect to state bonds, no such embarrassment exists, inasmuch as the law authorizing the issuance of bonds is an exercise of sovereignty, only restricted by constitutional limitation; and to ascertain the authenticity of their issuance a simple inspection of the act will ordinarily suffice.

Having examined the enabling statute, and the constitutional authority for its enactment, a mere casual inspection of the state bond will readily disclose compliance therewith on the part of the officers intrusted with the duty of its confection; and nothing further is necessary to make it available as a negotiable security. And just here I deem it important to note what I conceive to be the inapplicability of Otis v. Cullum, 92 U. S. 447; Orleans v. Platt, 99 U. S. 676; and Insurance Co. v. Middleport, 124 U. S. 545, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625,—to the case at bar, and it is this: Those cases proceed on the theory that, admitting the illegality of the bonds in their inception, the last taker has no recourse against his predecessor under the principles of subrogation in equity, founded on the civil law; while this case proceeds on the theory that, bonds having a valid original existence being fraudulently dealt with since, the state is relieved from responsibility thereon, and the defendants' obligation of reimbursement rests upon the Louisiana law of warranty, the law-merchant not controlling the outlawed paper of the state. The theory of my dissent is that, it being first ascertained that the bonds were valid originally, no after act of fraud or illegality on the part of the state treasurer can be regarded as defeating the title of an innocent holder, under the principles of commercial law. So in the instant case, as there was manifestly no want of authority to issue the bonds in question, and no question of the authority of the board of liquidation to issue them, the defenses set up against them are clearly unavailing. No after-breach of trust in diverting the bonds, once regularly issued and put in circulation, from the uses for which they were intended, can affect their validity in the hands of innocent holders.

In Cooke v. U. S., 91 U. S. 389, the question was the right of the United States to recover of Jay Cooke & Co. the money paid to them by the assistant treasurer in redemption or purchase, before maturity, of, as stated by the court, "what purported to be eighteen 7-30 treasury notes, issued under the authority of the act of August 12, 1863, but which, it is alleged, were counterfeit." The defense was that Cooke & Co. honestly believed them to be genuine, and, so believing, in good faith received and paid for them, and there can be no recovery, even though they may have been counterfeit; and the court held that, as the notes were ascertained to be genuine, though unlawfully and surreptitiously put into circulation, the government was bound for their payment to a bona fide holder; and, consequently, there could no recovery in that case. (Italics mine.) That decision proceeded upon the theory that the notes were perfect and complete, and in no manner canceled or defaced; just such as the instruments we have here. But in District of Columbia v. Cornell, 130 U. S. 655, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 694, the court, while recognizing the doctrine of the Cooke Case, stated that they were not "prepared to extend the scope of that decision." The facts of that case were very different from those of the Cooke Case, as it appears from the opinion of the court that "the certificates in suit, after they had been redeemed according to law, were canceled by the proper officers by distinctly stamping in ink, across the face, words stating that fact," etc. Had the state of Louisiana caused the same or any similar acts to have been done, as directed by the article of her constitution, I should certainly not find occasion to express this dissent.

Strong reliance is placed by counsel of plaintiff, as well as in the opinion of the court, on Moffat v. U. S., 112 U. S. 24, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10, as stating a doctrine altogether at variance with that of the Cooke Case. In this I entertain a different opinion also from that of the majority. In the execution and issuance of treasury notes as commercial instruments, the United States made herself a party thereto as an individual, and not as a sovereign. But in the Moffat Case her relations with the register and receiver of the United States land-office were strictly governmental. The case cited was one instituted by the United States for the cancellation and revocation of two patents for land, granted under the pre-emption laws of congress; and it proceeded upon the theory that the persons named as patentees were fictitious, and that no settlement or improvement had been made on the land, which was, under the law, a condition precedent. The only question in that case was that of the binding force and efficacy of the acts of those public officials upon the government while in the discharge of the general duties of their offices, and not with regard to third persons, who had acquired, under exceptional circumstances, rights protected by apparent bona fides of such public officers under the law-merchant. In my opinion the government does not undertake to become responsible for the consequences of the non-feasances and misfeasance of her agents and officers towards third persons who may deal with them. On that question the court said in reference to the fraudulent and illegal acts of the register and receiver in issuing the patent certificates in question, viz.: "The government does not guaranty the integrity of its officers, nor the validity of their acts. * * * They are but the servants of the law, and if they depart from its requirements the government is not bound. There would be a wild license to crime if their acts in disregard of the law be upheld to protect third parties, as though performed in compliance with it." But to show conclusively that that decision was not intended to affect the question here, it is only necessary for me to cite the concluding portion of the opinion in that case, viz.: "There is, in such case, no room for the application of the doctrine that a subsequent bona fide purchaser is protected, etc. * * * To the application of this doctrine of a bona fide purchaser, there must be a genuine instrument, having a legal existence, as well as one appearing on its face, to pass the title. It cannot arise on a forged instrument, or one executed to fictitious parties,—that is, no parties at all,—however much deceived thereby the purchaser may be. Even in the case of negotiable instruments, where the doctrine is carried furthest for the protection of subsequent parties acquiring title to the paper, it cannot be invoked if the instrument is not genuine, or if it is executed without authority from the supposed maker." Citing Floyd's Acceptances, and other cases.

(ee) The final question on which I deem it necessary to present my views is in regard to the applicability of the cases of Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. Board of Liquidation, 31 La. Ann. 175, and State v. Board, 29 La. Ann. 77. While I concede the similarity of the questions discussed in those cases to the one under consideration here, and also concede the correctness of the principles therein announced, yet, in my view, they are inapplicable to this case. Those were suits against the state; and creditors of the state therein appearing as plaintiffs, and submitting themselves to the operation of the funding statutes, demanding the right to surrender obligations of the state in exchange for consolidated bonds, are conclusively presumed, and must be held bound, to have accepted the grace of those statutes as it was extended to them, coupled with the right of the state to question the validity of the tendered obligations under the terms of those laws. Hope v. Board, 43 La. Ann. 763, 9 South. Rep. 754; State v. Board, 42 La. Ann. 651, 7 South. Rep. 706, and 8 South. Rep. 577; State v. Board, 39 La. Ann. 395, 1 South. Rep. 910; State v. Board, 32 La. Ann. 318. In another recent case we said: "The state has given permission for a certain class of obligations to be presented by the holders of them to Louisiana courts for determination as to their validity; and thus, in authorizing suit against herself, she has pointed out the channel through which it must reach the courts; and it must be followed." Hope v. Board, 41 La. Ann. 535, 6 South. Rep. 819. In Lord Cecil v. Board, 30 La. Ann. 43,—a suit similar in all respects to those cited,—certain bonds of the state were denied the right of exchange under the amended funding statute of 1875, on the ground that same had been, in terms, declared by that statute of doubtful validity; hence, under the terms thereof, the board was without power to fund them into consolidated bonds until they had been first declared "to be legal and valid obligations of the state" by this court. Act 1875, p. 110. Of the issue thus presented this court very correctly expressed the following opinion, viz.: "Of what avail is an inquiry touching the validity of a bond, or its issuance in conformity to law, if the fact that it was not issued in conformity to law will not affect the right of the holder? Clearly this rule of commercial law does not apply here. The state can be sued in her own courts only by her permission, and in the manner and for the purposes indicated by her. The supplemental funding act required parties to resort to an action against the state, through a board of liquidation, to establish the good consideration and valid issue in conformity to law of the bonds offered for funding, and restricted this court to an ascertainment of these requisites by those bonds. It is that law, therefore, that must be our guide, and not the general commercial law, in actions like the present." This is no such case as that one was. The bonds which were surrendered to the board of liquidation in exchange for the consolidated bonds in controversy were of unquestioned validity, being state bonds, which were held in trust for the public school funds. The exchange was made without suit against the board of liquidation, and in the month of November, 1874, prior to the enactment of the supplemental funding act of 1875, under which the Durant and the Sun Mutual Insurance Company Cases were brought and decided. Under no circumstances can those cases be accepted as authorities controlling this case. And it would be clearly a non sequitur to argue from that jurisprudence as a premise that, after the board of liquidation had acted on the claims of creditors, and issued consolidated bonds, and they had gone into free and unrestrained circulation in the channels of commerce, the state can, by an exercise of sovereign power, destroy the negotiability of those obligations to which she had voluntarily, and for adequate consideration, made herself a party as an individual debtor. It will not do for this court to say that the state is only bound for such bonds as were physically and actually put into circulation by some authorized officer of the government, in pursuance of law. The supreme court says in the Cooke Case, "This, we think, is too narrow a construction of the act;" for they say: "In this [the treasury] department the secretary represents the government. His acts and his omissions within the line of his official duties are the acts and omissions of the government itself; and in all commercial transactions his negligence will be deemed to be the negligence of the government." Pages 401, 404.

It appears to me from every point of view that that case is an exact parallel to the instant one; and taking, as I have before remarked, the utterances of the supreme court as the epitome of jurisprudence on the law-merchant in this country, I must adhere to it, and, so doing, I feel constrained to dissent from the views expressed in the opinion of the majority of the court.

ON REHEARING.

FENNER, J. We have attentively considered this application. Whatever may be said as to the correctness of our interpretation of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States in the cases of Otis v. Cullum, 92 U. S. 447, and Cooke v. U. S., 91 U. S. 389,—from which, however, we see no reason to depart,—our decision in this case rests upon germinal principles, which are not, from any point of view, within the grasp of those cases. They are based exclusively upon the law-merchant. We hold:

First. That the law-merchant is only applicable in the state of Louisiana in so far as it has been embodied in, or is not in conflict with, the laws of the state; and that, while it has been long recognized as part of the law of the state, nothing prevents the state, in the exercise of the legislative power, from abrogating, repealing, or modifying it, provided such legislation operates prospectively, and does not impair contract rights existing prior to or at the date of such legislation.

Second. That the true meaning and effect of the constitutional provisions herein cited were to repeal and abrogate the law-merchant so far as it applied to the instruments in question; this judicial construction being not a new one, but resting on precedent decisions of this court in cases entirely analogous to the instant one.

Third. That the rights asserted by the defendants here all arose after the adoption of the constitutional provisions referred to, and after the conditions which gave effect to those provisions had occurred; and, therefore, that those rights must be governed, not by the law-merchant, but by the special laws thus enacted and interpreted by this court.

Fourth. That thus the instrument in controversy lost the qualities of negotiable instruments, and became subjects to the laws of this state governing the rights and obligations of parties in the transfer of non-negotiable incorporeal rights.

Fifth. That this court, being the creature of the constitution, is bound to obey, to apply, and to enforce the mandates of that constitution, in so far as they do not conflict with the paramount authority of the constitution of the United States.

Sixth. That the supreme court of the United States has never extended the principles suggested by even the broadest interpretation of Otis v. Cullum and Cooke v. U. S. to a case in any degree resembling the instant one, where the nullity of the instruments has been denounced by the constitution of the state, and where the state, as constituted, not only cannot be forced, but lacks the power, to recognize or provide for them, and where the law-merchant, so far as applicable to them, has been repealed.

Seventh. If the instruments involved in Cooke v. U. S. had belonged to a class which the constitution of the United States had stricken with nullity, and had forbidden the government from paying or providing for, that case would have been more germane to the instant one, and the decision would have been different.

Eighth. While Otis v. Cullum contains general expressions of apparently broader import, the true and sufficient principle on which it rests is clearly stated, viz., the purchaser got what he bought and intended to buy.

We can discover no principle of law under which, in a contract of sale intended by both parties to be the sale and purchase of valid bonds of the state, of which there were many subject to no question, the vendor could discharge his obligation by delivering worthless similitudes of such valid bonds, and could throw upon the innocent purchaser the loss, instead of looking to his own transferrer to make him whole. Rehearing refused.

WATKINS, J., adheres to his dissenting opinion.

CALDER v. POLICE JURY OF TERREBONNE.

(No. 10,963.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Feb. 8, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—POLICE JURY—AUTHORITY—TRACING ROAD.

1. Although police juries have no right to trace a line of road, as it is a duty which must be intrusted to a jury of freeholders, they have certain authority as to its width and direction. Unless it is shown that the police jury have absolutely dictated the line to be followed, it will not be held that they have exceeded their authority.

2. An ordinance which authorizes the taking of private property for public use must provide for compensation. Private property cannot be taken for public use without securing to the owner the compensation the jury of freeholders find allowable.

WATKINS, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Terrebonne; A. C. ALLEN, Judge.

Suit by David R. Calder to enjoin the police jury of Terrebonne from laying out a certain road. Verdict and judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and the injunction made perpetual.

L. F. Suthon, for appellant. L. C. Moise, for appellee.

ON MOTION TO DISMISS.

BREAUX, J. A number of residents of the parish of Terrebonne presented a petition to the defendant police jury, asking that steps be taken by that body to expropriate a road over certain designated lands. A resolution was adopted, appointing 12 freeholders to trace and lay out a public road in accordance with the requirements of the statutes authorizing such expropriation. The police jury directed that the road be laid out from Bayou Terrebonne to Bayou Point au Chien; thence down the right descending bank of said bayou to Dupre's bridge; from this bridge to other points stated in the ordinance. The committee of freeholders reported that they had laid out a road in compliance with the ordinance. In the report describing the road it is stated that the point of beginning is the lower line of the Aragon plantation, belonging to plaintiff. The committee further report that $200 will be ample compensation to plaintiff for his property sought to be expropriated, and for all damages. The report was received by the police jury and accepted, and that body ordered that the road as stated and traced in the report be declared to be a public road, and that due publication be made for 30 days in the official journal.

Before the 30 days had elapsed plaintiff sued out an injunction, alleging that at an expense of $3,000 he built a road and causeway through a marsh on his place, in order to make the rear portion accessible to cultivation. That the settlement seeking a right of way over the road to the public road passing in front along the Bayou Terrebonne should seek their way to the front over another plantation, named, as owing them a servitude of way. He alleges that the ordinance of the police jury and the action of the committee of freeholders are illegal and void for the reason that the road was laid off by the police jury, and not by the committee. He further urges that no appropriation was made and no ordinance was adopted with the view of compensating him, and that the declaration that the road is public, made without any action to secure an amount for his property, is void. The case was tried by jury. The judgment dissolves the injunction, declares the road public, and allows $500 to the plaintiff. He prosecutes the appeal.

The defendant charges that the total claimed, viz., $5,000, is fictitious, and that this court is without jurisdiction. The alleged value of the property is stated, and the damages claimed. These allegations are sworn to by the plaintiff. "The amount in dispute is the highest sum for which judgment can be rendered." This court has jurisdiction. Forstall v. Larche, 39 La. Ann. 287, 1 South Rep. 650.

ON THE MERITS.

Although there is some similarity between the ordinance of the police jury and the report of the committee of freeholders recommending the expropriation, it is not complete. In the ordinance no reference is made to defendant's place. In the report of the committee the road is traced over the place of the defendant. It is not made apparent that only one line could be followed by the committee. The petition in compliance with which the ordinance was adopted and the committee appointed was for the purpose of expropriating right of way to the Bayou Terrebonne. The isolated condition of the settlement, and the reasonable desire of the inhabitants to secure a needed road preclude the inference that they sought an expropriation over defendant's place only, and were unwilling to secure another elsewhere, although equally as advantageous. Although police juries have no right to trace a line of road, it must be laid out by a jury of freeholders. The police juries have some power intrusted to them "as to their proportion and direction." Section 2743, Rev. St. The ordinance did not, in this respect, exceed their power.

The declaration making the road public, without adopting any measures towards paying therefor, presents a question for our determination. Police juries can act only in the mode prescribed by the law creating them. In ordering this road to be opened they incurred a pecuniary liability, for the payment of which provision should have been made. Section 2786, Id. In proceedings for expropriation of private property all the formalities required by law must be strictly observed. An ordinance which authorizes a taking must provide for compensation. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 452. The tender of the compensation may be readily waived. The least act manifesting intention not to accept, and showing that the offer would be useless, has been held as justifying the omission of the tender. But in making an expropriation it should appear of record that provision has been made for the payment of the value which the expropriating authority admit as that of the property expropriated. The failure to make the required appropriation vitiates the jury's verdict. Although the testimony makes it obvious that petitioners have good reason to petition for a road, and that its advantages would prove considerable, the constitution and the statutes have placed safeguards around private property, which must be upheld; and one of the safeguards is that appropriation must be made to compensate the owner for the value of the property and the damages found. Provision must be made for compensation. Potter's Dwar. St. p. 378. Private property cannot be taken for public use without securing the owner just compensation. Elliott, Roads & S. p. 179; Watson v. Trustees, 21 Ohio St. 667. "If we are right in the view of this question, it would follow, if the act of 1834 had made provision for compensation for the land taken for the right of way, the act would have been constitutional." Brewer v. Bowman, 9 Ga. 41. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the verdict and judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided, and reversed, and that the injunction is made perpetual in prohibiting the police jury from enforcing an ordinance expropriating said road without appropriating the amount recommended by the jury of freeholders as a compensation for the expropriation.

WATKINS, J., (dissenting.) (a) I doubt plaintiff's right of appeal to this court in any event, because the law is that "whenever any individual through whose land a road laid out as aforesaid shall pass may be dissatisfied with the decision of the freeholders laying out the same, either as to the course the same is to take, or to the damages to him assessed, he may have an appeal to the district court for the parish in which the road lies: provided, he prosecute the same at the next session of the said court after the laying out of the said road or the assessment of the damages; and no appeal shall be set aside for want of form in bringing the same before the courts. Injunction to stop proceedings may be issued in said case, when the case requires the same." Rev. St. § 3370. In such case the appeal is sui generis, and altogether informal, and an injunction operates as a restraining order in that case. It is not a new suit or proceeding; and no new, separate, and distinct trial and judgment is contemplated in the statute. The whole question is one of police administration, and of a purely political character, and not judicial. Of such a class of proceedings this court has been given no jurisdiction.

(b) I am of the opinion that damages are only contemplated in cases where roads are actually laid out in pursuance of an ordinance of a police jury, because the law is that for "all roads to be hereafter opened and made * * * it shall be the duty of said freeholders * * * to assess such damages as any person may sustain." Id. § 3369. In this case a new road was not traced and laid out through the complainant's premises and plantation, but a road already in existence was adopted, and declared, pro hac vice, a public road.

(c) I am of opinion that the one in question is, in no proper sense, an expropriation proceeding, because it does not contemplate the condemnation of the property, but simply and only the creation of a servitude of way. It is in the nature of an appropriation, though, in certain cases, entitling the proprietor over whose property it is laid to damages, because the law is that "nothing in this section shall be so construed as to * * * prevent any owner of the soil on which a public road shall pass to resume the use and possession of such soil whenever the said road shall have been abandoned by the public, or shall have been transferred elsewhere," etc. Id. § 3369. Entertaining these doubts in respect to the law controlling this case, I feel constrained to dissent.

WEBRE et al. v. BOURGEOIS, Sheriff, et al.

(No. 10,970.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Feb. 8, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)[1]

EXECUTION—INJUNCTION AGAINST—MORTGAGES.

1. The defendants in execution, who have retained the free use of the property seized, have not sustained any injury, and are not entitled to an injunction.

2. The order of seizure and sale, in so far as relates to the surplus of the purchase price, reads: "And the balance, if any, of the price of adjudication, cash;" thus complying with the article which provides that the purchaser shall apply the surplus of the price, if there be any, to paying the special mortgages existing on the property subsequent to that of the suing creditor. The advertisement issued in compliance with the order does not read so as to preclude the purchaser from thus retaining the price, and, when construed with reference to the order of seizure and sale, is plain.

3. A purchaser of property subject to a mortgage containing the pact de non alienando stands, with regard to the mortgagee, in so far as relates to the mortgage, in the position of the mortgagor, and can make no objection to the seizure and sale, on the ground of its non-acceptance, which the mortgagor could not make. The form of acceptance is not sacramental. Its conditions concerned the plaintiff, and were intended for its protection. A cancellation of mortgage entered many years since, and an act consenting to a partition and setting forth plaintiff's right on the property and the present, are acts of acceptance. It is no longer possible to sustain the proposition that the mortgage is invalid, as not having been accepted. The defendants are owners of the property, burdened with plaintiff's mortgage. They have been duly notified.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. James; HENRY L. DUFFEL, Judge.

The Citizens' Bank of Louisiana obtained an order of seizure and sale of a plantation in a suit against Marie J. Webre and others to enforce certain stock payments due from the succession of Benjamine S. Webre and others. Marie J. Webre and others sued out an injunction to restrain A. L. Bourgeois, sheriff, and others, from selling the property. From a judgment for defendants in injunction, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed. Rehearing refused.

Robert G. Dugue, for appellants, Marie J. Webre et al. S. M. Berault, E. N. Pugh, and Henry C. Miller, for appellee Citizens' Bank.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiff obained an order of seizure and sale of a certain plantation, in the parish of St. James, to pay an alleged stock debt of $708, claimed as due by the succession of Benjamine S. Webre, Marie Webre, widow of E. A. Webre, and Anna Webre, wife of E. Guidry, and as secured by mortgage on the property. The defendants enjoined the sale of the property. They aver that one undivided half of the property belonged to the succession of B. S. Webre, and one-quarter each to the other defendants, who have also accepted the succession of B. S. Webre, with the benefit of inventory; that the sheriff did not seize the property; that there is a junior mortgage on the property; that the sheriff cannot exact from the purchaser the surplus of the purchase price over the amount due the seizing creditor; that it must remain in the hands of the purchaser; that the mortgage sued upon was never accepted or recorded; that it stipulates that the mortgage is executed to secure subscription to bank-stock, and that the mortgagor shall not be a stockholder until the mortgage shall have been accepted by authentic act, and until it shall have been recorded; that, as the mortgage has not been accepted, it did not attach to the property; that they are third persons, and can resist its enforcement. A motion to dismiss the appeal was filed on the ground that the amount involved is less than $2,000.

The plaintiffs in injunction allege the nullity of the mortgage claimed by the bank, amounting to more than $5,000, and ask for its nullity. The matter in dispute is the nullity or validity of this mortgage for an amount larger than the minimum limit of the court's jurisdiction. The suit was brought to enforce calls for payment on stock. The plaintiffs in injunction ask that the mortgage by which they are secured be declared null.

With reference to the allegation that the property was not seized: The question has been passed upon in a number of cases, and must be considered as settled. The notices of seizure were given in accordance with the order of seizure and sale. The defendants in the seizure, who are in the corporeal possession of the property, have no ground of complaint if the sheriff did not divest them of that possession while the property was under seizure. If that officer chose to allow them that possession, they cannot, by proving that fact, defeat the seizure which he returned as having been made. For the purpose of the seizure he holds for the plaintiff's benefit. The party allowed to remain in the enjoyment of actual possession cannot maintain that it is an act which authorizes an injunction, under article 298, Code Pr. The testimony offered by the defendant to prove incorrectness of the return and insufficiency of possession was properly excluded by the court a qua. Lambeth v. Sentell, 38 La. Ann. 695; Gusman v. De Poret, 33 La. Ann. 337; Deville v. Hayes, 23 La. Ann. 550; Calderwood v. Prevost, 9 Rob. (La.) 182.

Relative to the surplus of the purchase price over the amount due the seizing creditor: The terms stated in the petition and the order are that the purchaser shall pay the amount claimed as due, cash, and assume the residue of the stock mortgage debt, not yet due, and the balance, if any, of the price of the adjudication, cash. There is a mortgage inferior in rank to that of the seizing creditor, as alleged by the defendants. It is argued substantially that the sheriff is without authority to require from the purchaser a larger amount than that of the writ in his hands, and that this officer is the legal agent of the seizing creditor, and is not concerned with the rights of the mortgage creditors, subsequent in rank, to the extent of requiring cash for their payment. The article referred to (707, Code Prac.) is clear: "The purchaser shall apply the surplus of the price, if there be any, to paying the special mortgages existing on the property subsequent to that of the suing creditor." The order of seizure and sale complies with this provision of the law. The adjudication shall be for cash. This does not preclude the purchaser from retaining the surplus of the purchase price, if any there be, to pay the mortgage second in rank. The advertisement is not as plain in this respect. Hastily reading, it may be concluded that the cash refers to a price to be paid, instead of an adjudication for cash of a surplus which may be retained by the purchaser to pay the second mortgage. When construed with reference to the order, the terms are plain.

The acceptance of the mortgage and its record: The act of mortgage contains the declaration that, in order to guaranty her subscription, she mortgages her property. It contains the stipulation that, immediately after the acceptance of the mortgage by authentic act by the president of the bank, and the procuration of a certificate of inscriptions from the parish judge, and of non-alienation of the property, and establishing, in addition, that no new mortgage or privilege had been recorded, the mortgagor was to be a stockholder for 828 shares in the capital stock. The mortgage, in compliance with the charter, was to be executed in the respective parishes in which the property was situated. The bank reserved the right to accept the mortgage. The form of acceptance declared in the act, as a protection to the mortgagee, upon whom devolved the duty of determining as to the value of the title, and value of the property offered as security, was not exclusive of every other mode of acceptance. It was not essential to accept precisely as prescribed in the act. Other modes of accepting may prove equally as effective and binding. On the 3d day of September, 1881, the number of shares secured by mortgage having been reduced from 828 to 237, the bank, by notarial act, acknowledged the reduction, and consented to a partition, as it alleges. The declarations contained in this act have the effect of an acceptance. It makes it manifest that the shares had been issued and were in the possession and control of the bank. On 17th August, 1842, the parish judge made mention of partial release on the margin of the record in his office of the act of mortgage, and noted thereon a partial cancellation and statement of the balance due. The partial release mentions that it was founded on an authentic act before Boudousquie, notary. Article 3385 of the Civil Code provides for noting releases and cancellations on the margin of the record. This reduction and cancellation are confirmed by the act of September, 1881, before mentioned; also by this suit. Their correctness was unquestioned during many years. The mortgagor would have no right to object to its non-acceptance. The defendants are not in a better position, for the act contains the pact de non alienando. Barrow v. Bank, 2 La. Ann. 453. It is urged by the defendants that the marginal note was not offered in evidence. It is copied in the transcript as a marginal note of the record, and the clerk certifies to the correctness of the entry. We therefore consider it evidence. Those declarations in the act of 1881 and the cancellation are an acceptance of the mortgage. The bank alleges that the defendants became the owners of a portion of the plantation mortgaged and of 50 shares of the stock. In the ex parte act, purporting to accept a partition, the bank declares that by an act passed under private signature, and dated the 17th January, 1871, a partition in kind had been effected among the owners, and that in this partition the defendants became the owners of the said shares, and responsible for the mortgage. The act of partition was not introduced in evidence. Being the independent declaration of the creditor, it cannot bind the defendants to the extent of authorizing executory proceedings. The order of seizure and sale is not grounded upon the act of 1881. This last act limits plaintiff's recourse to those of the heirs who are made defendants, and its mortgage to that portion of the property in the possession of the defendants, and has no other effect. Plaintiff declares upon the act of April, 1835, and avers that the portion of the property owned by the defendants is mortgaged to secure the amount claimed. A copy of this act, annexed to the petition, and a certificate showing that it has been recorded, are in evidence. The right of the bank under that act is complete. One of the defendants was an heir of the mortgagor; if there had been non-inscription, as to him the administrator of his succession could not raise the question. The act was inscribed, and binds the property in the possession of the defendants. The pact de non alienando is secured to plaintiff by its charter. The defendants were the parties to be notified, and were properly notified. Gillaspie v. Bank, 30 La. Ann. 1321. It is admitted that the defendants are the owners of the property. It is subject to plaintiff's mortgage.

Judgment affirmed, at appellants' costs.

HUNTER v. STATE.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE — INTENT — EVIDENCE — CREDIBILITY.

1. The gravamen of the offense in an indictment charging an assault with intent to rape is the intent with which the assault was made; and this question of intent, throughout the instructions of the court, should be kept prominently before the minds of the jury as being the main subject of their inquiry; and, if there be a reasonable doubt as to the intent, such doubt necessitates an acquittal.

2. The intent in such cases must be shown by the state to have so possessed the accused that his determination was to consummate the rape regardless of resistance and want of consent.

3. The manner, time, place, surroundings, and circumstances under which such an assault is made, and the want of opportunity to consummate the crime, are subjects of material consideration upon the question of intent.

4. The jury, being the sole and exclusive judges of the weight and credibility to be given to any and all evidence, have the right to disbelieve the evidence of an interested witness solely on the ground of interest.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to criminal court of record, Duval county; H. B. PHILLIPS, Judge.

Prosecution against Cæsar Hunter for an assault with intent to rape. From a judgment on conviction defendant brings error. Reversed.

John Wallace, for plaintiff in error. William B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

TAYLOR, J. Cæsar Hunter, the plaintiff in error, at the October term, 1891, of the criminal court of record for Duval county, was tried upon an information and convicted of the charge of "assault with intent to rape," and, being sentenced to 10 years in the penitentiary, after refusal of his motion for new trial, brings his case here upon writ of error. As the evidence for the state is not voluminous, and as we have some comments to make upon its sufficiency for conviction, we will give it in full as it appears in the record.

Lucy Biggs, the prosecutrix, for the state testified as follows: "My name is Lucy Biggs. I live in the city of Jacksonville, Florida. Some time in June last I was committed to the city jail for disorderly conduct in the streets. I was put in there over night, and remained there until next morning. I had taken several drinks of whisky that night, but was not drunk. I was reclining on a bench. Cæsar Hunter came to the door. I rose up. He asked me if I lived in Lavilla. The next morning some one pushed the defendant, Cæsar Hunter, in my cell, and he asked me to give him some; and at the same time ran his hand under my clothes, took hold of my shoulder, and tried to push me over, when I screamed, and he ran out from the cell. I had never seen him before that morning, but I identified him as being the man. This happened in the county of Duval, and state of Florida. My occupation is keeping a house of assignation. My husband, Charley Biggs, was convicted at the last term of this court for highway robbery, and he is to be tried at this term of the court for the same crime. I am also under bond to this court for larceny. The night I was arrested for this was since I was put in jail June last, but I cannot remember the exact date. Biggs is my second husband, and I got divorced from my first husband in New Jersey. The night I was arrested for larceny I paid Captain Dennis—a very black man—two dollars to go with me to Sheriff N. B. Broward's house, to see something about my husband, who was then in jail for robbery. We went down to Sheriff Broward's. I did not know the way down there, and Captain Dennis went with me. Captain Dennis and myself went to several bar-rooms, and took several drinks. Dennis rode on the outside of the carriage with the driver. After the assault on me in the city jail my sentence was suspended. When I returned I was arrested for larceny, and taken to the city jail."

Bartola Canova, for the state, testified: "My name is Bartola Canova. I am the keeper of the city jail of the city of Jacksonville, Florida. I know Lucy Biggs, the prosecuting witness in this cause. I also know Cæsar Hunter, the defendant. Some time in June last, Lucy Biggs, Cæsar Hunter, and some other prisoners were in the city jail for violating some of the city ordinances. Lucy Biggs was in the women's cell. She was put in there over night. Next morning the men prisoners were turned out in the corridor to go to work, or to get their breakfast. The cell that Lucy Biggs was in was so fixed that it could be opened from the outside, but not from the inside. There were several other prisoners in the corridor with Cæsar Hunter, and the same prisoners were turned out when he was turned out. I heard some one scream twice, I think, that morning. I do not know whether the scream was in Lucy Biggs' cell or not. It sounded like it was there. I ran out into the passage, and when I got where I could see I saw Cæsar Hunter come running with a broom in his hand. He was about ten steps from the cell door that Lucy Biggs was in, and several other prisoners were about four or five steps from him. It was not the business of Hunter to sweep."

William C. West, for the state, testified: "I am city recorder of Jacksonville, Florida. I was in the room with Bartola Canova the morning the alleged crime was committed, and heard the screams of some one, who seemed to be in one of the cells. I do not know whether the screams I heard were in Lucy Biggs' cell or not. It was in that direction. Canova and myself went in the passage together, and when we got in sight I saw Cæsar Hunter about fourteen steps from the door of Lucy Biggs' cell, sweeping the floor as though he was very much excited. There were several other prisoners not a great distance from him. Hunter was not running, but was sweeping the floor."

This comprises the entire evidence for the state.

The defendant introduced as a witness one Capt. Dennis, alias Dennis Jenkins, stated in the record to be a very black negro, who testified as follows: "I know Lucy Biggs, the prosecuting witness in this cause. The night she was arrested for larceny she gave me one dollar to go with her outriding. I rode inside the carriage with her. No one was in the carriage but me and her. We went to four or five bar-rooms in the carriage together, and she, myself, and the driver of the carriage drank at each bar-room. We went way out on the shell road driving. I was doing nothing but riding and drinking. We did not go down to Sheriff Broward's house, and she did not ask me or the driver to carry her there that night. I was with her until she was arrested and put in jail. I called at Lucy Biggs' house to take her a note from her husband, when she asked me to go in the carriage."

Paul G. Phillips, chief of police of Jacksonville, testified for the defendant that Lucy Biggs' general character for chastity and morality in the neighborhood in which she lived was very bad.

N. B. Broward, sheriff of Duval county, also for the defendant, testified to the bad character of Lucy Biggs for chastity and morality; and testified, further, that she did not go to his house the night she was arrested for larceny.

This constituted the entire evidence for the state and for the defense. At the trial the defendant's counsel requested the court to give to the jury the following instructions: "First. If the jury has a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant was, at the time he put his hands upon the prosecutrix, trying to get her to consent to an improper intercourse, or commit the crime of rape, they should give him the benefit of the doubt, and acquit him. Second. The essential elements of force in an assault with intent to rape are threats or fraud; and, unless some of these is proved, the defendant should be acquitted. Third. The request of the defendant to the prosecutrix to consent to an improper intercourse may be taken in consideration by the jury to disprove the fact that the defendant intended to commit rape. Fourth. You have the right to disbelieve the evidence of any interested witness, upon no other ground than the fact of interest. You have the right to disbelieve the evidence of any non-interested witness if his evidence appears impossible or improbable." All four of which charges the court refused to give, and to each of which refusals the defendant, by his counsel, excepted; and their refusal is assigned as error here.

The first of these refused instructions should have been given. The gravamen of the charge contained in this information consisted in the intent with which the alleged acts of the defendant were committed. The intent of the prisoner should, throughout the instructions of the court, have been kept prominently before the minds of the jury, as being the main subject of their inquiry; and if, as to this,—the main subject of inquiry in this class of cases,—the jury have a reasonable doubt, that doubt most assuredly necessitates an acquittal. From this stand-point, the charge requested became very material to the accused. It stated the law correctly, and error was committed in its refusal.

The second refused instruction above states the rule of law that seems to have been established in the state of Texas by special statutory enactment, (Thompson v. State, 43 Tex. 583;) but we cannot say that the rule announced in the charge is applicable generally, in the absence of such statutory enactment, and therefore see no error in its refusal.

The third refused instruction above bears also materially upon the main question in issue,—the intent of the defendant. It states the law correctly, and for the reasons stated above should have been given, and its refusal was error.

The fourth refused instruction above states the law correctly, and under the proof in this case should have been given. The jury, under our system of laws, being the sole and exclusive judges of the weight and credibility to be given to any and all evidence, have the right, as is announced in this refused instruction, to disbelieve the evidence of an interested witness solely upon the ground of interest. The refusal to give this fourth instruction was error.

As our conclusion is that the judgment must be reversed because of the errors herein already pointed out, we think some comments upon the evidence exhibited in this record will not be inappropriate. The prosecutrix here, who is in reality the only witness to the material facts constituting the alleged crime, is shown to be at present unknown to any other than evil fame, herself a convict of infamous crime, a willing consort of persons of the same caste of skin and morals as the accused defendant. Her evidence, except as to the fact of her outcry, is wholly uncorroborated by any other testimony of fact or circumstance. The cause of her outcry is not corroborated by any evidence whatever. The time, place, surroundings, presence of other persons within a few feet and within the same walls, and, generally, the utter want of opportunity to consummate the crime of rape, all seem to us strongly to repel the idea of such an intent on the part of the accused as would be sufficient to sustain a conviction of the crime. The intent, in such cases, must be shown by the state to have so possessed the accused that his determination was to consummate the rape regardless of resistance and want of consent. In the case of Curry v. State, 4 Tex. App. 574, where the facts of the assault and the language of the assailant were identical with the case here, and where the character of the prosecutrix was not impugned, as here, and where the place and surroundings were much more opportune for the consummation of the crime than in this, the court held that, taking into consideration the manner, time, place, and circumstances under which the assault was made, however wanton and outrageous the assault, they were not justified in presuming that it was the purpose and intent of the accused to accomplish his design by force, and without the consent of the assaulted female. While we are not called upon at present pointedly to decide whether the proof in this case is sufficient of itself to sustain a conviction for the crime here charged, yet, taking into consideration the character of the prosecutrix, the manner, time, place, and circumstances under which the alleged assault was made, we would suggest the most careful consideration and long hesitancy upon the part of the court below before refusing an application to vacate the verdict in the event a second jury can be found, willing, upon the same evidence, to duplicate the former finding herein.

The judgment and sentence of the court below is reversed.

MCKINNY v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Florida. March 19, 1892.)

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE—INFANCY OF DEFENDANT.

At common law, a boy under the age of 14 years cannot, in point of law, be guilty of an assault with intent to commit rape; and, if he be under that age at the time of the alleged offense, evidence is inadmissible to show that in point of fact he could commit the offense.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Clay county; W. B. YOUNG, Judge.

Indictment against Oscar McKinny for an assault with intent to commit rape. From a judgment on conviction defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. W. & W. M. Davis, for plaintiff in error. William B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MABRY, J. The plaintiff in error was indicted at the spring term, A. D. 1891, of the Clay county circuit court, for an assault upon a female child under the age of 10 years, with intent feloniously and forcibly to carnally know and abuse her, and, after arraignment, was convicted of said offense.

The indictment charges, omitting the formal parts, "that Oscar McKinny, of the county of Clay, and state of Florida, on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1891, in the county and state aforesaid, in and upon one Dora Lillian Remesat, a female child under the age of ten years, to-wit, of the age of eight years, feloniously did make an assault, with intent her, the said Dora Lillian Remesat, then and there feloniously and forcibly to carnally know and abuse, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Florida." After verdict, plaintiff in error, by his counsel, made a motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial. The grounds of the motion are: (1) "Because the verdict is contrary to law;" (2) "because the verdict is contrary to the evidence;" (3) "because the verdict is contrary to the charge of the court;" (4) "because the uncontradicted evidence in the case was that the defendant was not fourteen years of age at the time of the alleged offense, and yet the jury found him guilty of the offense with which he was charged." This motion was overruled, and defendant excepted. No exceptions were taken to the charge of the court, or the admissibility of any testimony. The assignments of error here cover in substance the same points presented in the motion for new trial. The sole inquiry presented here is the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict.

The mother of the child testified for the state, in substance, as follows: That the accused was working for her husband, helping in his barber-shop, and working on his place. On the 20th day of February, A. D. 1891, the accused was at work in their garden, and about 5 o'clock in the evening, while witness was up-stairs attending to a fretful baby, she looked out of the window into the garden, and did not see the accused at work. Witness could see from the upper window all over the garden, except down by the side of a fence nearest to the house. She knew that her daughter was in the garden with the accused, and had been playing there. She went down to see about it, and as soon as she opened the garden gate she saw her child lying flat on the ground, with her clothes up, and the accused on top of her. They were lying with their feet towards witness. As soon as the witness entered the gate, the accused jumped up, and commenced to button up his pantaloons, which were unbuttoned. Witness asked the accused what he meant by doing that. He said Lillian made him do it. She had been after him all the week to do it. Witness said if she had a pistol she would kill accused, and that she would have him arrested. She looked for something to hit accused with, and he ran away from the premises. This was in Clay county, Florida. On cross-examination witness stated that when she looked in at the gate she saw them lying on the ground near the fence, and near the chicken-house. The chicken-house was about 10 feet high, and was between the gate where she entered and where they were lying. The chicken-house was joined onto the fence to the right of the gate, and was on her right hand. The accused and the child were on the other side of the chicken-house. The child did not get up when the accused did. She laid on the ground for a little time, and was not fretting or crying, and was not hurt. Witness did not see the private parts of the accused.

J. A. Peeler testified for the state, in substance, that he was sheriff of Clay county. A warrant was placed in his hands for the arrest of Oscar McKinny, for the assault upon the little girl. He tried for two days to find the accused, but could not. He found him on Sunday night at his mother's house, and arrested him.

For the defense, Georgia Cook testified that she was the mother of the accused, Oscar McKinny, and that he was not 14 years of age; that he would be 14 years of age on the following Tuesday,—the last day of March.

Fonce Miller testified that he knew the general reputation of the accused, and that it was good. He never heard anything bad of the boy.

The defendant's statement, under oath, was, in substance, that he had the headache, and was lying down on the ground. Lillian came where he was, and was playing on him, and he pushed her off. He was not trying to do anything to her. He ran off, because Mrs. Remesat said she was going to have him arrested.

This was, in substance, all of the testimony. Our statute provides that "whoever ravishes and carnally knows a female of the age of ten years or more, by force and against her will, or unlawfully or carnally knows and abuses a female child under the age of ten years, shall be punished by death, or by imprisonment in the state penitentiary for life;" and whoever assaults a female with intent to commit a rape shall be punished by imprisonment in the state penitentiary for any term of years or for life, or by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars. Chapter 1637, subc. 3, §§ 40, 41, Act 1868, (McClel. Dig. p. 355, §§ 36, 37.) The two clauses contained in the first section of the above statute define the single offense of rape. It is committed on a female over 10 years of age by having carnal knowledge of her by force and against her will, and on a female under 10 years of age by unlawfully or carnally knowing and abusing her, without regard to consent. The object of our statute was to provide a punishment for rape in all cases of the violation of females of any age. Originally at common law rape was defined to be the carnal knowledge of a female, forcibly and against her will. 3 Chit. Crim. Law, 810; 1 Russ. Crimes, 904.

It seems that it was anciently doubted whether rape could be committed upon a child under 10 years of age, and hence the statute, 18 Eliz. c 7, § 4, was enacted, by which it was provided "that, if any person shall unlawfully and carnally know and abuse any woman child under the age of ten years, every such unlawful and carnal knowledge shall be felony without benefit of clergy." 3 Chit. Crim. Law, 814. This statute was not intended to create a new and different offense distinct from rape, but was designed to make the carnal knowledge and abuse of a child under 10 years rape, irrespective of consent. And we find in 1 Hale, P. C. 628, written after the passage of the statute 18 Eliz., the definition of rape to be "the carnal knowledge of any woman above the age of ten years against her will, and of a woman child under the age of ten years with or against her will." Our statute makes it rape to unlawfully or carnally know and abuse a female child under the age of 10 years. This construction has been placed upon statutes like ours. Com. v. Sugland, 4 Gray, 7; People v. McDonald, 9 Mich. 150; State v. Storkey, 63 N. C. 7; State v. Johnston, 76 N. C. 209; State v. Dancy, 83 N. C. 608. To charge, then, in an indictment under the statute an assault with intent to unlawfully and carnally know and abuse a female child under the age of 10 years is, in legal effect, to allege an assault with intent to commit a rape. The testimony of the mother of the accused (and there seems to be no contradiction in any way of it) is that he was not 14 years old when the offense is alleged to have been committed. He lacked but a short time of arriving at the age of 14, still the testimony is positive that he had not arrived at this age when the offense is alleged to have been committed. A boy under the age of 14, by the common-law rule, was presumed to be incapable of committing the crime of rape. This presumption, it seems, was not so much on the ground of incapacity of mind or will, but of physical impotency, and was irrebutable. Williams v. State, 20 Fla. 777, and authorities cited. It is also the rule of the common law that a boy under the age of 14 years cannot in point of law be guilty of an assault with intent to commit a rape, and, if he were under that age at the time of the alleged offense, evidence is inadmissible to show that in point of fact he could commit the offense. Regina v. Philips, 8 Car. & P. 736; Rex v. Eldershaw, 3 Car. & P. 396; People v. Randolph, 2 Parker, Crim. R. 174; Id. 213; 3 Lawson, Crim. Def. 145; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, (6th Ed.) § 746; 2 Rosc. Crim. Ev. 899. It was decided in Com. v. Green, 2 Pick. 380, that a boy under the age of 14 years may be indicted for an assault with intent to commit rape; but this seems to be the only departure outright from the common-law rule, and it was dissented from by PARKER, C. J. In Ohio and New York it has been decided that, while the law presumes a boy under the age of 14 years to be incapable of being guilty of attempting to commit the crime of rape, this presumption may be overcome by proof that in point of fact he has arrived at the age of puberty. Williams v. State, 14 Ohio, 222; People v. Randolph, supra. I think there is much good reason in the rule announced in the Ohio and New York cases. The common-law rule had its origin in the nature of man and social life, environed by the then physical development of the race where established, and under certain climatic conditions. The rule might become absurd in more congenial climates, and under conditions of more advanced physical development. The reason of the rule, it might well be said, had ceased under such circumstances. In no case, however, that we have found, except the one in Massachusetts, has any court gone further than to hold that the presumption of incapacity, where the accused is under the age of 14 years, may be rebutted by evidence showing capacity. Under these decisions the burden is on the state to show that the accused had capacity when it was shown that he was at the time under the age of 14. In a later case in Ohio, while the rule in the case of Williams v. State, supra, was adhered to, its correctness seems to have been doubted, and it was held that the rule would not be extended, and the burden was on the state to show capacity. Hiltabiddle v. State, 35 Ohio St. 52.

There is nothing in the testimony making it necessary for us to say whether or not the rule announced in Ohio and New York should obtain in this state. The testimony does not show the capacity of the accused, nor is there anything stated in reference to his physical development from which capacity may be deduced. On the evidence before us, our conclusion is that the conviction was wrong, and the judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded.

SPRATT v. CITY OF JACKSONVILLE.

ADVANCEMENT OF CAUSES ON APPEAL—MUNICIPALITY A PARTY—TAXES.

1. The advancement for decision of causes in which the state is not a material party in interest is, according to the practice of the court, controlled by the principle announced in the exception in rule 30 of this court. It must be one in which a county, municipality, or other recognized governmental agency is a real party in interest, and not a mere nominal party, and an immediate or early decision of the cause must be necessary either to the enforcement or protection of the public right asserted therein, or to the avoidance of embarrassment in the operation of such governmental agency; or it must be a case which, though no governmental agency is a real party in interest to it, yet so involves or affects public interests as that its early decision is necessary to avoid embarrassment to the governmental agency whose interest is involved.

2. The mere fact that a suit involves a public question does not give a municipality which is a real party in interest thereto the right to demand its advancement; nor does such fact, and the further facts that the same questions, which have been decided favorably to the city, are involved in several pending suits, or that various other suits may be imminent because of not advancing the particular one, nor that the same questions may arise as to a hundred distress warrants held by the city attorney to be enforced.

3. The fact that the cause is one involving municipal taxes, and to which a municipality and a tax-payer are the parties, is no ground for advancing a cause for decision, on the application of the tax-payer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Duval county.

Suit by Leonidas W. Spratt against the city of Jacksonville to test the validity of certain taxes. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. On motion to advance the consideration of the cause. Motion denied.

S. E. Foster and A. W. Cockrell & Son, for the motion.

RANEY, C. J. The appellant moved to advance the consideration of this cause, it having been submitted on briefs, and the appellee may be regarded as virtually joining in the motion.

The cause is one in which the appellant filed before the circuit judge of the fourth circuit, in October last, a petition praying that the taxes assessed by the city of Jacksonville for the year 1890 be declared illegal. The amount of the taxes sought to be collected of him as assessed against his real and personal property is $300.36. The circuit judge decided the taxes were legal, and from his order to this effect the appeal has been taken.

The grounds of the motion to advance are: (1) The determination of the issues involved is of grave public and general interest; (2) many cases are depending in their final determination upon the decision in this cause.

Three affidavits have been filed in support of the motion,—one by the senior of appellant's counsel, stating that two designated cases, appealable to this court, have already been adjudicated by the circuit court of Duval county, and depend under agreements of counsel for the city, and for complainants therein, upon our decision in this cause, and that other causes set forth in the affidavit of S. E. Foster, appearing below, are severally dependent thereon, and that, in the opinion of the affiant, the interest of the city, and that of many tax-payers, will be promoted by this cause being advanced. Another of the affidavits is by the junior counsel of appellant, and is to the effect that he had on the 4th day of the present month, March, 1892, a consultation with the city attorney of the city of Jacksonville, counsel of record in this cause for such city, and that it is agreed by such attorney and affiant, in several suits pending in the circuit court of Duval county, some under a statutory proceeding for adjudging the taxes unlawful, and others in chancery to enforce tax-liens, and still others at law, for damages claimed for levies under the tax assessment, that all such suits involve the questions of the tax set up in this particular suit; also that various other suits are imminent because of the fact that the questions involved in said tax are not adjudicated in the supreme court, and that said city and its citizens are generally injured by reason of the want of a final and authoritative adjudication in the premises. The other affidavit is that of the attorney of the city of Jacksonville, and it sets out that, as such attorney, he has brought suit by bill in the Duval county circuit court against one Parker to collect taxes for the year 1890, and that Parker, represented by counsel appearing here for appellant, has demurred to the bill on the ground, among others, that the "tax was not levied in pursuance of law." It also states that the question of the validity of such assessment and levy for 1890 is now pending here in the cause before us, and that affiant has in his possession at least 100 distress warrants to be sued on, and in which, or in any of which, the same question of the validity of said levy may arise.

The only rules bearing upon the subject of advancing the decision of causes in this court are supreme court rules 14 and 30. The former of these rules is that "causes in which the state is a party, including criminal causes, may be moved in behalf of the state out of their regular order on the docket at any time, except while a cause is being argued." The other rule is as follows: "No cause of which this court may have original jurisdiction, concurrently with the circuit courts, will be given precedence over appellate causes as to the final decision of the same, unless it be one of public right, or so involving public interests as to require its advancement upon the docket. This rule shall, however, not apply to cases of habeas corpus."

The exception made in favor of cases of habeas corpus was necessitated, at least by the statute regulating the practice upon such writs. McClel. Dig. pp, 562-565.

The state is not a party in interest, or even formally, to this suit, nor is the cause of a criminal nature, and of course rule 14 does not apply; nor is the case within the terms or real purpose of rule 30; still it is a fact that the principle announced by the exception contained in the latter rule has controlled for some time the action of the court in advancing appellate causes, and our decision of the motion must rest upon that principle. For a cause to be one within the meaning of rule 14, to which the state is a party, the state must be not only a party in name, but also materially interested; it is not sufficient that she is merely a nominal party. Where the state is a material party to a cause, it may be advanced on her motion under rule 14, but not under rule 30; and, where she is not such a party, rule 14 has no application. The exception in rule 30 was not intended to secure from the other provisions of the rule any cause to which the state was a party, whether civil or criminal. Rule 14 secures this. To secure advancement under the exception contained in rule 30, a cause must be one of public right, or so involving public interest as to require its advancement upon the docket. To be one of public right, within the meaning of the rule, it must be one in which a county or municipality, or other recognized governmental agency, is a material party in interest, and an immediate or early decision of the cause must be necessary to the enforcement or protection of the public right asserted therein, or to avoid embarrassment in the operations of such governmental agency; and, to be one so involving public interest as to require advancement, it must be a case which so involves public interest as that its decision is necessary to avoid embarrassment to the governmental agency whose interests are involved. The principle of the rule is the avoidance of any real embarrassment which will apparently result to public interests from delay in deciding the cause, and to this end an advancement of the cause for decision will be made. The mere fact that a suit involves a public question does not give a county or municipality the right to demand its advancement. There must be an actual embarrassment to governmental operations. It does not appear that the city has not collected the taxes involved here. If it has not done so, there is still nothing before us to excuse the omission. If it has collected them, and appellant is suing to recover them, or to recover damages for trespass in collecting them forcibly and against his will, that case can be dealt with when it reaches us.

In so far as appellant is concerned, the fact that the case is one involving taxes is no reason for its advancement. The amount is no more to him than it would be if it was involved in an action of replevin or assumpsit against another individual, nor is it any more to him than other amounts, smaller or greater, are to litigants before us over whom he is asking to be preferred. The concession of the rule whose analogy we are considering, that causes of public right, or so involving public interests as to require advancement, may be advanced, was made to subserve practical public interests, and not for the benefit of the individuals who might be parties to such causes; and even as to the public it can be invoked successfully, only where it is shown that public interests will be embarrassed if the cause is not decided. Where life and liberty are not involved, no individual suitor can claim preference over others.

The fact that the city attorney has seen fit to agree that the decision in two other causes shall depend on our decision here is not ground for advancing this cause, nor is the fact that counsel before us agree that the questions involved here are involved in several suits pending in Duval circuit court, or that various other suits are imminent because of our not advancing this cause; nor that the same question may arise as to a hundred distress warrants which the city attorney holds to be enforced. The question does not appear to have produced embarrassment to the municipal government when it has actually arisen. Certainly mere possibilities cannot justify us in giving precedence upon a crowded docket.

In U. S. v. Fossatt, 21 How. 445, it was said that no cause should be taken up out of its order when private interests alone were involved, and that the only cases in which that court would depart from this rule were those where the question in dispute will embarrass the operations of the government while it remains unsettled. Subsequently congress passed an act that in suits wherein a state is a party, or wherever the revenue laws of any state may be enjoined or stayed by judicial order or process, it shall be the duty of the court, on sufficient reasons shown, to give the cause preference over all other civil causes pending in such court between private parties; and in Miller v. State, 12 Wall. 159, the court refused to advance a cause —a proceeding in quo warranto involving the title to the directorship of a railroad company—in which individuals were the real parties, and the state practically only a formal party; and in Davenport City v. Dows, 15 Wall. 390, the decision was that an ordinance of a municipal corporation levying taxes could not be regarded as the revenue law of a state, within the meaning of such statute. In Hoge v. Railroad Co., 93 U. S. 1, the conclusion of the court was it would not, in preference to cases pending between private parties, set down for argument a case in which the execution of the revenue laws of a state had been enjoined, unless it sufficiently appeared that the operations of the government of the state would be embarrassed by delay, and the motion to advance was refused because it was not shown that such embarrassment would result from delay in deciding the case in which an injunction had been granted against the collection of state, county, and municipal taxes against a railroad company whose property was held to be exempt from taxation.

In the absence of a clear showing that embarrassment will result to the operations of the government of Jacksonville from delay in deciding this case, we do not think it should be advanced over private causes.

We have not found it necessary to invoke the fact that by an act of the legislature of June 9, 1891, the Jacksonville tax assessments and levies for the years 1887 to 1890, inclusive, have been legalized, (Laws 1891, pp. 64-66;) nor do we say what would be the effect of such legislation on this motion.

The motion is denied.

BROWN v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PRESENCE OF PRISONER IN COURT.

1. At common law, a writ of error did not lie to correct an error which was not apparent on the record, and the statute of 13 Edw. I. was enacted to provide a remedy for reviewing decisions of the trial court on matters in pais, to which exception was taken; and strictly, at the common law, it was doubted if this statute applied to any criminal case.

2. Our statute (section 1, c. 138, Laws 1848; section 1, p. 454, McClel. Dig.) allows a bill of exceptions in criminal cases, but it does not undertake to point out the matters and things which are proper to appear in a bill of exceptions, or the matters decided by the trial court which may in this way be presented for review to the appellate court; and what is a bill of exceptions, and its true office, are matters left for judicial ascertainment.

3. The true office of a bill of exceptions is to present some objection in point of law to the opinion, judgment, direction, or action of the trial court on matters which do not properly appear of record, and it is not its office to supersede or take the place of any requisite record entries in a cause, but to present exceptions taken during the progress of the trial, to the opinion and decision of the judge on matters which otherwise would remain in pais.

4. The record proper should show in cases of felony that the jury was sworn, and an omission in this respect is fatal to a conviction, and it cannot be supplied by a recital in the preface of a bill of exceptions, intended merely to connect the bill with the case tried, that the jury was sworn.

5. In felonies it is necessary that the accused be personally present during the progress of the trial, including the judgment or sentence of the court; but while it is best always to have the record show directly and affirmatively that the accused was personally present at each and every stage of the trial, it will be sufficient if it appear therefrom, by necessary and reasonable implication, that he was present.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to criminal court of record, Duval county; H. B. PHILLIPS, Judge.

Prosecution against William T. Brown for perjury. From a judgment on conviction defendant brings error. Reversed.

A. W. Cockrell & Son, for plaintiff in error. William B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MABRY, J. An information was filed in the criminal court of record of Duval county on the 2d day of November, A. D. 1891, by the county solicitor of said court, against the plaintiff in error, charging him with the crime of perjury. After an arraignment upon this information, and a plea of "not guilty," the plaintiff in error was tried and convicted on the 14th day of November, A. D. 1891, of the offense of which he was charged, and on the 28th day of said month was sentenced to the penitentiary for the term of three years. On his application the record in this cause has been certified to this court under a writ of error, and the same is before us for review.

No objection was made in the criminal court, nor is any presented here, to the sufficiency of the information, and it is not necessary to set it out in this opinion.

After an examination of the record before us, we have become convinced that the judgment of the lower court must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We will refer to only two of the objections presented here to the validity of the judgment rendered against the plaintiff in error, and both of these relate to the sufficiency of the record of the proceedings against him in the trial court. It is claimed, in the first place, that the record does not show that the jury who rendered the verdict against the plaintiff in error was sworn. From the record entries, as appears from the transcript before us, we find no mention made of the jury's having been sworn. The minute of the court in reference to the trial of the accused, as made to appear to us, is in this language, viz.: "And now comes the county solicitor, and the defendant in the above-entitled cause. Said defendant, being arraigned, pleaded 'not guilty,' whereupon came a jury, to-wit, [their names are here given,] who, having heard the evidence, argument of counsel, and the charge of the court, retired to consider of their verdict, which, after due deliberation, they brought in in the words and figures as follows," (then follows the verdict of guilty.) It will not be questioned that it was absolutely essential for a proper conviction of the accused that the jury should have been properly sworn before rendering a verdict against him, and it is also essential that this fact should appear upon the record. We held, and we think correctly, in the case of Garner v. State, 28 Fla. ——, 9 South. Rep. 835, that where the record shows simply that the jury was sworn it was sufficient. This is true where no exception is taken to the manner in which the jury is sworn, and in such case the record recital that the jury was sworn is evidence sufficient that it was done as provided by law But the record must show that the jury who tried the accused was sworn. Crist v. State, 21 Ala. 137, Rich v. State, 1 Tex. App. 206; Dyson v. State, 26 Miss. 362. In the case before us the bill of exceptions, made up and signed, in pursuance of a special order for that purpose, some time after the trial, recites that the jury was sworn. This recital is found in the caption of the bill of exceptions in the usual form, and as copied here is as follows: "Be it remembered that at a term of the criminal court of record for Duval county, Florida, held at Jacksonville, Duval county, on the 4th Tuesday in November, A. D. 1891, a cause therein pending, wherein the state of Florida was plaintiff, and W. T. Brown was defendant, came on to be heard before the Hon. H. B. PHILLIPS, judge of said court, at which day came the said parties by their respective attorneys; and thereupon the said issues, in manner and form aforesaid joined, came on to be tried; and the jurors of the jury aforesaid, whereof mention is made within, being called, likewise came, and were sworn to try the issues in manner aforesaid joined; and thereupon the plaintiff, to maintain the issues on its part, introduced as a witness," etc. Does this recital in the bill of exceptions that the jury was sworn supply the omission in the record? If it does not, there is no sufficient record evidence before us that the plaintiff in error was ever properly convicted.

Our statute provides "that it shall be the duty of the judges of the circuit courts of this state, upon the trial of any person or persons charged with crime or misdemeanor in said court, to sign and seal, upon request, any bill of exceptions taken during the progress of the cause, and tendered to the court, provided the said bill of exceptions, as tendered, fairly state the truth of the matter and the exception designed to be taken; and the same shall, when signed, become a part of the record of such cause." Section 1, c. 138, Laws 1848; section 1, p. 454, McClel. Dig. At common law a writ of error did not lie to correct an error which was not apparent on the record, and therefore, where a party to a cause objected to the decision of the court on matters in pais, he was without any legal remedy whereby such a decision could be certified to the appellate court for review. To remedy this defect it was enacted by statute 13 Edw. I.: "If one impleaded before any of the justices allege an exception, praying that the justices will allow it, that, if they will not, and if he write the exceptions, and require the justices to put their seals to it, the justices shall do so; and, if one will not, another shall." 2 Phil. Ev. 996; 2 Tidd, Pr. 862; Proctor v. Hart, 5 Fla. 465. It will be noted that the statute was designed to provide a remedy for reviewing decisions on matters which did not appear on the record. This statute of 13 Edw. I. is old enough to be in force here, and is undoubtedly a part of our law applicable to civil causes. It was said that this statute did not apply to indictments for treason and felony, and it was doubted if it applied to any criminal case. 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 622; 2 Phil. Ev. 997; 2 Tidd, Pr. 862; Ex parte Vermilyea, 6 Cow. 555; Ex parte Barker, 7 Cow. 143. In Wynehamer v. People, 20 Barb. 567, it is said: "Bills of exceptions in criminal cases are unknown to the common law. The right to a bill of exceptions in such a case is given by statute." Our statute, above referred to, gives the right to a bill of exceptions in a criminal case; but it does not undertake to point out the matters and things which are proper to appear in a bill of exceptions, or the particulars wherein the rulings of the trial court may in this way be presented for review to the appellate court. The provision is that the judge shall sign and seal, upon request, any bill of exceptions taken during the progress of the cause, and tendered, provided it fairly states the truth of the matter, and the exception designed to be taken. What is a bill of exceptions, and its office, are left by the statute for judicial ascertainment. The true office of a bill of exceptions, as appears from what has already been said in reference to the occasion of the enactment of 13 Edw. I., is to present some objection in point of law to the opinion, action, or direction of the trial judge on matters which do not properly appear of record. The conception of a bill of exceptions was not to supersede or take the place of any requisite record entries in a cause, but to present exceptions taken during the progress of the trial to the opinion and decision of the judge in matters which otherwise would remain in pais. Strictly, at the common law, the bill of exceptions was no part of the record in the trial court, and the original was carried into the court of error, and there annexed to the record. A method for the proof of the judge's signature was provided, in case it was questioned. The bill of exceptions, being for the benefit of the party who tendered it, remained in his possession, and he could use it or not, as he saw proper. Gardner v. Baillie, 1 Bos. & P. 32; 2 Tidd, Pr. 864, 865. Our statute provides that, when the bill of exceptions is signed by the judge, it shall become a part of the record of the cause. This does not, in our judgment, mean that it shall become a record of matters not properly recited therein. The record proper should speak for the matters required to be recorded there, and the bill of exceptions is authoritative evidence of matters which are properly allowed therein. A different rule would tend to confusion, and might result in complication in attempting to reconcile conflicting statements of record in the same case. Our predecessors have all along recognized the special office of a bill of exceptions. Proctor v. Hart, supra. In Cato v. State, 9 Fla. 176, it is said: "The bill of exceptions is a great privilege accorded to a party, to cause that to be made a matter of record which would not otherwise appear in the history of the trial; and it is for him, therefore, to be careful to have incorporated into his bill whatever fact he may desire to rely upon as matter of error." In Gates v. Hayner, 22 Fla. 325, it is said: "Neither an exception nor a bill of exceptions is necessary where the error, if there be any, is apparent upon the record; but the office of a bill is to incorporate into the record matters which would otherwise remain in pais." In Gallaher v. State, 17 Fla. 370, the language of the court on this subject is that "the bill of exceptions is a simple history of the case as tried, and should contain nothing more nor less than the facts as they appeared to the court and jury, from the commencement of the trial until the final judgment by the court." The court was considering at the time the necessity of making objections to the introduction of evidence when offered. In reference to the facts or evidence in the case the bill of exceptions is the only method provided to get them before the appellate court, as they do not, in a trial at law, otherwise appear on the record. In speaking of such a bill of exceptions it is accurate to say that it should be a history of the case, and contain the facts as they appear to court and jury. There was nothing in the facts of this case which will justify the inference that the court intended to hold that the office of the bill of exceptions was to supply the record proper of those matters which should be in the minutes of the court. In a case in Indiana, under a statute which provided that the accused may plead the general issue orally, which shall be entered upon the minutes of the court, the record entry failed to disclose affirmatively that a plea to the indictment had been entered. The bill of exceptions recited that the defendant pleaded "not guilty." It was held by the court that it was no part of the office of a bill of exceptions to supply that which is essential to the validity of, and which the law requires to appear upon, the record of the court, and the judgment was reversed. Bowen v. State, 108 Ind. 411, 9 N. E. Rep. 378. In People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. 509, it is said that the statute allowing a bill of exceptions in criminal cases makes it applicable to the same extent as it was in a civil cause. There a bill of exceptions was confined to some point of law arising at the trial which could not be made apparent in a course of regular entry on the record. And so we conclude here that the record proper should show in a case of felony that the jury was sworn, and an omission in this respect is fatal to a conviction, and cannot be supplied by the recitals in the preface of a bill of exceptions intended merely to connect the bill of exceptions with the case tried.

We notice another objection urged here to the judgment of the court, and which is that the accused was not present when sentence was pronounced against him.

The record shows that the trial was had and verdict rendered on the 14th day of November, A. D. 1891. On the 16th day of that month it appears that the accused entered into bond for his attendance from day to day on the court, and in reference to the sentence of the court the record entry is as follows: "Saturday, November 28th, A. D. 1891. State of Florida vs. W. T. Brown. Information for perjury. By virtue of the verdict with recommendation to the extreme mercy of the court, rendered on a prior date in the above-entitled cause, it is hereby ordered and adjudged by the court that you, W. T. Brown, be taken by the sheriff for Duval county, Florida, or his lawful deputy, to the state's prison of the state of Florida, and delivered to the principal keeper thereof, and there to be confined in said state's prison, at hard labor, for the period of three years from the date of your incarceration therein. The motion for new trial duly made in the above-entitled cause is hereby ordered overruled and denied. Exception noted." The motion for new trial mentioned in the above order is signed by counsel for plaintiff in error.

In felonies it is necessary that the accused be personally present during the progress of the trial, including the judgment or sentence of the court imposing the penalty of the law. But while it is best always to have the record show directly and affirmatively that the accused was personally present at each and every stage of the trial, yet it will be sufficient if it appear therefrom by necessary and reasonable implication that he was present. Irvin v. State, 19 Fla. 872; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 1180, and authorities cited. The record before us shows that the accused was present at the trial, but after conviction he is discharged on bond. In the copy of the order of the sentence before us there is nothing to show that the accused was present. There is no recital of his presence, nor does it appear that he was asked if he had anything to say why the sentence of the law should not be pronounced upon him. The language, "ordered and adjudged by the court that you, W. T. Brown, be taken by the sheriff," etc., to prison, does not carry any necessary implication of a personal presence. If the accused had been present, however, the failure to ask him if he had anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon him would be no ground to reverse the judgment of the court. See Hodge v. State, 28 Fla. —, 10 South. Rep. 556.

The record in this case has not been properly made up, and in the transcript before us papers are copied without anything to show how they found their way into the case. The reversal here is upon grounds which should not have existed, and they can be avoided by proper attention to the making up of the record, and the preparation of the transcript for writ of error. The jurisdiction of the criminal court of record of Duval county includes the power to investigate charges of gravity involving the liberty of the citizen; and it is not only proper, but essential, that the correct record entries should be made. Their absence cannot be dispensed with, especially when objections are based on them here.

The judgment is reversed, the cause remanded, and a new trial awarded.

GOODSON v. STATE.

UTTERING FORGED INSTRUMENT—FALSE PERSONATION—INDICTMENT—PRESENTATION IN OPEN COURT.

1. An indictment charging the utterance and publishing of a forged instrument should state the name of the person, firm, corporation, or company to or upon whom the same was uttered, published, or passed; or else it should account for the omission by a statement in the indictment that such person, etc., is to the jurors unknown. If it fails to do either, it is fatally defective.

2. An indictment charging the procurement of property by falsely personating another, under section 41, p. 864, McClel. Dig., should allege that the property fraudulently obtained by the defendant was intended by the party from whom he got it to be delivered to the party alleged to have been falsely personated, and should further allege that the defendant received the property with intent to convert the same to his own use. If either or both of these material averments are omitted from such an indictment, it is fatally defective.

3. The only recognized manner in which the findings of a grand jury can be authoritatively presented is in open court; and such presentment should be affirmatively shown by a record entry in the minutes of the court, or else by the file indorsement on the indictment itself by the clerk of the court, showing that it was "presented by the grand jury and filed in open court." The record entry in the minutes is, however, the best and proper evidence of the fact. Where there is no evidence of such open court presentment, a plea in abatement, predicated upon such omission, should be sustained.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Washington county; W. D. BARNES, Judge.

Indictment against William Goodson for uttering and publishing a forged order. From a judgment on conviction defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. O. Butler, for plaintiff in error. William B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

TAYLOR, J. The plaintiff in error, William Goodson, was indicted at the spring term, 1889, of the circuit court of Washington county, first judicial circuit, as follows, omitting the formal introductory part of the indictment: "That William Goodson, late of the county of Washington aforesaid, in the circuit and state aforesaid, on the 14th day of January, A. D. 1889, with force and arms, at and in the county of Washington, had in his custody and possession a certain false, forged, and counterfeit order for the payment of money, the said William Goodson then and there knowing the same to be false, forged, and counterfeited. The order was of the tenor following: 'Chipley, Fla., January the 14th, '89. Mr. Horn, [meaning one R. C. Horn:] Will you please sir pay $25 to Joseph Goodson for me. GEORGE EVERETT, Orange Hill.' And the said William Goodson did then and there feloniously utter and publish the same as true, with intent thereby then and there to injure and defraud one R. C. Horn, the said William Goodson then and there knowing the said order to be false, forged, and counterfeited, against the form of the statute in such cases made, etc. The grand jurors of the state of Florida, inquiring in and for the body of the county of Washington, upon their oaths present that one William Goodson, of the county of Washington, on the 14th day of January, 1889, in the county of Washington aforesaid, feloniously, unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly did falsely pretend to one R. C. Horn that the said William Goodson was one Joseph Goodson, and that he had an order to pay money, to-wit, twenty-five dollars, sent and signed by one George Everett, in writing, and the said order was in the words and figures as follows: 'Chipley, Fla., January the 14th, '89. Mr. Horn, [meaning R. C. Horn:] Will you please sir pay $25 to Joseph Goodson for me. GEORGE EVERETT, Orange Hill;' the said R. C. Horn believing the said William Goodson to be Joseph Goodson, and that said order was signed by one George Everett, as represented by William Goodson, for said twenty-five dollars, by means of which said false pretenses the said William Goodson did then and there unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly fraudulently obtain from the said R. C. Horn twenty-five dollars, of the value of twenty-five dollars, of the property, money, goods, and chattels of the said R. C. Horn, with intent then and there to cheat and defraud the said R. C. Horn, whereas, in truth and in fact, the said William Goodson was not Joseph Goodson, neither was the order for twenty-five dollars, signed by George Everett, or sent by George Everett, for twenty-five dollars, so the said William Goodson then and there well knew, against the form of the statute in such cases made," etc. On this indictment the defendant was tried on the 14th day of November, 1891, the jury finding a general verdict of guilty, without any specification as to which one of the two offenses charged in the indictment their verdict should apply. The defendant's motion for a new trial being denied, he brings the case here upon writ of error.

Before pleading to the indictment, the defendant moved the court to quash it upon the following grounds: "(1) The first count in the indictment is vague and indefinite, and charges no offense known to the law. (2) The second count in the indictment charges no offense known to the law, and is vague, indefinite, and uncertain." This motion was overruled, and this ruling is assigned as the first error. While this motion to quash does not point out with any definiteness the particulars wherein the two counts of the indictment are vague, indefinite, and uncertain, still we think that the motion should have been sustained, and the indictment quashed. The first count attempts to charge the defendant with uttering, publishing, and passing a false, forged, and counterfeit order for money, but does not allege any person, firm, corporation, or company to or upon whom the same was uttered, published, or passed. Neither does the indictment excuse this omission with any statement that the person to or upon whom it was uttered, published, and passed was to the jurors unknown. The reason for naming in the indictment the person upon whom the forged instrument was passed, consists in the fact that it enters into and becomes a part of the description of the offense, which should be certain, not only that the defendant may accurately know who his accusers are, but that, in case of a second prosecution for the same utterance and passing, he may be able accurately to plead autre fois acquit or convict, as the case may be. In 1 Chit. Crim. Law, marg. p. 211, we find the rule thus expressed: "But it is, in general, necessary to set forth the names of third persons with sufficient certainty; and therefore it seems to be generally agreed at this day that an indictment for suffering divers bakers to bake, etc., against the assize, when that offense was indictable, or for distraining divers persons without just cause, or for taking divers sums of money of divers persons for toll, cannot be supported." The same rule applies in larceny, in indictments for which the name of the owner of the stolen goods must be set out as a part of the description or identification of the property alleged to have been stolen, or else its omission must be excused by a statement in the indictment "that the owner is to the jurors unknown." The correctness of this rule was recognized at an early date in the history of this court, in Groner v. State, 6 Fla. 39, and has been adhered to ever since. Sharp v. State, 28 Fla. —, 9 South Rep. 651. As applied to indictments for uttering a forged instrument, the rule has been recognized and enforced in Buckley v. State, 2 G. Greene, 162. In that case the allegation of the indictment as to the utterance and passing of forged and counterfeit coin was exactly like the one under consideration, and the indictment was held bad. In McClellan v. State, 32 Ark. 609, the indictment in this respect was exactly like the one here, and was held bad.

The second count in this indictment is also fatally defective. It seems to be predicated upon section 41, p. 364, McClel. Dig., that provides as follows: "Whoever falsely personates or represents another, and in such assumed character receives any property intended to be delivered to the party so personated, with intent to convert the same to his own use, shall be deemed to have committed larceny, and be punished accordingly." Comment seems hardly necessary. In this second count there is no allegation that the property alleged to have been fraudulently obtained by the defendant was "intended by the party from whom he got it to be delivered to the party alleged to have been falsely personated;" neither is there any allegation that the defendant received the property "with intent to convert the same to his own use;" all of which is fatal to its validity, and the omission of these essential allegations makes it fall far short of charging any offense provided for by law. Jones v. State, 22 Fla. 532. The defendant's motion to quash should have been granted.

After the overruling of his motion to quash, the defendant entered a plea in abatement, the substance of which is that there was no evidence upon the records of the court to show that the indictment was ever returned or presented in open court by any grand jury. This plea was overruled, and such ruling is also assigned as error. The ruling of the court below upon this plea is in the following words: "He [the court] was of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence before the court to sustain the indictment, said entry of the finding and return into court on May the 17, 1889, being in the following words and figures, namely: 'State of Florida vs. William Goodson—Forgery.'" We do not think that this was sufficient evidence, or, in fact, any evidence at all, of the essential fact that such an indictment, or that any indictment, had been "presented or returned into open court by a grand jury." The bare style of a case, accompanied with the technical name of a crime, appearing by itself in the minutes of the court, without any explanation or other statement, cannot be said to prove anything. Had this styling of the cause been preceded with the customary statement, "The grand jury came into court, or into open court, and presented the following indictments," then the evidence would have been sufficient and complete. Turning to the indictment itself, we find the file-marks to be as follows: "Filed May 17th, 1889. W. B. LASSITER, Clerk, by J. R. WELLS, D. C." There is nothing in this to indicate that it was filed or presented in open court. At the beginning of the record before us we find the following statement made by the same clerk who filed that office at the time this indictment purports to have been found: "Be it remembered that on the 9th day of November, A. D. 1891, came the state of Florida, the plaintiff in the case aforesaid, and by an indictment filed with the clerk of the circuit court in his said office on the 17th day of May, A. D. 1891, called upon the defendant to answer," etc. While this preliminary statement by the clerk in the record may not be regarded as affirmative proof that the indictment was filed in his office, as therein asserted, instead of in open court, still it falls far short of affirmatively showing that the paper was presented and filed in open court by the grand jury. This being all there is in the record upon this subject, we do not think that there is sufficient evidence, or any evidence, that this indictment was presented in open court by a grand jury, that being the only recognized manner in which the findings of a grand jury can be authoritatively presented. Collins v. State, 13 Fla. 651. Were the rule otherwise, it would render it possible for a designing or revengeful foreman of a grand jury to ruin any citizen by surreptitiously filing with the clerk in his office an indictment manufactured by himself alone, upon which his fellow-jurors had taken no action. With the lights before us, we think the defendant's plea in abatement should have been sustained.

It is unnecessary, after what has been said, to notice any other questions raised.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, with directions to quash the indictment, and to discharge the defendant from further custody or detention thereunder.

TOWN OF ENTERPRISE et al. v. STATE ex rel. ATTORNEY GENERAL.

(Supreme Court of Florida. March 16, 1892.)

QUO WARRANTO—JURISDICTION—PLEADING—USURPATION OF FRANCHISE—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ORGANIZATION—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. Jurisdiction of informations in the nature of quo warranto is conferred on circuit courts by section 11, art. 5, Const. 1885.

2. Where usurpation of a public office or a franchise is claimed by the state, and an information in the nature of a quo warranto is filed by the attorney general to test the right to hold such office or enjoy such franchise, it is only necessary to allege generally that the person holding the office or enjoying the franchise does so without lawful authority, and in such a case, as against the state, it devolves upon such person to show a complete legal right to enjoy the privileges in question; but if the information states the facts upon which the charge of usurpation is based, and those facts show a clear legal right in respondent, it will be insufficient.

3. The qualified inhabitants of a hamlet, village, or town in this state cannot, under the general acts for the incorporation of cities and towns, organize and maintain two municipal governments in the same space at the same time.

4. Under such incorporating acts it is essential that a municipal corporation have ascertained and well-defined boundaries, and where the metes and bounds of such a corporation utterly fail to inclose any area, and are so uncertain as to make it impossible to determine the territory of such corporation, an organization and municipal government thereunder will be a nullity.

5. The inhabitants of a hamlet, village, or town, recognized as a community of persons authorized to form a municipal government under the general act for the incorporation of cities and towns, in force in this state, include persons living on contiguous territory; and, where an attempt is made to incorporate two distinct detached tracts of land as corporate territory under one government, it is unauthorized and void.

6. The rule is well settled that no collateral attack can be made upon the existence of a corporation. Such bodies derive their being from the sovereign will of the people; and, so long as the state does not question their existence, it cannot be controverted in a collateral way, on account of irregularities and defects in their organization.

7. In March, 1884, an attempt was made to incorporate the town of Enterprise, and a transcript of the proceedings was prepared and delivered to the clerk of the circuit court for record. The territory of the proposed incorporation, as appears by the record, consists of two detacned and disconnected tracts of land distant from each other five miles. In 1885 the legislature provided (in chapter 3634) "that all the acts done and performed in the organization and incorporation of the town of Enterprise, in the county of Volusia, are declared to be legal and valid in law and equity, and to be considered valid and binding by the laws of the state of Florida." Held, that said attempted organization was not in compliance with the general law in reference to the formation of municipal governments, and said special act, in so far as it seeks to validate the organization of said town, is in conflict with the constitutional requirement, in the constitution of 1868, of uniformity in the organization of municipal corporations.

8. In proceedings in the nature of quo warranto instituted on behalf of the state to test the right to hold an office or enjoy a franchise, great particularity is required in the answer or plea, and a complete right must be shown on the part of the respondent, but on demurrer a bad plea is a good answer to a defective information.

Error to circuit court, Volusia county; J. D. BROOME, Judge.

Quo warranto proceedings on the relation of the attorney general against T. B. Biddulph, S. S. Bennett, Andrew Harold, S. A. Donald, George H. Count, and William James to test their right to be a corporation under the name of the "Town of Enterprise." From a judgment of ouster respondents bring error. Reversed.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by MABRY, J.:

This is a proceeding by information, in the nature of a quo warranto, instituted in behalf of the state of Florida by the attorney general, in the seventh judicial circuit, for Volusia county. The information states that T. B. Biddulph, S. S. Bennett, S. A. Donald, Andrew Harold, William James, and George H. Count,—the said Biddulph as mayor, and the said Bennett, Donald, Harold, James, and Count as aldermen,—and others, have usurped, and still do usurp, to be a corporation, under the corporate name of the "Town of Enterprise," in the county of Volusia and state of Florida, as follows: That on the 1st day of February A. D. 1877, the town of Enterprise, with certain metes and bounds, (which are set out in the information,) was incorporated under the name of the "Town of Enterprise," as will appear by a certified copy of the record of the transcript of the proceedings of said incorporation filed with the clerk of the circuit court of Volusia county, and by him duly entered upon the public records of said county, and which copy of the record is attached as Exhibit A to the information.

Further, that on the 24th day of March, A. D. 1884, there having been no surrender of the aforesaid corporate franchise, and no dissolution of said corporation, the town of Enterprise was again incorporated with the following metes and bounds, to-wit. Sections 1 and 2 in township 19, and sections 35 and 36 in township 18, in range 30 S. and E.; section 6, in township 18, in range 31 S. and E.,—Volusia county, Fla.; that a fair and complete transcript of the proceedings was prepared by the clerk of said town, embodying the notice by which the meeting was convened to form said corporation, the number of qualified electors present, the seal, territorial limits of said incorporation, and the names of the officers-elect, to which the mayor and aldermen attached their signatures, attested by the clerk with said seal, and was filed with the clerk of the circuit court for said county, and by him marked "Filed," but before being recorded was lost, destroyed, or abstracted from said office by some one unknown to relator, and cannot now be found; that under each of said incorporations elections were held and officers elected, duly sworn and qualified, and entered upon and discharged the duties of their respective offices; that the said two incorporations, in succession, owing to factional disturbances and petty grievances, were, without any warrant of authority or process of law, ignored, and on the 14th day of May, A. D. 1885, a third incorporation of the town of Enterprise was formed and organized, or attempted to be, the last and third one further contracting and changing the corporate limits, and leaving without the boundaries of said incorporation citizens and qualified voters, who, under the preceding incorporations, lived within the limits of said town; that, notwithstanding such change and contraction of the limits as aforesaid, no action was taken to that end, as provided by law, but the proceedings had and taken in the premises were as though a new or original incorporation was being formed, as will appear by a certified copy of the transcript of the proceedings thereof attached as Exhibit B to the information. The description of the territory of the third incorporation as embodied in the notice for the meeting to incorporate is as follows: Commencing on Lake Monroe, at west line of lot 3, section 1, township 19, of range 30 E.; and running north on said line to township line dividing townships 18 and 19; thence east, on said line, to the center of half-mile post, in section 5, township 19 south, of range 31 east; thence south, to Lake Monroe; and thence westerly, on the margin of Lake Monroe, to the place of beginning.

That under the last and third incorporation, or pretended incorporation, the said T. B. Biddulph, on the —— day of May, A. D. 1887, was elected, or pretended to be elected, mayor of said incorporation, or pretended incorporation, of the town of Enterprise, and is now acting as such mayor, and S. S. Bennett, S. A. Donald, Andrew Harold, William James, and George H. Count, on the —— day of May, A. D. 1887, were elected, or pretended to be elected, aldermen of said town, and are now acting as such aldermen, and they, said Biddulph, Bennett, Donald, Harold, James, and Count, acting as such mayor and aldermen, respectively, and others residing in said town, do and perform and exercise all the liberties and privileges and franchises of incorporated towns usurping to be an incorporation, to the great damage, prejudice, and wrong of the said state of Florida; wherefore due process of law is prayed against the town of Enterprise, and said mayor and aldermen, and that they be required to answer by what warrant they claim to have, use, and enjoy the liberties, franchises, and privileges aforesaid. Process of subpœna was awarded by the court against T. B. Biddulph, as mayor of the town of Enterprise, and S. S. Bennett, S. A. Donald, Andrew Harold, William James, and George H. Count, as the town council of the town of Enterprise, to answer said information.

Respondents demurred to the said information on the following grounds:

(1) "That said information does not show that either of said incorporations were legally made or formed."

(2) "That said information does show that said two incorporations were illegal, and never had any legal existence."

(3) "That the existence of an illegal and void incorporation does not prevent or preclude the citizens making and forming a legal incorporation under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Florida."

(4) "That the said information does not show that the incorporation of May —, 1885, was not legally formed in every particular, and that the general incorporation law had been complied with in all particulars and requirements."

(5) "That the said information does not show that the corporation of May —, 1885, was not the first and only legal incorporation of the territory therein described."

(6) "That the information is in other respects insufficient, irregular, and informal."

This demurrer, after argument, was overruled, and respondents excepted to the ruling of the court.

T. B. Biddulph filed a disclaimer to the effect that he had long since resigned and ceased to be mayor of said municipal corporation, or to act as such.

The respondents Bennett, Harold, Donald, Count, and James filed an answer, which, in substance, is as follows: They say it is true that they are the board of aldermen of the corporation of Enterprise, but it is not true, as stated in the information, that the name of said corporation is the "Town of Enterprise." They admit that they exercise the duties of aldermen, and claim that they were legally elected and qualified, according to the ordinances of said corporation and the laws of Florida, and as such aldermen perform the duties thereof. They say they are informed and believe citizens, claiming to be 25 in number, did make an attempt to incorporate certain territory described in the information, on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1877, and they are informed that the persons mentioned in the information, as having been elected to office, entered upon and discharged the duties appertaining to each office for a short time, but ceased to act as such about the middle of the year 1877, and have not acted or claimed to be such officers since that time; that corporate government within or over said territory ceased to exist, and was not exercised until the 24th day of March, A. D. 1884, when a number of persons met and attempted to incorporate the territory described in the information, and there were officers elected as alleged in said information, who entered upon the duties of their offices, but they served only a short time, and then refused and failed to act, claiming that the corporation thus formed was not legally constituted and created; that there were no officers exercising, or claiming to exercise, the duties of such offices within the territory described in said information for about a year, and said territory remained without any corporate government for about a year. Respondents say it is true that the citizens of the territory described in the information, on the 14th day of May, A. D. 1885, did enter into and form a corporation, and proceeded thereunder to elect officers to fill the offices provided in the charter of incorporation, and respondents aver that they are their successors in office, and that officers have continually, since the creation of the corporation of 1885, up to the time of filing this answer, been elected.

That it is not true, as alleged in the information, that S. S. Bennett, Andrew Harold, S. A. Donald, George H. Count, and William James were elected in May, 1887. It is true that S. A. Donald, George H. Count, and William James were elected and qualified as aldermen in May, 1887; the other two aldermen held over according to law.

Respondents deny that they, or any one, to their knowledge, ever, for any cause whatever, abstracted any papers from the clerk's office of Volusia county.

It is further stated in the answer that respondents respectfully contend that the two first-named pretended incorporations were never legally incorporated according to and in conformity to the statute laws of the state of Florida, but were void and without legal existence from the beginning thereof; that they contend the incorporation of said territory made and formed the 14th day of May, 1885, was legally made, and that the citizens thereof are a legal government therefor; that respondents are the officers elected under said last incorporation; and they do not usurp any office, or pretend to hold under a void incorporation. Respondents ask leave to refer to the exhibits attached to the information as often as may be found necessary.

Upon the filing of this answer plaintiff moved the court for a judgment of dissolution against the corporations, or pretended or de facto corporations, of the town of Enterprise, or Enterprise, and this motion was granted. A formal judgment of the court on the same day the motion was granted was entered adjudging that the corporations of the town of Enterprise formed, or attempted to be formed, on the 1st day of February, A. D. 1877, and the corporation of said town formed, or attempted to be formed, on the 24th day of March, A. D. 1884, and the corporation of Enterprise formed, or attempted to be formed, on the 14th day May, A. D. 1885, be, each and every of them, dissolved and pronounced void; also that T. B. Biddulph S. S. Bennett, S. A. Donald, Andrew Harold, William James, and George H. Count cease to act in the capacity of mayor and aldermen, respectively, of said town, and that they be ousted therefrom. Respondents bring this decision of the circuit court here for review by writ of error. They assign for error here the granting of the writ of quo warranto, the entertaining jurisdiction by the circuit court of the case made by the pleadings, the overruling of respondents' demurrer to the information, and in awarding the judgment of ouster.

John W. Price, for plaintiffs in error.

MABRY, J., (after stating the facts.) Counsel for plaintiffs in error makes no claim in his brief that the circuit court had no jurisdiction of the quo warranto proceedings.

The constitution of 1885 (section 11, art. 5) provides that "the circuit courts and judges shall have power to issue writs of mandamus, injunction, quo warranto, certiorari, prohibition, habeas corpus, and all writs proper and necessary to the complete exercise of their jurisdiction." Under this provision of the constitution, there is no doubt about the jurisdiction of the circuit court in proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto.

Was the demurrer to the information properly overruled? The proceeding here is by information in the nature of quo warranto, instituted by the attorney general on behalf of the state, against the town of Enterprise and the plaintiffs in error. It is charged in the information that plaintiffs in error have usurped, and do usurp, to be a corporation under the corporate name of the "Town of Enterprise," in Volusia county, state of Florida, and that they claim to be mayor and aldermen of said town, and as such do perform and exercise all the liberties, privileges, and franchises of incorporated towns usurping to be a corporation, to the prejudice and wrong of the people of the state of Florida. The manner in which, it is claimed, they usurp the functions of municipal government, is set out in the information. The information states that the town of Enterprise was incorporated on the 1st day of February, A. D. 1877, and without any surrender of this corporate franchise, or dissolution of the incorporation, another incorpration was formed on the 24th day of March, 1884, and that under each of these incorporations officers were elected, sworn, and qualified, and entered upon and discharged the duties of their respective offices; that these incorporations in succession were ignored, and without any authority of law a third incorporation of said town was on the 14th day of May, A. D. 1885, formed, or attempted to be formed, with contracted corporate limits, and leaving out citizens and qualified voters who lived within the limits of the former corporations. The three acts of incorporation, or attempted incorporation, as appears from the allegations of the information and the record of the proceedings, copies of which are attached thereto, were in the nature of original proceedings, and not a contraction, in the way provided by the statute, of the corporate limits of any preceding incorporation. The plaintiffs in error are charged with usurpation under the third incorporation.

Where usurpation of a public office or a franchise is claimed by the state, and an information is filed by the attorney general to test the right to hold such office or enjoy such franchise, it is only necessary to allege, generally, that the person holding the office or enjoying the franchise does so without lawful authority and in such a case, as against the state, it devolves upon such person to show a complete legal right to enjoy the privileges in question. People v. Woodbury, 14 Cal. 43; People v. Abbott, 16 Cal. 358; State v. Palmer, 24 Wis. 63; State v. Saxon, 25 Fla. 342, 5 South. Rep. 801. It is contended here that, while usurpation of municipal functions is charged against plaintiffs in error, the information disclosed facts which show their right to exercise them, in this: that it appears from what is therein stated the two first efforts at incorporation are illegal and void, and the third one, under which they claim, is shown to be valid. We concede it to be a correct proposition that if the information states the facts upon which the charge of usurpation is based, and those facts show a clear legal right in respondents, it would be insufficient. It was said in State v. Saxon supra, that the same general principles and rules of pleading enforced in civil actions also govern in quo warranto proceedings. If the state alleges a legal right in plaintiffs in error, and no forfeiture or loss of this right is shown, the information is insufficient. State v. Haskell, 14 Nev. 209. If either one of the two first incorporations were valid, and embraced territory included in the third one, under which plaintiffs in error claim, the latter is void, unless there can exist two municipal corporations at the same time over the same territory. We have no hesitancy in declaring that the inhabitants of a given territory cannot, under the general incorporation law in force in this state for the organization of municipal corporations, inaugurate two municipal governments in the same space at the same time. There is no inherent power in the inhabitants of a town to create a municipal government. This can only be done in pursuance of, and in compliance with, legislative enactment on the subject. One valid organization is necessarily exclusive of another. It was said in State v. Town of Winter Park, 25 Fla. 371, 5 South. Rep. 818, that two legal and effective municipal corporations cannot exist at the same time over the same territory, but in this case it was held that the rule did not apply where there was a de facto corporation without right, and a legally organized corporation not in active governmental operation till the former was ousted. Vide State v. Dunson, 71 Tex. 65, 9 S. W. Rep. 103; Buford v. State, 72 Tex. 182, 10 S. W. Rep. 401; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 184,—as to existence of two corporations at same time. As to the first corporation, it is alleged that the town of Enterprise was incorporated on the 1st day of February, A. D. 1877, as will appear by a copy of the transcript of the proceedings attached as an exhibit to the information. From this transcript of the record before us we are unable to ascertain what are the metes and bounds of the territory proposed to be incorporated. The description given utterly fails to inclose any area, and it is impossible for us to determine from it the territories or boundaries of the alleged corporation. Under our statute, and in the very nature of the existence of a municipal government, it is essential that it should have ascertained and well-defined boundaries. The organization of a municipal government, under our general law for incorporating towns and cities without defined metes, is unauthorized, and would be a nullity. Gray v. Sheldon, 8 Vt. 402; Pierce v. Carpenter, 10 Vt. 480; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 182. In addition to a void description of the territory proposed to be incorporated in said town, the transcript of the proceedings of incorporation recorded in the office of clerk of the circuit court did not have attached to it the signatures of the mayor and aldermen-elect, and attested by the clerk with the corporate seal, as provided by the statute. Other objections are urged to the validity of this incorporation, but it is not necessary to consider them, as we think it was illegal and void on account of uncertainty in the proposed corporate limits.

A second corporation, it is alleged, was formed on March 24, A. D. 1884. A fair and complete transcript of the proceedings was prepared by the clerk of said town, embodying the notice by which the meeting was convened to form said corporation, the number of qualified electors present, the seal, territorial limits of said town, and the names of the officers-elect, to which the mayor and aldermen attached their signatures, attested by the clerk with said seal, was filed with the clerk of the circuit court, and marked "Filed," but before being recorded was lost, and cannot now be found. The transcript of the proceedings alleged to have been delivered for record complies with the statute in every respect, except it does not embody the name or style of the corporation. This transcript, it seems, in some way disappeared from the clerk's office, and was never recorded. We would not be disposed to pronounce the corporate organization void because of the failure to record the transcript, under the circumstances alleged. If the municipal organization was properly had, and a perfect transcript of the proceedings delivered to the proper officer, whose duty it was to record it, we think the incorporators would then have complied with the requirement of the statute, in so far as the creation of the corporation among themselves is concerned. They had the right to re-establish the lost transcript, and have it recorded. It is not necessary for us to say here what would be the effect of a failure on their part to re-establish the lost record in a direct proceeding by the state to vacate the municipal government thus formed. There is, however, a defect in this second alleged incorporation which demands our consideration. The alleged metes and bounds of this incorporation show that a part of the territory proposed to be incorporated is detached and disconnected from the other. Sections 1 and 2 of township 19, and sections 35 and 36 in township 18, range 30, constitute one contiguous body; but section 6 in township 18, range 31, is a body one mile square, and distant five miles. We have, then, a proposed municipal organization, under our general statute for the incorporation of towns and cities, containing, as corporate territory, two separate and detached localities. The query at once presents itself, can this be done? The statute provides that "the male inhabitants of any hamlet, village, or town in this state, not less than twenty in number," with the requisite qualifications, may establish for themselves a municipal government. It is alleged in the information that the town of Enterprise was incorporated. In Railway Co. v. Town of Oconto, 50 Wis. 189, 6 N. W. Rep. 607, it was held that the word "town," as used in the constitution of that state, denotes a civil division composed of contiguous territory, and, under the power given to county boards by statute to set off, organize, vacate, and change the boundaries of towns in their respective counties, such boards cannot make a valid order changing the boundaries of a town, so that it shall consist of two separate and distinct tracts of land. In Smith v. Sherry, 50 Wis. 210, 6 N. W. Rep. 561, it was said: "The idea of a city or village implies an assemblage of inhabitants living in the vicinity of each other, and not separated by any other intervening civil division of the state." We think that the inhabitants of a hamlet, village, or town recognized as a community of persons authorized to form a municipal government under the general act for the incorporation of cities and towns in force in this state include persons living on contiguous territory, and that an attempt to incorporate two distinct detached tracts of land, as corporate territory under one government, is unauthorized and void. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 27. The idea of a municipal government, with outlying detached municipal provinces, was not contemplated by the statute. The machinery of government provided by the statute is inapplicable to such a state of affairs. From the allegations of the information our conclusion is that the second attempted incorporation of the town of Enterprise was also illegal.

The third incorporation in question, as appears from the allegations of the information and the transcript of the proceedings, a certified copy of the record of which is filed as a part of the information, was in compliance with the statute. The corporate name is "Enterprise," and the metes and bounds of the incorporation are defined, and all the other requisites of the statute substantially met. It appears from the information that officers were elected, qualified, and discharged official duties under the two first incorporations, but, before the formation of the third, it is alleged that the two former in succession were laid aside, and proceedings were instituted to incorporate again. It is a well-established rule that no collateral attack can be made upon the existence of a corporation. Such bodies derive their being from the sovereign will of the people, and, so long as the state does not question their existence, it cannot be controverted in a collateral way on account of irregularities and defects in their organization. President, etc., v. Thompson, 20 Ill. 197; Hamilton v. President, etc., 24 Ill. 22; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 43a.

When the last incorporation was formed there was no municipal government in existence under either one of the former attempts at incorporation. Whatever might be the effect of an existing municipal government, under a void incorporation, as to the right of the inhabitants therein to organize a new in opposition to it, we think that, after an abandonment of such organization, the former proceedings would not preclude them from proceeding to organize a municipal government in accordance with the provisions of the statute. The allegation in the information that officers were elected and qualified under the two first incorporations, standing alone, would be no objection against the third incorporation, as it is shown that the organizations under the former were void, and the governments under them abandoned before proceedings under the latter. The theory here is that the third incorporation is illegal, and the proceedings instituted are to test the right of plaintiffs in error and others to maintain a corporate government. Our investigation so far has conducted us to the conclusion that, as shown by the information, the formation of the third corporation on May 14, A. D. 1885, is legal; and, unless there is something in the acts of the legislature in reference to the two first that will change the result, the demurrer was improperly overruled.

The legislature passed a special act on the 22d day of February, A. D. 1885, about one month before the third incorporation was undertaken, providing "that all the acts done and performed in the organization and incorporation of the town of Enterprise, in the county of Volusia, are declared to be legal and valid in law and equity, and to be considered valid and binding by the laws of the state of Florida." Chapter 3634, Laws Fla. 1885. The first attempted incorporation, in 1877, was void for uncertainty in the territorial limits and metes and bounds of the incorporation. The second one, in 1884, was void because an attempt was made to incorporate into one municipal government two distinct and detached tracts of land, and which was unauthorized by the general law for the incorporation of cities and towns. The enactment of this statute was before the adoption of the constitution of 1885. The constitution of 1868 (sections 21, 22, art. 4) provides that the legislature shall establish a uniform system of county, township, and municipal government, and shall provide, by general law, for incorporating such municipal, educational, agricultural, mechanical, mining, and other useful companies or associations as may be deemed necessary. Section 17 of same article prohibits special or local laws in certain enumerated cases, which it is not necessary to mention. Under the provisions of the constitution of 1868, the legislature could not, by special act, create a municipal corporation, as the clear mandate of that instrument was that provision should be made by general law for incorporating such bodies. The attempted incorporation of the town of Enterprise on the 24th day of March, A. D. 1884, to which the special act was no doubt designed to apply, was not in compliance with the general law on that subject, in this: that it sought to incorporate two detached territories under one government. This could not be done under the general law. Was it competent for the legislature to validate by special act what had been attempted to be done? We are duly sensible of the rule that an act of the legislature, passed in due form, is not to be held invalid by reason of its being supposed to be in contravention of the provisions of the constitution, in a merely doubtful case, and in such case the doubt should turn the scale in favor of the validity of the enactment. We recognize the well-settled rule that it is only in cases where the act of the legislature is clearly repugnant to the constitution that it will be so declared. In Stange v. City of Dubuque, 62 Iowa, 303, 17 N. W. Rep. 518, a special act of the legislature, attempting to validate a void ordinance of the city of Dubuque granting a street-railway company the right of way for its railroad on certain streets of the city, was pronounced void under a constitution prohibiting the legislature from passing local or special laws for the incorporation of cities and towns. It was said: "As the legislature could not, by special act, have authorized the city of Dubuque to pass the ordinance in question, it follows that it cannot, after the passage of the ordinance, legalize it by special act. The legislature cannot do indirectly what it is inhibited from doing directly." The following authorities sustain this position: Ex parte Pritz, 9 Iowa, 30; Davis v. Woolnough, Id. 104; Town of McGregor v. Baylies, 19 Iowa, 43; Smith v. Sherry, supra. The twenty-first section of article 4 of the constitution, which provides that "the legislature shall establish a uniform system of municipal government," was construed in the case of McConihe v. State, 17 Fla. 238. It was said: "There is little difficulty in determining the signification of the word 'system,' in this connection. Its general signification is 'plan,' 'arrangement,' 'method,' and, when used in reference to municipal government, it means, simply, rules and regulations for the organization and government of municipal corporations." This being the case, it becomes perfectly clear that the special act in question is in conflict with the constitutional requirement of uniformity in the organization of municipal governments, whatever might be its effect in curing mere defects in the procedure in the organization of a municipal government invested with no new or different powers than those organized under the general law. 'Uniformity' indicates 'consistency,' 'resemblance,' 'sameness,' a 'conformity' to one pattern." For a full discussion of the special laws prohibited, and the uniformity of the operation of the general legislation under the sections of the constitution in question, see, in addition to McConihe v. State, supra, State v. Stark, 18 Fla. 255; Lake v. State, Id. 501; Ex parte Wells, 21 Fla. 280. If municipal corporations can be formed in violation of the general incorporation act on this subject, and then legalized by special act of the legislature, the uniformity of municipal organization demanded by the constitution can be dispensed with by special legislation. No such result as this, we think, can be reconciled with the constitution. We conclude that the special act of 1885 cannot have the effect to make valid what has been done in the attempted organizations of the town of Enterprise. The act cannot validate what was done under either of the first two efforts at incorporation.

In 1887 we find a general act (chapter 3748, Laws Fla.) providing for the legalization of the charters of incorporated cities and towns. This act went into effect after the third incorporation was had. A perusal of this act will show that it has no application to the two first attempted incorporations. There was no municipal government in existence or operation under either at the time the last act took effect. It applies to cities and towns which then, and for 10 years then last past had, exercised municipal government, and which, on account of certain specified defects in organization, had the legality of their incorporation brought in question. The first two incorporations had been abandoned, and there were no municipal governments under them, and hence this legislation had no application to them. The information shows that the incorporation of May 14, A. D. 1885, was in compliance with the statute, and, this being so, we think the demurrer was improperly overruled.

After the demurrer was overruled, plaintiffs in error filed an answer, and, on motion of the state, a judgment vacating all former incorporations of the town of Enterprise, or Enterprise, was rendered, as well as a judgment of ouster against plaintiffs in error. The motion seems to have been considered as a demurrer to the answer. Great particularity is required in an answer in such proceedings, and a complete legal right must be shown, (State v. Saxon, supra;) but, on demurrer, a bad plea is a good answer to a defective declaration. The infirmity in the record here is in the information filed by the state. From the state's showing, there is no good cause why plaintiffs in error, and others residing in the corporate limits of Enterprise, should not inaugurate and maintain the municipal corporation in question. The statute gives them this right.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, with directions that the demurrer to the information be sustained.

STATE v. MITCHELL.

WRIT OF ERROR IN CRIMINAL CASES—RIGHT TO—EFFECT—SUPERSEDEAS—JURISDICTION OF APPELLATE COURT.

1. A writ of error in a criminal cause is not a writ of right, and does not issue as a matter of course on the application of the party convicted, but only upon the judicial allowance by a court, justice, or judge having authority to allow the same.

2. In allowing writs of error in criminal causes, judicial discretion is always exercised liberally in favor of the defendant.

3. The judge of the criminal court of record of Duval county has power to allow a writ of error in a criminal cause in which the judgment of that court is reviewable by the supreme court, and the clerk may, upon the allowance of the writ, issue both that writ and the writ of scire facias ad audiendum errores. These powers are not exclusive of the power of the supreme court, or a justice thereof, to allow the writ of error, nor of that of the clerk of the latter court to issue these writs.

4. A writ of error is a new action, and not a mere continuation of the former suit.

5. An order allowing a writ of error does not compel the complaining convict to prosecute a suit in error; it merely enables him to do it, and, if he wishes to avail himself of this permission, he may do so by applying to either the clerk of the appellate court or of the court which rendered the judgment for the writ, and the clerk should issue it.

6. An order allowing a writ of error is a judicial permission to institute a suit in error to review the judgment complained of; it is not the writ, and, until the writ is actually issued, (if not, it may be both issued and lodged in the court whose judgment is to be reviewed,) there is no suit in error, and the appellate court has no jurisdiction of the cause. The writ is the process by which the record or cause is removed to the appellate court.

7. Though a compliance with the provisions of section 5, p. 455, McClel. Dig., as to payment of costs and entering into recognizance with sureties, operates of itself, without any order declaring the effect of such compliance, to make the writ of error, when issued, stay the further execution of the sentence of the court, as also does a compliance with the several provisions of section 7, p. 456, Id., still this superseding effect does not, even in a bailable case, authorize the discharge of the defendant if he be in custody; but by the express provision of section 5, p. 455, Id., there must be an order, by the court or judge allowing the writ, for his discharge; which order should always be made as a matter of course, in bailable cases, where all the supersedeas provisions necessary to such discharge are complied with.

8. A compliance with the supersedeas provisions of the statute will, of itself, give a writ of error in criminal cases the effect of superseding the further execution of the sentence; and no order that a compliance with those provisions shall have this superseding effect is necessary, and the officers of the law must take notice of and act in obedience to the effect of such mere compliance. The practice which obtains, however, of declaring, in the order allowing the writ, that a compliance with the supersedeas provisions will have the effect to make the writ operate as a supersedeas, though adding nothing to the effect of such compliance, is not harmful, but may aid the ministerial officers of the courts.

9. An order allowing a writ of error in a criminal cause, and a compliance with the provisions of the statute intended to make the writ operate as a supersedeas, do not suspend or supersede the execution of the sentence, where no writ is actually issued; nor, where no writ is issued, do such an order and such compliance, and a further order that the compliance shall make the writ operate as a supersedeas. There must be, at least, a writ actually issued, (or, it may be, issued and served,) after it is allowed; and it is the writ or suit in error that the statute intends shall operate as a supersedeas to the judgment, upon compliance with the supersedeas provisions of the statute.

10. Service of a writ of error is made by lodging the writ in the court which rendered the judgment sought to be reviewed.

11. Where an order allowing a writ of error from the supreme court to a criminal court of record is made by the judge of the latter court, and such order directs that the writ shall operate as a supersedeas, and it appears that the party convicted has made the oath and furnished proofs which, under section 7, p. 456, McClel. Dig., cause a writ of error to operate as a supersedeas in a bailable case if he remains in custody, and at the term of the former court to which such writ, if issued, should have been made returnable, the state moves to dismiss the writ, but no writ of error has in fact issued, the motion must be denied, and for the reason that there is no writ of or suit in error to dismiss, and the court has no jurisdiction of any such suit or writ.

12. Where a writ of error is allowed, but not issued, the warrant for the execution of the sentence should be issued and executed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from criminal court of record, Duval county.

Prosecution against George N. Mitchell for assault with intent to murder. There was a judgment on conviction, and the order allowing defendant's writ of error recited that the writ should operate as a supersedeas. On motion to dismiss the writ. Motion denied.

William R. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the motion.

RANEY, C. J. The attorney general moves to docket and dismiss this case. It appears that on May 4, 1891, in the criminal court of record of Duval county, Mitchell was found guilty of an assault with intent to murder one Hubbard. Motions in arrest of judgment and for a new trial having been made and overruled, Mitchell was sentenced on the same day to imprisonment in the state-prison at hard labor for the period of two years. Sixty days were allowed for preparing a bill of exceptions. On the 8th day of the following June the following order was made in the cause by that court: "Upon application made in open court for writ of error and supersedeas in the above cause, it is considered and ordered by the court that a writ of error do issue, and that said writ of error be a supersedeas upon the affidavit of insolvency of defendant on file; and it appearing to the satisfaction of the court that the allegations contained therein are true." There is, in the informal transcript of the record filed here by the attorney general in support of the motion, an affidavit of Mitchell to the effect that he has no property or other means of payment, either in his possession or under his control, for the payment of costs in the cause, and has not divested himself of his property for the purpose of receiving benefit from this oath, and that he is utterly unable to enter into the recognizance required. There is also an affidavit of James H. Hamilton, S. B. Chapman, and Moses Taylor to the same effect.

The ground of the motion to dismiss is that no other or further step has been taken by Mitchell to prosecute his writ of error and give effect to the same. Mitchell is still in the Duval county jail.

The transcript was filed here on the 23d day of March of the present year, (1892,) of which day the motion as amended is made, though in fact the attorney general had, a few days previously, moved, on a certificate of the clerk of the criminal court, that no writ of error had been issued, and a certified copy of the above order granting the writ of error, and directing that it should operate as a supersedeas.

The controlling question is whether or not the actual issue of the writ is essential to our jurisdiction.

The criminal court of record of Duval county was established by an act of June 8, 1887, (Acts 1887, p. 111,) and by the twenty-third section of a statute approved the same day, and entitled "An act prescribing the jurisdiction and powers and regulating the proceedings in the criminal court of record," (chapter 3731, pp. 100–103, Acts 1887,) it is provided that the same rules, practice, and procedure that obtain in appeals and writs of error from the circuit to the supreme court shall obtain in appeals from the criminal courts of record to the circuit court and the supreme court. Though we do not admit that, under our present statutory system, such a thing as an "appeal," as distinguished from a writ of error, obtains for administering our appellate jurisdiction in criminal causes, still our opinion is that the effect of this statute is to authorize writs of error as the proper mode of administering our appellate jurisdiction over the criminal courts of record. Such has been the practical construction of the act for some years, and we think it correct. Wooten v. State, 24 Fla. 335, 341, 5 South. Rep. 39; Houston v. State, 24 Fla. 356, 5 South. Rep. 48. The judge had the power to allow the writ, and the clerk had authority to issue it and a scire facias ad audi- endum errores; their powers coinciding with those of the judge and clerks of the circuit court in cases of convictions in that court. McClel. Dig. p. 455, § 4; Id. p. 456, § 9; Id. p. 843, § 2; Williams v. State, 20 Fla. 391. These powers are not exclusive of the power of the supreme court or of a justice thereof to allow the writ of error, nor of that of the clerk of the latter court to issue these writs.

A writ of error is a new action, and not a continuation of the former suit, the alleged errors in which it is sought to have reviewed and corrected. 2 Tidd, Pr. 1141; Bank v. Jenkins, 104 Ill. 143; Ripley v. Morris, 2 Gilman, 381, 6 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 812.

In Mussina v. Cavazos, 6 Wall. 355, where it was held that if the writ of error is served by depositing it with the clerk of the court rendering the judgment, and he makes return by sending to the appellate court a transcript in due form, the latter court has jurisdiction to decide the case, although the original writ may be lost or destroyed before it reaches the appellate court, it is said by Judge MILLER, speaking for the supreme court of the United States: "We have repeatedly held that the writ of error in cases at law is essential to the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of this court;" and in Crippen v. Livingston, 12 Fla. 638, our own court observed that "the record of the inferior court is not transferred, its proceedings are not affected, and, indeed, but little follows the simple issuing of the writ;" and the settled doctrine of the former court is that a writ of error is not "brought," within the meaning of the statute limiting the period for bringing such writs, until the writ is filed in the court which rendered the judgment, (Brooks v. Norris, 11 How. 204; Cummings v. Jones, 104 U. S. 419; Scarborough v. Pargoud, 108 U. S. 567, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877; Polleys v. Improvement Co., 113 U. S. 81, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369;) and in Crippen v. Livingston, where our own statute, providing that no judgment, in any cause, shall be reversed or avoided for any error or defect therein, unless error be "commenced, or brought and prosecuted, within two years after such judgment, signed and entered of record," was under consideration, it was held that a writ of error was not commenced, or brought and prosecuted, within the meaning of the act, until the writ is filed in the court which rendered the judgment. See, also, Sammis v. Wightman, 25 Fla. 547, 552, 6 South. Rep. 173. These cases also hold that, when the writ is not so filed, it is immaterial that it may have been issued or tested before the expiration of the statutory period of limitation.

Unless there is something in the statutes governing writs of error in criminal cases which changes the rule, we cannot see that the issue (if not, it may be the issue and service) of a writ of error is not essential to our jurisdiction, or that, at least, until a writ has been issued there is no suit in or writ of error to dismiss.

Writs of error in criminal cases are not writs of right in this state. They were such in capital cases, under the third section of the act of January 11, 1848, (page 455, § 3, McClel. Dig.;) but this was changed by the act of February 12, 1861, (page 456, § 11, McClel. Dig.,) which puts capital cases upon the same footing in this respect as other criminal cases. Before a writ of error can issue in any criminal case, there must be an inspection of the record by a court, or a justice or judge, given by the statute the power to act in the premises, and such court, or justice or judge, must be of the opinion that there "is just cause for allowing a writ of error," and an order allowing it must be made, and thereupon the writ of error is to issue.

The order for a writ is, however, not the writ. It is, in so far as the convicted person is concerned, a judicial permission to institute a suit in error to review the judgment of the inferior court. Whereas, in civil cases, no such judicial sanction of the merit of a proposed review of a judgment or decree is required, and a writ of error may be brought as a matter of right, and without conditions, by a losing defendant, and by a losing plaintiff, upon the simple conditions of paying the costs which have accrued in the cause, and giving bond, with surety, for those which may accrue in the prosecution of the writ of error, the law-makers have yet seen fit to prevent a test before appellate courts of the correctness of judgments in criminal causes, unless and until the sanction of a judicial allowance of such a suit in error is obtained. McIver v. Marshall, 24 Fla. 42, 4 South. Rep. 563. An order of this character does not compel the complaining convict to prosecute the suit,—it merely authorizes or enables him to do so; and, if he wishes to avail himself of this permission, he may do so by applying to the clerk, either of the supreme court or of the court which rendered the judgment, for the writ, and the clerk should issue it. Until the writ is issued there is no suit in error under the statute. McClel. Dig. p. 455, § 4.

There are in the statute certain provisions as to superseding the judgment complained of.

In the first place, the statute of 1848, as applicable to convictions in the circuit court, and such statute as modified by the above-mentioned criminal court of record act, as applicable to convictions in the criminal courts of record controlled by it, provides that the writ of error shall not operate as a supersedeas to the execution of the judgment, sentence, or order, except upon the payment by the plaintiff in error of all costs which have accrued, and by securing, by recognizance to be entered into with one or more sureties, before the clerk of the court rendering the judgment, in a sum sufficient to secure the payment of such judgment, fine, and future costs as may be adjudged and affirmed in the supreme court, and is also conditioned that the party shall be personally forthcoming to answer and abide the final order, sentence, or judgment that may be passed in the premises by the supreme court; and, in case the cause is remanded to the circuit court, then that the plaintiff in error shall personally be and appear at the next term of the court in which he was convicted, in the county in which the cause was originally tried, thereafter to be held, to answer in the premises, and not to depart from the court without leave thereof. It is, however, expressly provided that, where the judgment is one of capital punishment, the person of the party convicted shall be the only security required for his forthcoming to answer as aforesaid. Page 455, § 5, Id. It is also further provided that, if the party applying for such writ of error shall be in custody under sentence of conviction, the allowance of the writ and the obtaining of such supersedeas shall not discharge such party from custody, except by order of the court, or of the justice, allowing the writ of error, and that such an order shall be made only in cases bailable according to the course of the common law or by the statutes of this state. Pages 455, 456, § 6, Id.

It is plain from these provisions that they contemplate, where the case is not capital, a release of the convicted party from custody; and yet, though the payment of costs and the taking of the recognizance by the clerk give the writ of error the effect to suspend or supersede the execution of the sentence, they do not of themselves authorize the release of the party, if he be in custody, by the officer having him in custody. On the contrary, an express order to that effect by the court or judge allowing the writ is essential by the very terms of the statute.

The statute does not, however, contemplate a suspension of the execution of the judgment only in cases where costs can be paid and recognizance given as required above, but it also provides that when the defendant shall be utterly unable to pay the costs, in whole or in part, and shall make oath before the court or the clerk thereof, and also establish, by credible testimony, that he has no property or other means of payment either in his possession or under his control, and has not divested himself of his property for the purpose of receiving the benefit of his oath, and is also utterly unable to enter into the recognizance required to secure the payment of such judgment, fine, and costs, the writ of error, such oath being made and evidence produced, shall be a supersedeas without such payment, if the defendant remain in custody; or, in cases not capital, upon his entering into recognizance with one or more sureties, conditioned that he shall be personally forthcoming to answer the judgment of the supreme court, and for his appearance before the circuit court. Page 456, § 7, Id.

To secure discharge from custody, in bailable cases, where the plaintiff in error is utterly unable to pay costs, in whole or in part, and makes oath and furnishes the proof contemplated by the preceding or seventh section, as to his having no property or other means of payment, and as to his not having divested himself of his property, and as to his being unable to enter into recognizance to secure the payment of the judgment, fine, and future costs, the plaintiff in error must not only enter into a recognizance, with one or more sureties, conditioned that he shall be personally forthcoming to answer and abide the final order, sentence, or judgment that may be passed in the premises by the supreme or other appellate, as the case may be, court, and, in case the cause is remanded to the circuit or other trial court, as the case may be, then that he shall personally be and appear at the next term of the court in which he was convicted, in the county in which the cause was originally tried, thereafter to be held to answer in the premises, and not to depart from the court without leave thereof, but there must be also an express order for his discharge, as provided by the fifth section of the act supra. Of course he must remain in custody, even in bailable cases, notwithstanding the inability contemplated by the seventh section and full proof thereof, unless he gives the recognizance for being forthcoming required thereby, and obtains the order for his release.

This order should never be refused in any bailable case where the provisions precedent thereto are complied with.

It is clear, we think, that the purpose of this statute of 1848, as amended in 1861, is, in the first place, to make the right to a writ or suit in error in criminal causes dependent on judicial discretion,—a discretion always exercised liberally; and, second, to prescribe the conditions under which the writ or suit shall operate as a supersedeas to the enforcement of the judgment; and, third, to expressly limit what might otherwise be understood to be an effect of a supersedeas, proprio vigore in bailable cases, by requiring an order of discharge from custody when the applicant for the writ is in custody. There is, however, nothing in the statute that dispenses with the writ as essential to the exercise of our appellate jurisdiction. The writ is the proceeding by which the record or cause is removed to the appellate court. Brooks v. Norris, supra; Kitchen v. Randolph, 93 U. S. 87. When there has never been a writ issued, to say nothing of the necessity for its service, there is no suit in error pending. Carroll v. Dorsey, 20 How. 204; Blitz v. Brown, 7 Wall. 693; Washington Co. v. Durant, Id. 694; Ballance v. Forsyth, 21 How. 389; Slaughter-House Cases, 10 Wall. 273. Writs of error from the supreme court of the United States to state courts do not issue as matter of right, but only upon allowance by the proper judge of the state court, or by a justice of the United States supreme court. Twitchwell v. Com., 7 Wall. 321; Gleason v. Florida, 9 Wall. 779. In Bondurant v. Watson, 103 U. S. 278, a case of a writ of error to the supreme court of Louisiana, where a paper intended as a writ of error was issued and bore teste in the name of the chief justice of that court, and was signed by its clerk and sealed with its seal, instead of being in the name of the president of the United States, and bearing teste in the name of the chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, the writ also not complying with section 1004 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing that such writs may be issued by the clerks of the circuit courts under the seals thereof, as well as by the clerk of the supreme court, it was said, in effect, that there was nothing even purporting to be a proper writ, and therefore nothing to amend by; and the suit was dismissed, the court saying: "The supreme court of the state has directed that its record be certified here for examination and review, but no writ to that effect, either in form or substance, has ever issued from this court. As such a writ is necessary to our jurisdiction, the suit is dismissed." In Ex parte Ralston, 119 U. S. 613, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 317, a writ of error to the supreme court of Louisiana had been allowed by the chief justice of that court, and, before any writ actually issued, an order that the writ should operate as a supersedeas was made by a justice of the United States supreme court. The latter court refused an application of Ralston for a mandamus to compel the clerk of the state court to transmit to the former court a transcript of the record of the cause, and also refused a motion made by the other side to vacate the supersedeas order, and held that, as no writ of error had issued, they had no jurisdiction of the suit, and no authority over the clerk in the matter about which the mandamus was asked, and that, for the same reason, the supersedeas order was of no legal effect; that a supersedeas could not be allowed except as an incident to an appeal taken or a writ of error actually sued out.

It is to be observed that the statute does not require an order that, on compliance with the supersedeas provisions, the writ of error shall operate as a supersedeas. When the writ is allowed and issued, a compliance with the mere supersedeas provisions, though not authorizing a discharge of the prisoner, has, of itself, the effect of arresting or superseding otherwise the execution of the sentence. It gives the writ this effect; and this court in 1857, in a capital case, which had been brought here and continued for the term, refused to make an order that the writ should operate as a supersedeas, and held that such was the legal effect of the writ, without any order, upon compliance with the supersedeas provisions, and that it was to be obeyed by the ministerial officers of the law. It has, however, become the practice, notwithstanding the above decision, for the judge, justice, or court allowing the writ to state in the order that the writ of error shall operate as a supersedeas, upon the requirements of the statute being complied with, and we see no harm in the practice; although it does not add anything to the effect of such compliance, it may aid the ministerial officers of the courts.

Had the writ of error been promptly issued in this case, we do not say the affidavits mentioned in the outset of this opinion would not have attached to it, and given it the effect of a supersedeas, notwithstanding they were filed before its actual issue. We are inclined to think they would, but, as no such writ has ever been issued, they are of no effect, and there has never been any suspension of the sentence. It should have been executed. If no application was made to the clerk for the issue of the writ, he should have delivered to the sheriff the warrant for executing the sentence, in compliance with page 450, § 35, McClel. Dig., and if it was delivered the sheriff should have executed it. There has been an omission of official duty, and one of a character which has, within the observation of each of the present members of the court, had the effect to embarrass the administration of criminal law to such an extent as to render these observations necessary; and, if such omissions of duty are to recur, similar embarrassments must follow until the law provides a remedy or the evil is otherwise corrected.

The motion must be denied, and it will be ordered accordingly.

TURNER et al. v. BERNHEIMER.

HOMESTEAD—EFFECT OF DEED OF HUSBAND TO WIFE.

Where a husband alone conveyed land constituting a homestead to his wife, such conveyance is not void as an alienation of the homestead, within the meaning of Const. art. 10, § 2, and Code, § 2507, but, under Act 1887, (married woman's law,) enabling the husband to convey land to his wife, passed the legal title, subject to all pre-existing homestead rights.

Appeal from circuit court, Mobile county, WILLIAM E. CLARKE, Judge.

Ejectment by Charles Bernheimer against Lewis W. Turner and another. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

This was a statutory real action in the nature of ejectment, brought by the appellee against the appellants, and sought to recover certain described real estate. The defendants pleaded the general issue, and issue was joined thereon. The uncontroverted evidence showed that the property so sued for was levied upon on June 23, 1890, under an execution issued on a judgment rendered by the city court of Mobile on April 23, 1890; that said judgment was recovered by the firm of Bernheimer, Bauer & Co., on an account due from the defendant Lewis W. Turner for goods purchased by him in September, 1889; that said property was sold by the sheriff under said execution on August 25, 1890, and the plaintiff in this suit, Charles Bernheimer, who was a member of the firm of Bernheimer, Bauer & Co., became the purchaser at said sale. The defendants offered to introduce in evidence a deed from the defendant Lewis W. Turner to his co-defendant, Sarah A. Turner, who was his wife, executed on December 10, 1889, by which he conveyed the property sued for in this action on the recited consideration of one dollar. The defendants also offered to prove that the said Sarah A. Turner was put in possession of the property; that the property described in the complaint and conveyed by the deed was the homestead of the defendant Lewis W. Turner, and that the same did not exceed in value two thousand dollars; and that all of said property was owned, occupied, and used as a homestead by the defendant Lewis W. Turner at the time he conveyed it to his wife. Upon separate objection on the part of the plaintiff to the introduction of each portion of this testimony the court sustained the objection, and refused to allow the testimony to be introduced. The defendants separately excepted to the sustaining of each one of the objections to the introduction of each portion of the testimony. At the written request of the plaintiff the court gave the general affirmative charge in his behalf, to the giving of which charge the defendants duly excepted. Defendants assign as error the rulings of the lower court upon the evidence, and the giving of the general affirmative charge for the plaintiff.

B. B. Boone, for appellants. Pillans, Torrey & Hanaw, for appellee.

McCLELLAN, J. The fate of this appeal depends entirely upon whether the husband can convey lands which constitute the family homestead to the wife, the deed to that end being executed by himself alone, but delivered to and accepted by her. Both the organic and statute law of Alabama declare that no alienation of the homestead shall be valid without the voluntary signature and assent of the wife to the instrument intended to have that effect. The "married woman's law" of 1887 removed the legal disabilities theretofore existing between husband and wife to the extent, among others, of enabling the husband generally to sell and convey lands to the wife; but it has never been supposed, and is not, we apprehend, the law, that the statute changed in any way pre-existing requirements in respect of the alienation of the homestead further than this: that if, before its passage, the husband might have conveyed an equitable title in the homestead to the wife, he may now convey the legal title. So that the question is not really at all affected by the act of 1887, and it comes back to this: Is such a conveyance an alienation of the homestead within the meaning of section 2, art. 10, of the constitution, and section 2507 of the Code? If it is, it cannot be effective now any more than before the passage of the act of 1887; if it is not, it would have been effectual in equity before that act as it would be now at law. And if the husband may convey land constituting the homestead to the wife, his deed for that purpose cannot be joined in by the wife; that is, her joinder therein would add nothing to its effect, since she cannot be both grantor and grantee in the same instrument. Trawick v. Davis, 85 Ala. 342, 5 South. Rep. 83. It is manifest, of course, that the requirement of the wife's voluntary signature and assent to any alienation of the homestead is for the protection of the wife, to secure to her a home of which she cannot be deprived except through her own free act. As is said by Judge THOMPSON: "The policy of those statutes which restrain the alienation of the homestead without the wife joining in the deed is to protect the wife, and to enable her to protect the family, in the possession and enjoyment of a homestead, after one has been acquired by the husband." It is not perceived how this policy of the law could be in any degree thwarted by upholding the husband's conveyance of the homestead land to the wife. It is still her homestead, and still incapable of passing from her and the family without her voluntary signature and assent to the instrument operating the alienation. She and the family are as fully protected before as after such conveyance, and no violence is done to any purpose of the law respecting her and her children by according validity and giving force to such a conveyance. Not only so, but the premises are still as much the homestead of the husband. He has the same right of occupancy and enjoyment as before the execution of the conveyance, and this right cannot be taken away from him; the wife cannot convey the land, without his voluntary assent and signature. And this is true whether he be regarded as still having a special property in the land, by reason of its homestead character, or whether it be considered that the land belongs absolutely to the wife, since, even in the latter case, there could be no alienation of it by her without his assent and concurrence, he being sui juris, and a resident of the state, "manifested by his joining in the alienation in the mode prescribed by law for the execution of conveyances of land." Code, § 2348. It would seem, then, in all reason, that a conveyance of homestead premises by the husband to the wife, while having effect as an alienation of the land in the sense of passing the legal title to her, is yet not an alienation of the homestead, since that does not thereby pass either from the husband, the wife, or the family, but is still in every essential quality and attribute with respect to possession, enjoyment, and all the rights necessary to its protection as exempted property, the homestead alike of the husband, the wife, and their children. And so it is said further by the eminent author quoted above, that laws requiring the voluntary assent and signature of the wife to an alienation of the homestead "are not intended to interpose obstacles in the way of a conveyance of the homestead to the wife, or to the wife and children, with the consent and approval of the wife, whatever may be the form of such conveyance." Thomp. Homest. & Ex. § 473. And the adjudged cases fully support not only this text, but the conclusion we have arrived at, that such a conveyance is not an alienation of the homestead within the meaning of the constitution and statutes of Alabama, but is valid for the purpose of passing the legal title of the land into the wife, subject to all pre-existing homestead rights, without the voluntary signature and assent of the wife. Harsh v. Griffin, 72 Iowa, 608, 34 N. W. Rep. 441; Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 310, 20 Pac. Rep. 715; Riehl v. Bingenheimer, 28 Wis. 24; Baines v. Baker, 60 Tex. 140; Ruohs v. Hooke, 3 Lea, 302; Spoon v. Van Fossen, 53 Iowa, 494, 5 N. W. Rep. 624. The rulings of the trial court to which exceptions were reserved were made, are attempted to be sustained here, and could be sustained, only on the theory of the invalidity of Turner's deed to his wife. That theory being untenable, each of those rulings, it follows, was erroneous. The judgment of the circuit court is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded.

SAME v. MELVIN.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—REGULATION OF COMMERCE—TITLE OF ACT.

1. Act Feb. 18, 1891, entitled "An act to regulate the planting and taking of oysters in the waters of this state," which makes it unlawful for any person not a resident of the state to take or transport oysters from, in, or through any of the waters of the state, or for any person, whether a citizen of this state or of any other state or country, "to ship beyond the limits of this state any oysters taken from the waters of this state while the same are in the shells," etc., is not in contravention of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, subd. 3, as a regulation of interstate commerce.

2. Neither is the act subject to objections as containing subjects not clearly expressed in the title.

Appeal from city court of Mobile; O. J. SEMMES, Judge.

John C. Harrub and George Melvin were arrested for a violation of Act Feb. 18, 1891, to regulate the planting and taking of oysters, and, they being discharged on habeas corpus, the state appeals. Reversed.

This is an appeal by the city of Mobile from a judgment rendered by the judge of the city court of Mobile discharging the defendants upon a writ of habeas corpus. The ground upon which the court based its judgment is that so much of the "oyster law" as the defendants were charged with violating is unconstitutional. Harrub is a citizen of Alabama and Melvin is a citizen of Mississippi. The warrants of arrest and all the facts in the two cases are identical. The warrants charged that the defendant bought oysters that had been caught by a citizen of the state of Alabama, from the reefs of Alabama, and that he transported them in the shell into the state of Mississippi.

Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., and Gaylord B. Clark, for the State. Gregory L. & H. T. Smith and M. D. Wickersham, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. The defendants were arrested for a violation of the act of February 18, 1891, pp. 1072-1084, entitled "An act to regulate the planting and taking of oysters in the waters of this state." Upon habeas corpus proceedings the defendants were discharged, the court holding that the act of the legislature was unconstitutional and void as contravening subdivision 3, § 8, art. 1, of the constitution of the United States. Subdivision 3, § 8, art. 1, provides that congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes." Sections 1 and 2 of the act of the legislature under consideration read as follows: "Section 1. That the title to and property in all oysters in the waters of this state, whether upon public reefs or in so-called 'private beds,' or whether the same be transplanted by riparian proprietors under authority of law or otherwise, or whether the same be a growth from natural deposit, is and shall remain in the state until such title shall be divested in manner and form as herein authorized or provided. Sec. 2. That a license is hereby given to resident citizens of the state of Alabama to catch and take oysters, the property of the state, from the public reefs or from private beds planted and owned by them, or in which they have secured an interest or permission from the proprietor thereof to take such oysters, upon the terms and conditions and subject to the restrictions and regulations thereinafter set forth and enacted, but no person or persons not a resident of the state of Alabama is or shall be authorized to take or transport any such oysters from, in, or through any of the waters of the state of Alabama; and it is unlawful for any person, whether a citizen of the state of Alabama or of any other state or country, to ship beyond the limits of this state any oysters taken from the waters of this state while the same are in the shells: provided, that between the middle of December and the middle of January oysters in the shells may be shipped in barrels by railroad to other states: and provided, further, that such oysters in the shell may be shipped bona fide from any point in the state of Alabama to any other point in said state by the lines of transportation which lie partly within and partly without the state of Alabama: and provided, further, that any resident citizen of the state of Alabama who shall lawfully take any oysters from the tide-waters of this state, as in this act authorized, shall have a qualified interest or property in the oysters so lawfully taken while in the shell, which he may sell and transfer to any other person within the limits of the state of Alabama; and after said oysters have been shelled within the state of Alabama such lawful taker, or his assigns, as the case may be, shall be vested with all of the state's property and title in and to said oysters, and shall have the right to sell such oysters and shells, or ship the same beyond the limits of this state, without restriction or reservation: provided, further, that in case of any infringement of the foregoing qualified interest in said taker of oysters, said taker may, in his own name, maintain an action against the wrong-doer, either in case or trover, as may be proper; and in case of larceny or other public offense concerning such oysters while in the hands of a lawful taker, the ownership thereof shall be averred in such taker or possessor when by law it shall be necessary to aver ownership."

We deem it unnecessary to set out the whole act. The principles of law applicable to the facts of the cases before us do not call for a discussion or adjudication of that clause of section 2 which relates to the shipment of oysters in the barrel by railroad from the middle of December to the middle of January, or that clause which permits transportation by lines which lie partly within and partly without the state. Jones v. Black, 48 Ala. 540. The agreed facts are that the oysters were taken and shipped in the shell beyond the limits of the state by the defendants in the month of September in sailing-vessels; that Harrub was a citizen of Alabama and Melvin a citizen of the state of Mississippi; and that both were guilty of a violation of the statute. The question involved is as to the constitutionality of the act.

The first question we will consider is as to the extent of the ownership and control of the state of Alabama in and over the oyster-beds and oysters within her territorial limits. In the case of Martin v. Lessee of Waddell, 16 Pet. 411, Chief Justice TANEY declares as a general principle that "when the Revolution took place the people of each state became themselves sovereign, and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters, and the soils under them, for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the constitution to the general government." In the case of Smith v. Maryland, 18 How. 71, the question was as to the constitutionality of an act of the state of Maryland, which was an "act to prevent the destruction of oysters in the waters of this state." The court laid down this principle: "But this soil is held by the state not only subject to, but in some sense in trust for, the enjoyment of certain public rights, among which is the common liberty of taking fish, as well shell-fish as floating fish. The state holds the propriety of this soil for the conservation of the public rights of fishery thereon, and may regulate the modes of that enjoyment so as to prevent the destruction of the fishery. In other words, it may forbid all such acts as would render the public right less valuable or destroy it altogether. This power results from the ownership of the soil from the legislative jurisdiction of the state over it, and from its duty to preserve unimpaired those public uses for which the soil is held." In the case of McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, the foregoing principles were reaffirmed, and the court went further, and declared: "The title thus held is subject to the paramount right of navigation, the regulation of which, in respect to foreign and interstate commerce, has been granted to the United States. There has been, however, no such grant of power over the fisheries. These remain under the exclusive control of the state, which consequently has the right, in its discretion, to appropriate its tide-waters and their beds to be used by its people as a common for taking and cultivating fish, so far as may be done without obstructing navigation. Such an appropriation is in effect nothing more than a regulation of the use by the people of their common property. * * * It is in fact a property right, and not a mere privilege or immunity of citizenship. * * * It does not belong of right to the citizens of all free governments, but only to the citizens of Virginia. They, and they alone, owned the property to be used, and they alone had the power to dispose of it as they saw fit. * * * The state may, by appropriate legislation, confine the use of the whole to its own people alone." In the case of Haney v. Compton, 36 N. J. Law, 522, it was said: "But it cannot with any propriety be said that a statute which simply prohibits non-residents on board a vessel from subverting the soil of the state and carrying away her property, or that of her grantees, leaving such vessel to pass and repass, and go whithersoever those in charge of her may desire, is a regulation of commerce with foreign nations or among the states. It is a law for the protection of property,—at most an internal police regulation, entirely within the competency of the state to adopt, and it is not perceived that it can by possibility interfere with commerce in the senses in which that word is used in the federal constitution." In Manchester v. Massachusetts, 139 U. S. 259, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 559, the court reaffirmed the principle declared in the case of McCready v. Virginia, supra; and the same principle is announced in Dunham v. Lamphere, 3 Gray, 268.

We think it clearly established that the people of Alabama own absolutely the oyster-beds and oysters in question, and that it is a property right as complete and perfect as that held to any other property. As was said by Mr. Justice WAITE in McCready v. Virginia, supra, "the principle is not different from the planting of corn upon dry land." We think it further settled that the people of Alabama, through its legislature, alone have the power to dispose of their property rights in their oyster-beds and oysters, and if they see proper may dispose of them to their own people only. It is further settled that the legislature has ample authority to adopt all precautions and regulations deemed desirable or necessary for the preservation and increased production of its fisheries. That the power of congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes, is unlimited and exclusive of the power of the state, is settled law. Any statute of a state not authorized by congress which in any way obstructs or interrupts free navigation, or restricts or burdens any commodity which is an article of interstate commerce, must be declared null and void. Tiernan v. Rinker, 102 U. S. 125; Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460; Brimmer v. Rebman, 138 U. S. 78, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 213; Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 109, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 681. To constitute commerce there must be traffic and intercourse, and to constitute interstate commerce there must be traffic and interstate intercourse,—an "intermingling" between different states. As Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL says in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1: "Comprehensive as the word 'among' is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more states than one." "The completely internal commerce of a state may be considered as reserved to the state itself." We understand this great case to distinctly recognize the absolute power and control of the state upon such subjects within its territorial jurisdiction are not articles of foreign or interstate commerce. The case of Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475, decides an important principle as to the right of the state to tax its products, although the owner may intend them for exportation, and although they may be in process of preparation for exportation at the time of the assessment of the tax; but the case is important in the present connection in determining that "there must be a time when they (the products) cease to be governed exclusively by the domestic law, and begin to be governed and protected by the national law of commercial legislation." Quoting from the case of The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 565, as follows: "Whenever a commodity has begun to move as an article of trade from one state to another, commerce in that commodity between the states has commenced." But that movement, says the court, "does not begin until the article has been shipped or started for transportation from the one state to the other." Carrying it from the farm or forest to the depot is only an interior movement of the property, and, although it may be for the purpose of exportation, this is no part of the exportation itself. If the statute of Alabama under consideration militates against any of these well-established principles in regard to interstate commerce, it must yield to the dominant supremacy of the federal constitution. We do not understand the power vested in congress to regulate interstate commerce gives it power over domestic commerce, or authorizes it to regulate the commerce between the citizens of the same state or different parts of the same state. This power belongs to the several states, and is exclusive of the power of congress. If the state of Alabama should attempt, by legislation, to tax or burden or restrict the shipment of oysters from the state of Mississippi or other state, such legislation would be unconstitutional, or if the state of Alabama should attempt to impose similar or other conditions upon the shipment of any articles of interstate commerce from this state to another state, that would be an interference with the law of interstate commerce, which power alone is vested in congress. To constitute interstate commerce, however, as we have said, there must be an article or commodity the subject of commerce, and destined to pass from one state to another. These authorities do not militate but recognize the power of the state to confine the use of the oyster to its own citizens, and to regulate its shipment and disposition within its borders for their use. This would be domestic commerce as distinguished from interstate commerce. Neither do we understand the power of congress to regulate interstate commerce in any way interferes with or restricts the right of the state to prohibit its own property, to which it has an exclusive title, from becoming an article or commodity of interstate commerce. In the same line may be cited the case of Express Co. v. People, (Ill. Sup.) 24 N. E. Rep. 758. The statute of Illinois, for the protection of game, permitted the killing of game birds for two months in the year. The statute forbade the sale of the game birds at any other time, and made it unlawful, under a penalty, for any carrier or corporation knowingly to receive and transport or convey them beyond the state for sale. Under the act, at the proper time, a person was permitted to kill game for his own use, but not to go upon the market as an article of commerce. The constitutionality of the act was upheld, the court declaring: "The ownership was in the people of the state. This being so, it necessarily follows that the legislature had the right to permit persons to kill or take game upon such terms and conditions as its wisdom might dictate, and that the person killing game might have such property interest in it, and such only, as the legislature might confer. The legislature never conferred an absolute property in quail upon the person who might kill the same." It was held that the discretion of the legislature in making rules and regulations for the preservation and protection of the game birds was not subject to judicial control.

The property rights of the oyster being in the state exclusively, and the legislature having full authority to prohibit it from becoming an article of interstate commerce, and to reserve the oyster for the sole use of its own citizens, and to regulate the sale between its own citizens and between different parts of the state, the question arises, when does the oyster, under the statute, became an article of interstate commerce, and what provision of the statute attempts to burden, restrict, or control it after it has this character? The first section explicitly declares that "the title and property in all oysters in the waters of this state * * * shall be divested in manner and form as herein authorized and provided." That this is a valid enactment, under the principles of law declared in many of the foregoing decisions, cannot be questioned. The second section gives a license to resident citizens to catch and take oysters, the property of the state, and further enacts that "no person or persons not a resident of the state of Alabama is or shall be authorized to take or transport any such oysters from, in, or through any of the waters of the state of Alabama; and it is unlawful for any person, whether a citizen of the state of Alabama or of any other state or country, to ship beyond the limits of this state any oysters taken from the waters of this state while the same are in the shells, provided that between the middle of December and the middle of January oysters in the shell may be shipped in barrels by railroad to other states," etc. That the state has the right to license its own citizens to catch and take oysters, and to deny to citizens of another state the right to take and transport them, and absolutely to prohibit the shipment of oysters beyond the limits of the state, and to regulate the sale of them within its own limits, not imposing any conditions or burdens or restrictions upon the oyster as a commodity after it has entered another state, or after it may be legally delivered in this state for exportation to a common carrier or ways by which interstate commerce is effected, we think is clearly established by the following authorities: 36 N. J. Law, supra; The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557; Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1; McCready v. Virginia, supra; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6; 24 N. E. Rep. supra; Railroad Co. v. Pennsylvania, 15 Wall. 250. If the state has the power to prohibit the exportation of its oysters absolutely, a fortiori it may limit the shipment of such oysters to such as may have been shelled. If the legislature sees proper, as a means to prevent the exhaustion of its oyster-beds, to grant to the takers, who can only be resident citizens of the state, or their grantees within the state, such a qualified property right in the oyster as will permit its exportation only after it is shelled, where is the authority to judicially control this discretion, or what principle of the interstate commerce law is violated by such an enactment? The oyster is the absolute property of the state. It certainly has the power to prevent its becoming an article of interstate commerce. Until it becomes an article of interstate commerce congress has no authority or control in the premises. The state, by the statute itself, expressly retains the title to the oyster, and prohibits its shipment beyond the state until shelled. Only after it is shelled does the state relinquish its title, and the grantee, previously having but a qualified interest, becomes the absolute owner, and the oyster may then become an article of interstate commerce. When shelled, and the state has parted with its property rights, the state no longer interferes with the article. The owner ships it wherever he pleases and by whatsoever transportation he prefers. The statute nowhere interferes with or obstructs the sailing of the vessels. They can come and go when and whithersoever those in control see proper; but this did not authorize them to subvert the soil of Alabama, and to transport in September oysters in the shells from the reefs of Alabama to other states. The statute expressly prohibited it. The error in the argument of the defendants' counsel is in assuming that the oyster in the shell was an article of commerce, when in fact the taker, who could only be a citizen of the state, as we have seen, had but a qualified interest in the oyster, which he could dispose of only in the state. It would be unsound reasoning to hold that the state could prohibit absolutely the taking of its oysters, or confine the use of them exclusively to its own citizens, and yet could not prevent the taker from shipping them beyond the limits of the state. If the statute had undertaken to invest the taker or his grantee with a full and absolute property right and title to the oyster in the shell, so as to invest him with the power to convert it into an article of commerce, and had then undertaken to prevent its shipment, or burden its shipment with a tax, a different question might arise. That is not the case here. The state carefully guards against this condition, and it is only after being shelled can it be said that the oyster has become an article of interstate commerce. These conclusions are fully sustained by the reasonings and principles declared in the case of Kidd v. Pearson, supra, in which Mr. Justice LAMAR discusses at length and with great clearness the doctrine of interstate commerce, and the application of the principles stated in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, and Coe v. Errol, supra, and other cases cited above.

The policy of the legislature in making provision to keep the shells within the state might be based upon many considerations. However, this court is not called upon to adjudicate upon the policy of the legislature, and we will not consider this view further than to make the following citations from section 5, vol. 2, U. S. Com. Fish, etc., 564: "Besides being useful for making roads, streets, filling wharves and lowlands, and making lime, the shells are of great utility as stools for new oyster-beds, as experiments beginning fifty years ago have demonstrated. * * * These and other minor utilizations are disappearing, however, along the northern coast, through the increased value of the shells to spread on the bottom for the foundation of new colonies, as has been explained; and before long no doubt nearly all the shells accumulated will be saved by planters for this purpose as a better economy than to sell them." When tested by the rule declared in Ballentyne v. Wickersham, 75 Ala. 533, the statute is not obnoxious to the objections that it contains subjects not clearly expressed in the title. The rule, as there held, is, that it is "sufficient if they [the subjects] are all referable and cognate to the subject expressed" in the title. Our conclusion is that the act is not unconstitutional, and that the court erred in its judgment.

Reversed and remanded.

ESPALLA v. GOTTSCHALK et al.

FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER — WHEN LIES — DEFENSES.

1. Plaintiff's intestate, for many years prior to and at the time of his death, was in undisputed possession of premises under claim of right, during which time T. lived with him on said premises at intestate's request, without any claim of right as against intestate. A short time after intestate's death, while T. was in possession, defendant, claiming under a tax-title, went on the premises, and arranged with T. to hold the premises as his tenant, and afterwards put a co-tenant on the premises with T., who subsequently removed therefrom, leaving the co-tenant in possession. Held that, plaintiff having succeeded as administrator to intestate's right of possession, which related back to the time of testator's death, and T. being precluded from attorning to defendant, plaintiff could maintain an action for forcible and unlawful detainer.

2. Such action being based on an unlawful ouster of prior actual possession, defendant cannot defeat the same by setting up his tax-title; Code, 1886, § 3389, providing that in such action the merits of title cannot be inquired into.

Appeal from circuit court, Mobile county; W. E. CLARKE, Judge.

Action by Joseph Espalla, Jr., administrator, against William Gottschalk and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. Inge Smith, for appellant. Richard P. Deshon, for appellees.

STONE, C. J. This was an action of forcible and unlawful detainer, the complaint being framed in varying counts, to suit possible varying phases of the proof. The subject of the suit was a lot of ground and a tenement thereon. After the trial before a justice of the peace, an appeal was prosecuted to the circuit court, and verdict and judgment were there rendered for the defendant. There does not appear to have been any conflict in the testimony proving the following state of facts: Silas Holloway, plaintiff's intestate, died February 14, 1889. At that time, and for many years prior thereto, he had been in the undisputed possession of the land sued for, resided upon it, and claimed it as his own. His claim of title and possession dated back to February, 1882. "For many years prior, and up to, and at the time of, said Holloway's death, one Turner and his wife lived with him in the house on said premises as his friends, and by Holloway's invitation and request, without any claim or right of possession as against said Holloway." On February 16, 1889,—two days after Holloway's death,—Joseph Espalla, Jr., plaintiff in this suit, was appointed and qualified as special administrator of his estate. On March 13, 1889, the said Espalla received a general appointment as such administrator, and qualified as such. On the day of the special appointment, or the next day, Espalla repaired to the late residence of his intestate, and took possession of his personal effects, Turner and his wife aiding him. He also asserted possession of the realty, "and left said Turner and wife in possession of the same as plaintiff's tenants, on the understanding and on their agreement to hold the same as his tenants until further orders." There was testimony showing that between the time of the issue of the special and general letters of administration, and without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, Gottschalk went on the premises, and arranged with Turner and wife, by written lease, that they would hold and occupy the premises as his tenants. He subsequently placed another tenant on the premises with Turner and wife; and, they not agreeing, Turner and wife removed from the premises, leaving their co-tenant in possession. Subsequently Gottschalk placed Rogers in possession as his tenant. He (Rogers) was in possession when this suit was brought, and he is made a defendant with Gottschalk. There was testimony tending to show that Gottschalk's claim of title was as follows: The lands had been sold for taxes assessed against Holloway. Gottschalk became the purchaser, and he had received a tax-deed. There was also testimony tending to show that this purchase was made at the instance and as the friend of Holloway; that he (Holloway) had all the while claimed and occupied the land as his own, and had regularly given in and paid the taxes upon it since the sale. The court gave the jury the general charge to find for the defendants, if they believed the testimony. Letters of administration conferring general authority cannot be granted "until the expiration of fifteen days after the death of the intestate is known." Code 1886, § 2019. Special administration may be granted at any time after intestate's death. Section 2020. The powers of such special administrator are defined in the statute, and taking control of the real estate is not mentioned as one of them. The functions and powers of the special administrator cease when general administration is granted. Code, §§ 2021–2023. Special administration sometimes endures for a considerable time, and it may be that it is the duty of such special appointee to look after the real estate, and see that it is not subjected to spoliation or waste. This, under our statutory system, which commits the custody and control of the realty to the personal representative at his option, and makes it assets for the payment of debts. For reasons to be stated further on we consider it unnecessary to decide this question.

The fact, if it be such, that Gottschalk had acquired a title to the property by purchase at tax-sale, could exert no influence whatever in the trial of this case. "The estate or merits of the title cannot be inquired into." Code 1886, § 3389. Prior lawful possession, and its forceful disturbance, or unlawful subsequent interference with it, are the fundamental issues of fact on which the fate of such controversy must mainly depend. Welden v. Schlosser, 74 Ala. 355; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 505, §§ 5, 8; 2 Brick. Dig. p. 9, § 35. Gottschalk and his tenant, Rogers, must be treated in this case as if they, and each of them, were without title. Under our system a personal representative may sue and recover real estate on the title of him of whose estate he is the legal representative; and prior actual possession, until overcome by opposing proof, will maintain an action to regain the property against any one subsequently found in possession. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 325, § 47. "The personal representative has the right and capacity to maintain all suits necessary to recover possession of the land." Id. p. 465, § 157. It is settled by decisions of this court too numerous to be cited that to maintain the statutory proceeding resorted to in this case the plaintiff must have had the actual possession, and the defendant must have unlawfully ousted him, or unlawfully held over after the expiration of a temporary authority to occupy. Constructive possession is not enough. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 505, § 3. Does plaintiff's testimony make a case within this rule? There is no question that when Holloway, plaintiff's intestate, died, he was, and for years had been, in possession of the premises sued for, claiming title. Turner was there by his permission, a tenant by sufferance, holding in the right of and under Holloway. He was precluded, by the very nature of his holding, from setting up title adverse to Holloway; and if, while so holding, he had acquired a perfect title to the property from an outsider, he would have been estopped from setting it up until he first surrendered back the possession to Holloway Houston v. Farris, 71 Ala. 570; Norwood v. Kirby, 70 Ala. 397. And he could not, by any act of his, clothe another with rights he could not himself have asserted. If, standing towards each other as the testimony shows Holloway and Turner did, Holloway had removed from the premises, leaving Turner in possession, and Turner had then attorned to Gottschalk, accepting a lease from him, Holloway could have maintained unlawful detainer against Turner or Gottschalk, or against any one else who came in pursuant to and in virtue of the said attempted attornment from Turner to Gottschalk. It is necessarily true that death puts an end to all property ownership which had been in the decedent. A dead man cannot own property. It does not, however, abrogate the title. That continues, and passes at once to those on whom the law devolves it. It cannot be in abeyance. True, in cases of intestacy, there is for a time no known personal representative to assert the title; but when one is appointed his claim and right relate back to the moment of intestate's death. To the extent the law gives him title, or authorized control over decedent's estate, personal or real, to that extent the law dates that title and control back to the time when intestate breathed his last. Not the authority to sue or otherwise assert the right, for that is conferred by his appointment. It is the right which relates back, not the remedy for its enforcement. And that right exists, as the intestate left it by his death. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 463, § 130; Id. p. 464, § 139, 1 Brick. Dig. p. 932, § 262. Our statutes confer on the personal representative the authority to take possession of the realty, and to sue and recover it for the purposes of administration; and when he asserts the right it intercepts the descent, and dominates the right of the heir at law to enter. 1 Brick. Dig. p. 937, §§ 331, 332, 3 Brick. Dig. p. 465, § 152. The sum of our decisions is that "the personal representative has the right and capacity to maintain all suits necessary to recover possession from the heirs or alienee of the heirs." 3 Brick. Dig. p. 465, § 157. The doctrine of revivor applies to this form of action. Ridgeway v. Waugh, 51 Ala. 423. To apply these principles to this case: When Espalla was appointed administrator, he succeeded at once to all the rights and remedies of his intestate, if he elected to assert them, and that right related back to the moment of Holloway's death. If the plaintiff, Espalla, entered upon the land and let it to Turner, he did so as the administrator of Holloway, and in virtue of the authority his appointment conferred upon him. If that entry and letting were authorized by his appointment as special administrator, then he could have sued in his individual name, and could have counted on his personal possession. But the law did not require him to do so. He had the equal right to sue in his representative capacity, for his right was but the intestate's right and possession to which he had succeeded. Sims v. Boynton, 32 Ala. 353; Spear v. Lomax, 42 Ala. 576; Nicrosi v. Phillipi, 91 Ala. 299, 8 South. Rep. 561. It is clearly shown that if before Holloway's death he had been forcibly evicted, or his tenant had held over, he could have maintained forcible or unlawful detainer, and his tenant could not, by his attornment to another, confer a possession that could defeat that action. We hold that Espalla, by his appointment as administrator, is not to be regarded as in by constructive possession. He was thereby clothed with the possessory right and remedy of his intestate. The circuit court erred in the charge given. Reversed and remanded.

CREATION OF EASEMENT — STATUTE OF FRAUDS — ESTOPPEL — PART PERFORMANCE — PLEADING.

1. Defendant, the owner of a ferry, and land used as a landing, agreed with plaintiff orally that if he would buy a tract of land adjoining defendant, and conduct a warehouse thereon, and store defendant's freight free of charge, he (defendant) would never suffer any one to put up a warehouse on his land. Plaintiff, acting under this contract, bought the land, erected a warehouse, and stored defendant's freight free of charge for a number of years, after which defendant erected a warehouse on his own land, and ran the same in opposition to plaintiff. Held, in an action for relief, that the contract, purporting to create a servitude or easement on defendant's land, was void within the statute of frauds.

2. The fact that plaintiff performed the undertaking on his part to store defendant's freight would not estop defendant from availing himself of the statute, the contract being merely executory.

3. The effect of the statute on the validity of such parol contract was properly raised by a demurrer to plaintiff's bill.

Appeal from chancery court, Clarke county; THOMAS W. COLEMAN, Chancellor.

Action by Burrell A. Clanton against W. A. Scruggs and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. S. Anderson, for appellant. Wm. D. Dunn and Pillans, Torrey & Hanaw, for appellees.

WALKER, J. In 1881, a Mrs. Foster owned a tract of land in Clarke county, which included what is known as the "Coffeeville Warehouse and Landing Property on the Tombigbee River." William L. Scruggs, one of the defendants to the bill in this case, and an appellee here, owned a strip of land on the river adjoining and immediately below Mrs. Foster's tract, and on which was a public ferry, owned and conducted by him. Burrell A. Clanton, the complainant in the bill and the appellant here, proposed to Scruggs to join him in the purchase of Mrs. Foster's land, and in carrying on the warehouse business thereon. Scruggs declined this proposition, but, as alleged in the bill as amended, "said Scruggs said further, however, that he hoped orator would purchase the Coffeeville warehouse, and carry on the business. Said William L. Scruggs stated further to orator, as an inducement to his purchasing said Coffeeville warehouse and landing, that, if orator would purchase said warehouse and landing, and would store all of his (Scruggs') freight free of charge, and be responsible for it just as if he was paid storage, that he would promise orator that he never would put up a warehouse on his little strip of land immediately below Coffeeville landing himself, and he would never suffer any one else to put up a warehouse on said land. Orator then told said defendant Scruggs that this arrangement was entirely satisfactory to him, that he accepted it, and that he would carry it out." It is shown by the bill as amended that the complainant, acting under this contract and agreement with Scruggs, very shortly thereafter purchased Mrs. Foster's tract of land, erected a new warehouse and other improvements thereon, and from February, 1882, carried on there the warehouse business, and received and stored freight for Scruggs free of charge, as provided by the agreement with him; that the agreement with Scruggs was a great part of the inducement to the complainant for the undertaking. It is further shown by the amended bill that in 1887 Scruggs permitted his son and son-in-law, who are parties defendant, and were fully aware of the agreement above mentioned, to erect a warehouse on his land referred to in the agreement, and they are conducting a warehouse business therein in opposition to the business of the complainant. The purpose of the bill is to have the defendants restrained from conducting the warehouse business on the land of Scruggs above mentioned. It is charged that the conduct of that business causes irreparable injury to the business of the complainant. The demurrers to the bill as amended were sustained, and, the complainant declining to amend his bill further, it was dismissed.

It clearly appears from the averments of the bill as amended that the alleged agreement between the complainant and W. L. Scruggs was oral, and was not evidenced by any writing. That being the case, the question of the effect of the statute of frauds upon the validity of the contract is properly raised by a demurrer. A privilege which the proprietor of one tenement has, in respect to a neighboring tenement, to require the owner of the latter or servient tenement to suffer to be done or to abstain from doing something on his own lands for the benefit or advantage of the owner or proprietor of the former or dominant tenement, is an easement or servitude. A common form of such an easement or servitude is the prohibition of the proprietor of the servient estate from erecting or permitting the erection of a certain character of structure thereon, or from carrying on, or permitting to be carried on, a particular kind of business or occupation thereon. McMahon v. Williams, 79 Ala. 288. The right of the dominant owner, in such case, is an interest in the servient estate; and a contract for the sale of such an interest is a contract for the sale of an interest in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, within the meaning of the provision of the statute of frauds on this subject. Code, § 1732; Riddle v. Brown, 20 Ala. 412; 6 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 143. There is no pretense in this case that Clanton was in any way put in possession of the land of Scruggs in which he claims an interest as the beneficiary of an easement. There having been no writing at all in reference to the matter, and the purchaser not having been put in possession by the seller, the alleged agreement was void under the statute of frauds. The facts that the complainant has performed and continues to perform the undertaking on his part to store Scruggs' freight free of charge, and to be responsible for it just as if he were paid storage, and that Scruggs has accepted the benefit of this stipulation in his favor, cannot have effect to take the alleged agreement out of the influence of the statute of frauds, or to estop Scruggs from availing himself of the protection of that statute. An essential element of an estoppel in pais is a false representation, or a concealment of material facts, upon which another has been induced to act to his prejudice. The representation or concealment must, in all ordinary cases, have reference to past or present facts. A mere promise of something to be done in the future is not such a representation or concealment. One's failure to perform a promise is a very different thing from his denial of a state of facts which he had previously held out as in existence. The rule which precludes a person from claiming that the facts of a matter are different from what he represented them to be to another, who has acted on the faith of his former statements, is not to be applied to prevent a party from setting up the invalidity of a mere executory contract. One party to an invalid executory agreement is not entitled to hold the other party to the agreement just as if it had been originally valid, because the latter has received the benefit of a part performance by the former. The fact that one of the parties to such an agreement has acted on the faith of its validity does not raise up an estoppel against the other party to deny that it is binding on him. A mere breach of promise cannot constitute an estoppel in pais. Weaver v. Bell, 87 Ala. 385, 6 South. Rep. 298; Starry v. Korab, 65 Iowa, 267, 21 N. W. Rep. 600; Jackson v Allen, 120 Mass. 64; Langan v. Sankey, 55 Iowa, 52, 7 N. W. Rep. 393. If the promise is made fraudulently, and is not meant to be kept, it is not denied that this circumstance might introduce an element of estoppel into the transaction. Bigelow, Estop. (5th Ed.) 576. This question, however, is not decided, as there is no such feature in the present case. There is no allegation of fraud on the part of Scruggs, or that at the time of his alleged promise he did not intend to perform it. The case made by the bill is simply that of an executory contract, which cannot be enforced, because it is void under the statute of frauds. In Weaver v. Bell, supra, it was said: "A representation, relating to future action or conduct, operates as an estoppel only when it has reference to the future relinquishment or subordination of an existing right, which is made to induce, and by which the party to whom it was addressed was induced, to act." The representation there referred to does not include a mere promise to do or to refrain from doing something in the future. It could not have been intended to assert that an invalid executory agreement may be made binding by means of an estoppel resulting from the fact that one of the parties has acted on the faith of its validity. It is true that a disavowal of a present right, which might otherwise be asserted in the future, may be treated as the representation of an existing state of fact. But an executory agreement which is void under the statute of frauds cannot be made effectual by estoppel merely because it has been acted on by the promisee, and has not been performed by the promisor. Brightman v. Hicks, 108 Mass. 246. Such a rule of estoppel would take the sting out of the statute of frauds, and defeat its manifest purpose. The amended bill in this case shows that the alleged right upon which the complainant relies as the basis of his claim to relief depends upon an executory agreement which was within the statute of frauds, and that the provisions of that statute were not conformed to in the making of the agreement. The grounds of demurrer suggesting the invalidity of the agreement because of such non-conformity were properly sustained. Affirmed.

RIST v. HARTNER. (No. 11,002.)

TUTOR AND WARD—ACCOUNTING—RESCISSION OF CONTRACT—TENDER AS CONDITION PRECEDENT—EQUITY—RECONVENTION.

1. Tender, as a condition precedent to the institution of a suit to annul a settlement or contract, under which money passed from the defendant to the plaintiff, may be executed where contractual relations could legally exist between them; but it cannot be required from a minor by a tutor, sued for an account, between whom no such relations existed.

2. It is only after an account has been rendered and adjusted, accompanied by vouchers, by the tutor to the minors, as required by article 361 of the Code, that the fiduciary relations between them really cease.

3. In an action by a minor, who has become of age, brought within four years after his majority, for an account from his tutor, in which a previous settlement or contract between them is attacked, as made in violation of law, and under charges of disguise and concealment by the tutor, and averment of the minor's ignorance of the true condition of things at the time, the plea of tender by the tutor from the minor of the money received by the latter under the settlement is inadmissible as a condition precedent to suit.

4. All that equity requires in such a case is that the tutor be permitted to claim the amount in reconvention.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of East Feliciana; F. D. BRAME, Judge.

Suit by August Rist against W. H. Hartner, tutor, for an account of tutorship. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. F. Kernan, for appellant. Wedge, Kilbourne & Stone, for appellee.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. The plaintiff brought this suit, within four years after reaching his majority, against the defendant, for an account of tutorship. The defense is that a settlement has been effected, under which a sum of money was paid to the plaintiff, who has receipted therefor, and that, before the defendant can be called upon for an account, the plaintiff must pay over to him the amount which thus passed. The plaintiff thereupon filed a supplemental petition, in which he attacked the alleged settlement, and sought its nullity. Judgment having been rendered, sustaining in part the defense of want of tender to the dissatisfaction of both litigants, the plaintiff appeals, the defendant asking here an increase of the amount required to be tendered. It will not do to say that the plaintiff cannot in the same breath seek the nullity of the settlement and claim to be entitled to retain the amount received under it until a final adjustment of the differences between him and the defendant, and that the settlement is his title to the money, and, if that title is bad, he has no right under it to the money, although he may be entitled to recover a larger amount in the end from the defendant. Defenses of this description can be set up and urged by a party against another when contractual relations could have existed, and did exist, in reference to the transaction involved; but they are not admissible on the part of one who occupied fiduciary relations with the claimant, and who could have no contractual relations with him before the occurrence of a certain determinate event. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1790. This is an action by a minor, who has become of age, against one who admittedly was his tutor, and who occupied, therefore, a fiduciary position as to him. The law expressly declares that every agreement which may take place between the tutor and such minor shall be null and void, unless the same was entered into after the rendition of a full account and delivery of the vouchers, the whole being made to appear by the receipt of the person to whom the account was rendered, 10 days previous to the agreement. Rev. Civil Code, art. 361. The jurisprudence is in accord with this wise provision. Harty v. Harty, 2 La. 523; White v. Gleason, 15 La. Ann. 479; Vanwickle v Matta, 16 La. Ann. 325; Succession of Croizet, 12 La. Ann. 401; Chapman v. Chapman, 13 La. Ann. 228; Harris v. Keigler, 25 La. Ann. 471; Neilson v. Neilson, Id. 529. It is therefore clear that such an account is a condition precedent for the validity of any agreement between them, in whatever form it may have been entered into, whether by settlement or otherwise. This is a matter of proof which is decisive of the validity of the agreement. It is not until after such an account has been rendered and adjusted that the fiduciary relations between tutor and pupil really cease. There is no evidence here that such an account was rendered previous to the alleged settlement, which is treated on its face as a "contract." In cases presented for judicial determination, in which minors have sued tutors for an account, attacked purchases of their property by administrators, and settlements made in error, and while they (the minors) were in ignorance of their rights under undisclosed or concealed facts, and in which the plea of tender had been set up as a condition precedent, it has been held that it was not to be demanded. Tutorship of Hacket, 4 Rob. (La.) 290; Wood v. Nicholls, 33 La. Ann. 744; Heirs of Burney v. Ludeling, 41 La.

Ann. 632, 6 South. Rep. 248. All that equity requires in such cases is to permit the defendant to claim the amount in reconvention. Under the circumstances of this case, the plaintiff should not have been held to a tender as a condition precedent to action. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment of the lower court be reversed and avoided, and that the plea of tender be overruled. It is besides ordered that the case be remanded for further proceedings according to law; the defendant and appellee to pay the costs of appeal, as well as those of the lower court, incurred subsequent to the filing of the supplemental petition.

PURCHASE BY TUTOR OF WARD'S PROPERTY—ACTION BY WARD—PLEADING—RATIFICATION.

1. The plea of prematurity cannot be successfully set up by a tutor who has acquired real estate in his official name, with due authority for account of his wards, when sued by one of them to be recognized as owner of an undivided part of the same.

2. The sale made by him, at private sale, under advice of a family meeting, to a third party, who fails to pay the price, which was on credit, and who transferred the property to him in his individual name, and not as tutor, cannot be said to have been ratified from the fact that, under a settlement alleged to have taken place between him and the minor, a sum of money has passed to the latter, unless it is shown that this was preceded by an account and delivery of vouchers, as required by article 361 of the Revised Civil Code, and that the minor knew of the infecting radical vices which contaminated the act, and yet voluntarily cured the nullities.

3. The plea of tender of such sum as a condition precedent to a suit against the purchaser and the tutor for the nullity of the sale and revendication of the property is not well founded.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of East Feliciana; F. D. BRAME, Judge.

Action by August Rist against W. H. Hartner and others for a share of certain real estate, including the rents and profits. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new judgment ordered.

W. F. Kernan, for appellant. Wedge, Kilbourne & Stone, for appellees.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This is a petitory action for a share of certain real estate, including a demand for rents and revenues. It is brought by a minor, who has become of age, in his own name, as heir of his mother, and also as heir of a sister. It is directed against a tutor, Hartner who, under the advice of a family meeting, had bought it for account of the minors, whose tutor he was, and one of whom was the plaintiff. Hartner subsequently sold it to a third party—Schutzman—at private sale, and acquired it back from that party in his individual name. It is also directed against that party for rents and revenues. The prayer is for the nullity of both sales, and for the rents and revenues. The defendant Hartner pleaded a settlement by him with the plaintiff, which cannot be assailed collaterally, by which the plaintiff ratified the sale attacked; a want of tender of the amount received by plaintiff—$888.73—under that settlement; and prematurity of the action, which cannot be brought before a liquidation of the succession of plaintiff's mother, which is still under administration. The other defendant, Schutzman, besides urges a demand for the value of repairs and improvements made in good faith by him on the property, and that plaintiff cannot maintain this action without first tendering the amounts expended. There was judgment holding that plaintiff should have made a tender of $300.25 only, and for not having done so, dismissing his suit. From the judgment, the plaintiff appeals, and a prayer is made that the amount to be required as a tender be raised to that demanded below,—$888.73.

The record shows that the defendant, in 1875, on the advice of a family meeting, purchased for account of the three minors of Mrs. Rist, whose tutor he was, a plantation and a home residence, and that he did so, taking the title in his capacity of tutor; that in 1879, on a similar advice, he sold it at private sale to one Schutzman, who, failing to pay for it, transferred it to Hartner in his individual name, and that it thus stands yet. It appears that a settlement was made between the plaintiff and the defendant after his majority, and it is claimed that it proves that plaintiff knowingly ratified the sale to Schutzman, taking in place of the plantation and the residence the sum of $869.23, and a judgment for $19.50, both amounting to the estimated value of his interest therein. The defenses of prematurity, tender, and ratification will be considered in their regular order.

That of prematurity cannot hold. It does not lie in the mouth of the tutor, when sued by the minor, of age, to recover from him property acquired by him as tutor, for account of the minor from the succession of the latter's mother, to say that her succession has not been fully administered; that it owes debts, and is insolvent. The purchase placed the real estate in the name of the minors, in whom the title vested, and has continued until legally alienated in their name or by themselves. It is clear that one in whose official name as tutor property stands as belonging to his wards is estopped from denying their right to it, and cannot urge the plea of prematurity set up. Heirs of Burney v. Ludeling, 41 La. Ann. 632, 6 South. Rep. 248. The final liquidation of the succession of Mrs. Rist is not a condition precedent for the validity of the sale of her property at succession sale, which rests on adjudication to the purchaser, even though the price be not paid, and the sale is to an heir. In that case the remedy should be either a nullity of the sale or the payment of the price, if due, in specific performance.

The plea of tender is not maintainable. The sale by Hartner to Schutzman, although made with the advice of a family meeting, was made by private contract; not after adjudication, preceded by advertisement. The sale was a nullity, and did not divest the minors of their title to the property, which could not be transferred unless after compliance with legal exigencies. The price of adjudication to Hartner, as tutor, was not paid. It remained due, subject to a final settlement with the mother's succession. Heirs can purchase that way, in successions in which they inherit. The sale from Hartner, tutor, to Schutzman was made entirely on credit. No money passed from the purchaser to the vendor, and the minors cannot be said to have received any consideration, even indirectly. The sale or the transfer by Schutzman to Hartner is in the latter's name individually, and purports to have been made for cash, acknowledged, paid, and received; but this payment must not be considered as a reality. In their brief, counsel for appellees say that Schutzman, failing to pay for the property, transferred it back to Hartner individually. Surely, as Hartner, tutor, received nothing from Schutzman, it cannot be conceived how the minors can be asked to make any tender if the plea refers to the price of that sale, which it possibly does not. It certainly first relates to the amount received by plaintiff under the alleged agreement averred by Hartner; and, second, to the value of the improvements and repairs claimed by Schutzman. In the just decided case of the same plaintiff against the same defendant (No. 11,002, 10 South. Rep. 759) for an account of tutorship, a plea of tender for the $300.25, said to have been received under the settlement, it has been held that tender could not be required. For the reason there given the same ruling must be made here, as that sum forms part of the $888.73 which, it is insisted, should have been offered before suit.

In relation to the plea of want of tender for the difference, which the lower court declined to require, but which is asked by answer to the appeal, and likewise touching defense of ratification, it suffices to say that, if the amount was received as alleged, it cannot be considered prima facie as paid in settlement of the sales by Hartner to Schutzman and by the latter to the former, for the obvious reasons that it could have been only an agreement or contract between the tutor and the minor, not preceded by the account required by article 361, Rev. Civil Code, and therefore a nullity; and that the very sale claimed to have been ratified was subsequently set at naught by Schutzman, and his ostensible title annulled. The evidence does not show that if the amount was paid by Hartner to plaintiff in settlement of his rights in and to the property, or as a purchase price of the same, it was understood in that light by the plaintiff, who may have treated it as an adjustment and liquidation of other business accounts. The testimony explanatory of the receipt preponderates the other way, and establishes the reverse of the pretensions. The ratification of a transaction which is a nullity is a recognitive and confirmative act, and cannot be successfully pressed, unless it is shown to have taken place with a full knowledge of the circumstances of a formal intention to cure the radical vice contaminating it, and with which it is infected, by an unreserved sanction and approval.

The plaintiff does not urge, on appeal, error in the dismissal of his claim for rents and revenues against Schutzman, and the latter does not insist on his for improvement and repairs. Both may be considered as abandoned, but without prejudice to their rights, if any, to demand the same in another proceeding. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be reversed and annulled, and it is now ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff be recognized as owner of the undivided five-twelfths of the property described in the petition, without prejudice to the rights of either and all of the parties to set up and urge any claim not herein passed upon, touching which the same are reversed; the costs of the lower court and those on appeal to be paid, share and share alike, by the defendants.

STATE v. GUILLORY. (No. 10,953.)

GRAND JURORS—COMPETENCY—NATURALIZATION—PROOF.

1. The competency of grand jurors is presumed, and those who attack it must show good cause of disqualification. A man who came to this country with his father when a child; whose father, now dead, told him he was naturalized, and voted as a citizen; who has himself exercised the rights of a citizen in the parish without question for 30 years,—is not to be declared disqualified because he cannot produce his father's naturalization papers, and, owing to his father's residence in several states, does not know where to find the judicial record thereof.

2. Objections to failure of judge to open a note of evidence on basis for introduction of a confession is disposed of by State v. McCarthy, (La.) 10 South. Rep. 673, this day rendered.

3. The other bills are without merit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. Landry; E. T. LEWIS, Judge.

Indictment against Oscar Guillory. From the judgment defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. P. Veazie and Laurent Dupre, for appellant. W. H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

FENNER, J. The first bill of exceptions is taken to the ruling of the judge in overruling a motion to quash the indictment based on the charge that a member of the grand jury who found the bill was incompetent by reason of alienage. It appears that the juror objected to was born in Ireland, and moved to this country with his parents many years ago, when only 12 years of age. He had been told by his father that he (the father) had been naturalized, and knew that his father was a voter in the state of Kentucky before his death. His father had lived in several states, and he did not know when or where he was naturalized, and had no proof thereof other than his father's statement. The juror had lived in the parish for 30 years, had always considered himself as a citizen, and as such had voted and served on grand and petit juries without question. No such question would probably have arisen in this case but for the fact that the juror was prosecuting a claim for homestead from the United States, in the course of which it became necessary for him to prove his citizenship; and, having no copy of his father's naturalization papers, and not knowing when or where they were taken out, he concluded his simplest course was to become naturalized himself, for which purpose he made application to the court and obtained his papers. This occurred after he had been drawn on the venire, but nearly two months before he was impaneled or served as a grand juror. There is no question that at the time when he was impaneled and served as a grand juror he was in every respect fully qualified, and we think the presumption is overwhelming that he was qualified before the drawing. A man who has come to this country with his parents, as a child, who has been told by his father that he was naturalized, and who has seen his father voting as a citizen, who has himself always exercised his rights as a citizen in the same place for 30 years, without question is entitled to every presumption in favor of his citizenship, and is not to be declared disqualified because he cannot produce his father's naturalization papers, and, owing to his father's having resided in several states, does not know where to find the judicial record of them. "When grand jurors are duly drawn and appear upon the summons of the sheriff by virtue of his writ, they are presumed to be good and lawful men, in all respects legally qualified. It is only upon good cause shown, by a party having the right to question the qualifications of the individual juror, that he will be set aside for incompetency." Thomp. & M. Juries, No. 563; Thayer v. People, 2 Doug. (Mich.) 417; State v. Haynes, 54 Iowa, 109, 6 N. W. Rep. 156; Minor v. State, 63 Ga. 318. We think no such good cause is shown in this case, the evidence raising a strong presumption that the juror was qualified when he was drawn, and making it certain that he was qualified when he was impaneled and served.

The other bills have no merit. One of them, based on the failure of the judge to take a note of evidence as to the basis laid for admitting a confession of defendant, is covered by our decision rendered this day in State v. McCarthy, 10 South. Rep. 673. Another, based on refusal to admit evidence of prior threats, in absence of any overt act at the time, is disposed of by many authorities sustaining the judge's action. The rest need no mention. Judgment affirmed.

ON REHEARING.

This application is based on the failure of the judge to incorporate in his sentence the provisions for commutation of term embodied in Act No. 12 of 1890.

We can take no notice of this alleged error, because the record contains no reference to any application to, or action by, the judge on the subject, and no assignment of such error, in any form, was made before the actual decision of the cause. If the applicant is entitled to relief, he must seek it elsewhere. Rehearing refused.

HOBSON et al. v. PEAKE. (No. 10,993.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DUE PROCESS—SERVICE OF SUMMONS—ABSENT DEFENDANT—UNNECESSARY ADMINISTRATION—PURCHASE BY AGENT—COMPENSATION.

1. Where a succession owes no debts, and has been unconditionally accepted by the heirs, who are in actual possession of the estate, through an agent duly authorized, an administration is unnecessary and illegal; and when such proceedings are carried on with the full knowledge of the agent of the absent heirs, who himself becomes a purchaser at a sale made therein, such a sale, so far as that purchaser himself is concerned, is a nullity so absolute that it could furnish, in his favor, no basis for any prescription save that of 30 years.

2. A proceeding in a personal action against absent defendants by substituted service through a curator ad hoc, unaccompanied by any seizure of property, is not "due process of law," and the judgment and sale thereunder are absolute nullities. The case is not affected by the fact that such a proceeding had been recognized as valid by prior decisions of this court, especially when, prior to the date of the proceeding, the supreme court of the United States had repeatedly condemned such proceedings as not "due process" under the constitution of the United States.

3. An agent who has misconducted himself in the business of his agency, and who has engaged in illegal transactions, by which he acquires interests adverse to those of his principals, and whose services, as a whole, have resulted in injury to his principals, cannot, under a quantum meruit, claim compensation for his services.

4. Defendant ceased to be agent from the date of his purchases, and became a possessor, for his own account, and in bad faith. As such he is bound to account for the revenues, and entitled to recover only his expenses necessary for the preservation of the property, such as taxes, and his useful improvements only to the extent to which they have enhanced the value of the property.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Pointe Coupee; ROBERT SEMPLE, Judge.

Suit by J. B. Hobson and others against Glenn D. Peake to recover land. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

O. O. & A. Provosty, for appellants. Yoist & Claiborne, for appellee.

FENNER, J. Dr. Jesse Beaty, a resident of South Carolina, died before the war, leaving to his two brothers, Samuel Beaty and Robert Beaty, Sr., and to his two sisters, Patsy and Margaret A. Beaty, his property in the state of Louisiana, consisting of three plantations, known as "West Oaks," in the parish of Iberville, and the "McCrea" and "McKneely" places in the parish of Pointe Coupee. The heirs accepted his succession purely and simply, and took possession of the estate, through their duly-appointed agent, Robert McBeth, who promptly came to Louisiana, and sold the plantations for large prices, paid partly in cash and partly in mortgage notes with vendor's privilege. After the war, the heirs sent the present defendant, Glenn D. Peake, as their agent, to visit Louisiana, and look after these mortgage claims. He came here, and, after collecting what he could, foreclosed the mortgages, and obtained the retrocession of the McCrea and McKneely places, with which we are alone concerned, to the heirs. Samuel Beaty died in 1870, Patsy Beaty in 1872, and Margaret A. Beaty in 1885. The plaintiffs in this suit are heirs of said Samuel, Patsy, and Margaret A. Beaty, in certain proportions, fully set out in their petition, and this is formally admitted in the record. At the death of Samuel Beaty, his heirs accepted and took actual possession of his estate in Louisiana through their agent, Glenn D. Peake, the defendant. The defendant continued to act as the agent, with the broadest powers, of the plaintiffs and their ancestors, until the year 1882, at which date the results of his agency, according to his own showing, were summed up as follows: The West Oaks plantation in the parish of Iberville had been sold for more than $6,000, and the proceeds, together with the revenues of all the property, amounting to about $2,000, and also a further sum of $2,900 collected in cash, had all been absorbed by the expenses of the agency. The defendant was owner of the McCrea and McKneely places. The plaintiff heirs had not a cent's worth of property left in Louisiana, and were, besides, indebted to defendant in a considerable balance for expenses of his agency. The plaintiffs seem to have lived in ignorance of the details of these transactions until not long prior to the institution of this suit, when they employed an attorney to investigate them, and, as a result of the information thus obtained, they bring the present suit, in which they claim the nullity of the titles of Peake to their interests in the McCrea and McKneely plantations, together with an account of their rents and revenues.

Peake's title to one-fourth of the McCrea plantation, belonging to the heirs of Samuel Beaty, rests upon a sale made in a succession proceeding under the following undisputed circumstances: Samuel Beaty died in 1867. His heirs had accepted his succession unconditionally, and had taken actual possession of the property, and held the same through their agent, the defendant. The succession owed no debts. Nevertheless, in 1874, the public administrator applied for the administration of the succession of Samuel Beaty, simply alleging his death; that his heirs were absent and unrepresented; that he owned land in the parish; and that an administration was necessary. Under this proceeding an order of sale was obtained, and the property was sold and adjudicated to Glenn D. Peake, the defendant. The evidence shows that the public administrator acted with the full knowledge, if not at the suggestion, of Peake. Peake knew, better than any one else, that the succession of Samuel Beaty had been unconditionally accepted, and was in actual possession of the heirs; that the succession owed no debts; and that the heirs, so far from being unrepresented in this state, were fully represented by him as their duly-authorized agent, then present in the state. It seems superfluous to cite authorities to support the proposition that such a sale, in such a succession proceeding, to such a purchaser, is a nullity so absolute—so far at least as that purchaser himself is concerned—that it gave him no shadow of title, and could furnish, in his favor, no basis for any prescription short of 30 years. The judge so held, and, beyond doubt, correctly. The balance of the property claimed by plaintiffs is held by Peake under a title derived from a judicial sale made under a judgment rendered in 1882 in a suit brought by Glenn D. Peake against the present plaintiffs and other heirs. This suit was brought for a balance alleged to be due to him for his services and expenses as agent. Although Peake was a resident of South Carolina, and a near neighbor of his principals, he came to Louisiana to bring this suit against them, without giving them any notice thereof. It was a purely personal action. The defendants were all non-residents of the state. They were not cited, but were assumed to be brought into court through a curator ad hoc, who was appointed to represent them. They never appeared or answered. There was no attachment or other seizure of property before judgment. Under the repeated adjudications both of the supreme court of the United States and of this court, such a proceeding is not "due process of law," and the judgment and sale founded thereon are absolute nullities. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714; Harkness v. Hyde, 98 U. S. 478; Brooklyn v. Insurance Co., 99 U. S. 362; Laughlin v. Ice Co., 35 La. Ann. 1184; Duruty v. Musacchia, 42 La. Ann. 357, 7 South. Rep. 555. An attempt is made to charge plaintiffs with notice of this proceeding, and with an authorization of the curator ad hoc to represent them personally. The charge is not sustained by satisfactory evidence, and the evidence was, besides, improperly admitted, and was without avail to remedy the defect of citation or appearance as shown by the record. Harris v. Alexander, 1 Rob. (La.) 30; Le Blanc v. Perroux, 21 La. Ann. 27; Gliddon v. Goos, Id. 682; Nolan v. Babin, 12 Rob. (La.) 531. There was no citation except on the curator ad hoc, and no appearance by him except in the unqualified capacity of curator ad hoc, and his fee as such curator was taxed and paid as part of the costs. The record must speak for itself, and its radical defects prior to judgment cannot be supplied or cured by parol. Adams v. Basile, 35 La. Ann. 101. The judge a qua declined to annul this judgment on two grounds, viz.: First, that the suit partook of the nature of a proceeding in rem, for which ground there is not the shadow of foundation; second, that the proceeding had been taken in conformity to prior jurisprudence of this state, which had recognized the validity of substituted service on non-residents who had property in the state, without any seizure of the property itself. In this there is no force. Without intimating that it could avail under any circumstances, it is sufficient for the purpose of this case to say that the decisions of the supreme court of the United States in the cases above cited from 95, 98, and 99 U. S. had all been rendered years before this action was brought. Those decisions were based on the constitution of the United States, and involved questions purely federal in their nature, upon which the decisions of the federal supreme court were authoritative and paramount. On such questions the decisions of that court, and not of this, settle the jurisprudence and the law. When the same questions afterwards came before this court, we had nothing to do but to follow those paramount precedents. It follows that the judgment and the sale thereunder must be decreed to be absolute nullities.

It remains to adjust the counter-claims between the parties for revenues, expenses, improvements, etc. Defendant's claim on his agency account up to 1882, on which his pretended suit in that year was brought, must be rejected. We need not determine the plea of its prescription, which presents questions not free from doubt, because, on its merits, the account gives rise to no just claim against these plaintiffs. That account shows cash collections by defendant amounting to nearly $11,000,—far more than sufficient to pay all the necessary and useful expenses as recited in the account. The difference for which the suit of 1882 was brought is made up of $8,000, charged for the agent's personal services over and above his expenses. This claim is based on no contract, and must be determined according to the quantum meruit. When we consider the conduct of this agent with reference to the two judicial proceedings above referred to, his illegal and unwarrantable attempt to divest his principals of their property in his own favor, and the result of his services as exhibited in the summing up made at the beginning of this opinion, the question, as to such services, quantum meruit, can receive from a court of justice but one answer,—nihil. "Where an agent is unfaithful to his trust, and abuses the confidence reposed in him by his principal, or where he misconducts himself in the business of the agency, or where he engages in transactions by which he acquires interests adverse to the interests of his principals, he may be deprived of commission and compensation." 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 397, and numerous authorities there cited. We have no desire to criticise the conduct of Mr. Peake with undue severity. He may have acted on bad advice; he may have satisfied himself of the propriety of his course; but the law condemns his conduct as utterly inconsistent with that uberrima fides which should characterize the relations of an agent to his absent principals.

From the date of his respective purchases Peake held the property not as agent, but as possessor, for his own account. We are bound to hold that he was possessor in bad faith, under Rev. Civil Code, art. 3452, as one "who possesses as master, but who assumes this quality when he well knows that he has no title to the thing, or that his title is vicious and defective." Charged, as Peake is, with actual knowledge of the facts, and with conclusively presumed knowledge of the law, he was bound to know the nullity of his titles. As possessor in bad faith, he is bound to account for the revenues, and is entitled to recover expenses necessary to the preservation of the thing, such as taxes, and also for useful improvements, but only to the extent to which they have enhanced the value of the property. These latter rights repose on no text of the Code, but on the great equitable principle which prevents one from enriching himself gratuitously at the expense of another. Pearce v. Frantum, 16 La. 414; Baillio v. Burney, 3 Rob. (La.) 319; Williams v. Booker, 12 Rob. (La.) 254; Gibson v. Hutchins, 12 La. Ann. 545. All matters prior to 1882 are settled by our decision as to the agency account.

Nothing remains but to determine—First, the amount of revenues from that date; second, the taxes paid from that date; third, the useful improvements, and the extent to which they have actually enhanced the value of the property. These questions were not passed upon in the court below, and we have striven in vain to reach a satisfactory conclusion from the evidence in the record. That evidence does not define with exactness the date and character of the improvements made, and the defendant's answer does not even specify them; and the evidence is not directed to the only pertinent question, viz., the enhancement of value. We shall make our decree final as to the recovery of the property, but will remand the case for further proceedings with reference to the adjustment of the matters just referred to. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided, and reversed; and it is now adjudged and decreed that the sale made in the succession of Samuel Beaty, and the judgment and sale in the suit of Glenn D. Peake v. Margaret A. Young et al., be, and they are hereby, decreed to be null and void in so far as they affect the plaintiffs in this cause; that the said plaintiffs be decreed to be the owners of the property described in the petition, and known as the "McCrea Place" and the "McKneely Place," in the proportions in which they inherit the same from Samuel Beaty, Patsy Beaty, and Margaret A. Young, as set forth in the petition, and that Glenn D. Peake, defendant, be condemned to restore the same to plaintiffs; and it is further ordered that this cause be remanded to the lower court for further proceedings according to law for the determination of the rights of the parties as to rents, taxes, and improvements according to the views expressed in this opinion; defendant to pay costs in both courts.

REILEY v. HIS CREDITORS. (No. 11,000.)

APPEAL FROM INTERLOCUTORY ORDER—INSOLVENCY—CONSOLIDATION OF ACTIONS.

1. A devolutive appeal lies from an interlocutory decree consolidating the proceedings in a surrender made by a commercial partner, individually to his individual creditors, with those of the surrender made by him and his copartner, as commercial partners and as a firm, to the partnership creditors, even though a suspensive appeal does not lie from the decree, because its execution could cause no irreparable injury.

2. A decree consolidating the two proceedings is proper. Far from causing any injury to either class of creditors, or to any party concerned, it inures to the benefit of all such parties, by securing to them a speedy and uniform administration of their respective rights.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of East Feliciana; F. D. BRAME, Judge.

Reiley & Co., claiming the benefit of the insolvent laws, surrendered their partnership property to their creditors. The cession was accepted, and a syndic appointed. Subsequently G. J. Reiley made a surrender in his individual capacity as well to his personal creditors as to those of the firm, and his cession was also accepted, and a syndic appointed. From a decree consolidating Reiley's proceedings with that of the firm's, on motion of the syndic of the firm, he, the provisional syndic, and his individual creditor, John J. Blair, appeal. Affirmed.

W. F. Kernan, for appellants. John H. Stone, for appellee.

ON MOTION TO DISMISS.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. It is claimed that the appeal herein should be dismissed, for the reason that the decree complained of is not a final judgment, but an interlocutory order, the execution of which can cause no irreparable injury. It appears that the two members composing the firm of Reiley & Co. went into court, as copartners, claimed the benefit of the insolvent laws, and surrendered to their creditors all the property of the concern. The cession was accepted, and a syndic was elected and qualified. Reiley, one of the members, subsequently made a surrender, in his individual capacity, as well to his personal creditors as to those of the firm to which he belonged, being statements of his assets and of the respective liabilities of both the firm and himself. The cession wa accepted, and, on the application of certain creditors, a provisional syndic was appointed. The syndic elected in the insolvency proceedings of Reiley & Co. then intervened in those of George J. Reiley, and moved that the proceedings be consolidated with those in the insolvency of George J. Reiley & Co., for the reason that Reiley, a commercial partner of Reiley & Co., should have made a surrender of his individual estate in said insolvency, and that the administration of his insolvent estate should be committed to the syndic of the insolvency of Reiley & Co. The motion was opposed by Blair, an individual creditor of George J. Reiley. After hearing, the court ordered that the motion to consolidate be sustained, and the opposition of Blair be overruled. From this decree Reiley and Blair have taken an appeal, furnishing a bond for $250, if the appeal be suspensive, and for $100, if devolutive. The appeal was perfected by their giving each a bond for $100; therefore not as a suspensive, but as a devolutive, appeal. Conceding arguendo that no suspensive appeal could be taken from the order to consolidate, it by no means follows that a devolutive appeal does not lie from it. The appellants cannot be deprived of the constitutional right of appealing in that way; otherwise no interlocutory decree against them could ever be revised and corrected if erroneous. The motion to dismiss is overruled.

ON THE MERITS.

The question presented is simply whether the decree consolidating the proceedings in the insolvency of Reiley as an individual with those in the insolvency of the commercial firm of G. J. Reiley & Co. was correctly rendered. The cession was made in the last proceedings by G. J. Reiley and John B. Dunn, who appeared in proper person for the purpose. The bill and affidavit are signed by both of them. When the cession was accepted by the court, all the property of the insolvent debtors vested fully in their creditors, and the syndic, when elected, was entitled to claim and recover and administer the same according to law. Rev. St. art. 1791. The members, as individuals, were liable to the partnership creditors in solido, as much as though they were individual creditors, although their rights against the property surrendered ranked those of the individual creditors. If the property abandoned proves insufficient to pay the partnership creditors, these can have recourse against the individual property of the members in their individual capacity; so that the creditors of the firm are also the creditors of the individuals composing it, and remain such notwithstanding an individual surrender, the individual creditors having, however, no preference over those of the partnership on the individual property of the individual members. This is so true that the syndic of the partnership insolvency would have a right, in a proper case, to seize the individual property of the members to secure the claims of the partnership creditors. It is notorious to the profession and to the bench that it is usual that, whenever a surrender is made to partnership creditors, the individual members, at the same time, make a cession of their individual property to their individual creditors, and the rights of both classes of creditors are liquidated and disposed of in the partnership insolvency proceedings. It is impossible to conceive why, where this is not done by the surrendering partners, the court should not cumulate the proceedings in the individual cession with those in the partnership surrender. It does seem that, on the contrary, far from causing any injury, specially an irreparable injury, such action on the part of the court would benefit both the partnership and individual creditors of the members, as partners and as individuals, securing to them a speedy, uniform administration and liquidation of their respective rights. Judgment affirmed.

STATE ex rel. NEW ORLEANS CITY & L. R. CO. v. CITY OF NEW ORLEANS et al. (No. 10,984.)

MANDAMUS—SUSPENDING APPEAL—DISCONTINUANCE OF APPLICATION.

A relator who applies for a mandamus to compel the granting of a suspensive appeal may discontinue his application at any time before judgment thereon.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by the New Orleans City & Lake Railroad Company for writs of mandamus and prohibition to the city of New Orleans and others. On motion by the relator to discontinue. Motion granted.

Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for relator. Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for respondents.

FENNER, J. Since the submission of this case, but before decision, the relator has moved to discontinue its application for the extraordinary writs herein invoked. Counsel for the city opposes the motion, and insists that the case should be decided. Article 491, Code Pr., declares that "the plaintiff may, in every stage of the suit previous to judgment being rendered, discontinue the suit on paying the costs." This alone affords ample warrant for relator's action. But, aside from this, it would be worse than idle for us to determine whether or not the respondent judge should be compelled by mandamus to grant a suspensive appeal from an order rendered by him, when the relator, the only party who wants the appeal, and who invokes our aid to enforce it, in effect withdraws his application for the appeal, and abandons his proceedings in this court to enforce it.

The motion to discontinue is granted.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—BURDEN OF PROOF—CONSIDERATION.

1. A conveyance of land for a fixed price, reciting a payment in cash of $300, and the balance in negotiable mortgage notes of the vendee, is not converted into a giving in payment by proof that the $300 was not actually paid at date of sale, but was discharged by a debt due the vendee for wages, when the same evidence shows that the sale had been agreed on nearly a year previously, and the vendee's wages were left in the hands of the vendor for the express purpose of being applied to the agreed cash payment. This was, in substance, a payment in advance.

2. Plaintiffs, in an action to revoke a sale as in fraud of creditors, carry the burden of proof of the facts necessary to support the action. If they have no means of proof except by probing the consciences of their adversaries, and put them on the stand as their own witnesses, they must abide the result.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of East Feliciana; F. D. BRAME, Judge.

Suit by H. & C. Newman against L. Mahoney and others to revoke a certain conveyance. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

John H. Stone and T. H. Thorpe, for appellants. W. F. Kernan, for appellees.

FENNER, J. This is a suit by creditors to revoke a conveyance made by their insolvent debtor, L. Mahoney, to his son T. J. Mahoney, on the ground that it was made in fraud of creditors. The conveyance is, in form and substance, a sale. It is made for a fixed price of $1,200, of which, as recited in the act, $300 was in cash and $900 in three negotiable notes, at one, two, and three years, secured by mortgage on the property. The evidence shows that the $300 was not paid in cash at the date of sale, but was discharged by a debt due the vendee for wages. But the same evidence—which is that of plaintiffs' own witnesses—shows that the agreement to sell had been made nearly a year previously, and that the wages due the vendee were left in the vendor's hands for the express purpose of discharging the cash payment which had been agreed on. We think this circumstance robs the conveyance of any feature of a fraudulent dation en paiement, and takes it out of the operation of article 2658, Rev. Civil Code, which forbids the giving in payment, by an insolvent, "to one creditor to the prejudice of the others, any other thing than the sum of money due." This was, in substance, a cash payment, made in advance, and acknowledged in the act. We do not, however, intimate that, even in absence of this circumstance, the contract would not be a sale, under the maxim, non pretii numeratio, sed conventio, perficit emptionem. Regarded as a sale, it is elementary, and is conceded, that, in order to revoke it, plaintiffs carry the burden of proving three things: First, fraud in the vendor; second, knowledge of his insolvency in the vendee; third, injury to the plaintiffs. It may be unfortunate for plaintiffs that they had no means of proving the knowledge of the vendee except by putting the parties themselves on the stand. They have made the parties their own witnesses. These have unequivocally sworn that the son did not know of his father's insolvency, and there is nothing to contradict them. Plaintiffs have no alternative but to abide the result.

Judgment affirmed.

BARON et al. v. BAUM. (No. 10,992.)

ADMINISTRATION—RIGHT OF HEIRS TO DEMAND ACCOUNTING—PARTIES—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

1. Parties claiming to be sole heirs of a deceased have no right to demand an account of the administration of the succession, although they attack a judgment homologating an account, where it appears that the party sued for the account has been discharged as administrator, and the order discharging him is not assailed, and the person to whom the residue of the estate was paid, and who had been recognized as the sole heir of the deceased, is not made a party defendant.

2. Courts notice judicially want of proper parties.

Appeal from district court, parish of East Baton Rouge; GEORGE W. BUCKNER, Judge.

Suit by Louis Baron and others against Jacob Baum, administrator, for an accounting. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Modified.

Cross & Cross, for appellants. Kernan & Laycock, for appellee.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This suit has for its object the rendition of an account by the defendant as administrator. It is brought by the plaintiffs, who aver themselves to be the legitimate collateral heirs of Pierre Baron. They charge that the defendant has filed an account already, which has been homologated, but that the judgment approving it is a nullity, because they were not cited as the law requires. They contend that eventually they are entitled to recover from the defendant the amount of the inventory, $5,457, should he fail to render a proper account to them. They pray that he be cited, and that the judgment of homologation be annulled, and that he be ordered to account, and, in default, be held for the value of the property appraised in the inventory. The defendant appeared, filing exceptions and an answer. His main defenses are that the succession of Pierre Baron has been fully and finally administered upon by him; that its debts and liabilities have been satisfied; and that the residue has been paid over by him to Mrs. Gillingham, who had been previously recognized, by judgment of the court, as the sole heir of the deceased; and that he has been discharged from further responsibility as administrator, and his bond, as such, canceled. It is to be noticed that this person, Mrs. Gillingham, was not made a party to this action. After hearing, the lower court rejected the demand of plaintiffs, who pursue the present appeal. The question presented is simply whether the plaintiffs can proceed solely against the defendant and in the manner they have. The controversy does not necessarily involve, at its present stage, the issue of heirship. On the averment that they are the only heirs of the deceased, as his brother and sisters, the plaintiffs seek the nullity of a judgment homologating an account, for want of citation to them, and demand the rendition of another account from the defendant, as administrator. The defendant denies that he is amenable, and contends that he has been discharged, and that if plaintiffs have any right to the succession of Pierre Baron, which he has fully administered, they should bring their action against Mrs. Gillingham, who had claimed to be a legitimated child, and who was recognized by a judgment of court as the sole heir of the deceased, in a proceeding in which Louis Baron, one of the plaintiffs, was a party, and had raised the issue of heirship, and to whom he had turned over the residue of the succession. The record in fact shows that an application for the administration was made by a person claiming to be the widow of Pierre Baron, and as such entitled to the tutorship of two minors born of them; that this demand was opposed by Mrs. Gillingham, who averred herself to be a legitimated child of the deceased, and by said Louis Baron, who averred himself to be the legitimate brother, and who denied that the applicant was the widow, and charged that Mrs. Gillingham was an adulterous bastard, who could not be and was not legitimated, as claimed. The case was heard, and the court rendered judgment dismissing the petition of the alleged widow, and the opposition of Louis Baron, on his own motion. It sustained the opposition of Mrs. Gillingham, appointing her administratrix, and recognizing her as the sole heir of Pierre Baron. As she failed to qualify, Baum, the defendant, applied for the administration, and, after due publication, was appointed, taking the oath and furnishing the bond required by law. He went on with the liquidation, sold the property, and presented an account, distributing the funds among the creditors, which was homologated without notice to the plaintiffs, but with the declaration that the administrator shall pay over the balance to the heirs at law, without naming any one. The record also shows that, upon production of the proper vouchers, one of which is a receipt of Mrs. Gillingham for the balance, the defendant was discharged, and his bond canceled. It may be, and it may not, that the plaintiffs are what they represent themselves, the brother and sisters of the deceased; that Mrs. Gillingham was an adulterous bastard, and not an heir; that the judgment of homologation attacked is a nullity; that another account ought to be rendered, and the plaintiffs cited; but, however this may be, it is clear that the plaintiffs cannot be listened to, unless they attack the judgment recognizing Mrs. Gillingham as sole heir, making her or her representatives party defendant, and also assail the order discharging the defendant, Baum, as administrator of the succession, neither of which the plaintiffs have done. The court cannot recognize the plaintiffs as sole heirs, without annulling the judgment in favor of Mrs. Gillingham, and it cannot do so, unless she is called in to defend it. Neither can it annul the judgment of homologation, and order another account, without declaring that the defendant is still the administrator, and it cannot do so unless the order discharging him is rescinded. Both stand until avoided and set aside. Mrs. Gillingham or her representative is an essential party, having an interest in maintaining a judgment recognizing a status, and under which property has passed to her. Courts must judicially notice want of necessary parties. The judgment appealed from appears to have been rendered on the merits of the controversy. It does not refer to the exceptions, and merely states that, "the law and the evidence being in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiffs, the demand is rejected, with costs." If it were to remain as it reads, it might constitute res judicata; but it is not just that it should be considered as presently settling all the differences between the parties, as the plaintiffs, under its terms, might be said to have been decreed, under the issue, not to be the heirs of the deceased, when in reality they may be such, and in that capacity entitled to the residue of his estate, whatever it may be. A door should be left open to them for the revendication of their rights, if any, after proper averments and the making of a necessary and indispensable party. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended, so as to read as a mere judgment of dismissal, as in case of nonsuit, reserving to plaintiffs the right to renew the action, on proper averments, and against the proper parties; and that, thus amended, said judgment be affirmed, the costs of appeal to be paid by the appellee, and those of the lower court by the plaintiffs.

STATE ex rel. MARCHAND v. JUDGE DIVISION A, CIVIL DISTRICT COURT. (No. 10,991.)

PROHIBITION TO DISTRICT JUDGE—USURPATION OF JURISDICTION—OMISSION TO ALLOT CIVIL CASE—INJUNCTION—CERTIORARI—WHEN LIES.

1. Prohibition will not issue on a charge of usurpation of jurisdiction unless a plea was filed and improperly overruled to such jurisdiction, and when, outside the matter of form in which it was exercised, the court was competent to render the judgment complained of.

2. An omission to allot a civil case in the civil district court for the parish of Orleans is not an absolute nullity. The allotment may be formally or tacitly waived or abandoned. After this has been done the failure cannot be made a ground of complaint. It has been held otherwise in a criminal case.

3. This court will not supply a refused injunction unless in a very clear case, where it was declined by a judge who has no discretion to deny it, and who is bound by law to allow it.

4. Certiorari does not lie to ascertain the intrinsic correctness of proceedings. It lies sometimes to test the jurisdiction, and usually to ascertain the validity of proceedings in point of form. It does not lie where the proceedings, if irregular, have been ratified, and where a court has the inherent competency to do the act complained of, and has performed it without objection.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application of Paul A. Marchand for writs of prohibition and certiorari to the judge of division A, civil district court. Application denied.

Ker & Duvigneaux and Horace E. Upton, for relator. B. R. Forman, for respondent.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This is an application for a prohibition coupled with a prayer for a certiorari. The relator complains that the district judge has usurped jurisdiction in the matter of the succession of Ernest Marchand, by appointing, after the succession had been closed, one De Blois, liquidator of the partnership alleged to have existed between him and the deceased, and by ordering, at his instance, the sale of property to pay the debts of the concern. The relator avers that he was a partner of Ernest Marchand; was appointed administrator of his estate; that his widow and heirs have been recognized and put in possession of the property left by him; that, if De Blois was entitled to be appointed liquidator, he should have brought proper proceedings outside of the mortuaria, and had the matter allotted, under the law, to one of the divisions of the civil district court, which was not done; that the appointment made in the mortuaria is a nullity, which carries with it that of the order of sale. The district judge returns that the matter of the appointment of De Blois was one growing out of the succession proceedings, which, under the rules of the civil district court, did not require any allotment; that the proceedings were carried on contradictorily with all the parties concerned, who were cited and appeared without declining to the jurisdiction; that, after hearing, a judgment was rendered on August 5, 1891, which was signed after the overruling of a motion for a new trial, making the appointment of the liquidator, from which no appeal has been taken. The district judge further urges that the relator has no interest, as he avers that he is the discharged administrator of the succession of Ernest Marchand. It is unnecessary to decide whether the appointment of a liquidator was or not properly made. It is a question which cannot be raised and determined on this application for a prohibition. It is manifest that the civil district court for the parish of Orleans had jurisdiction over such a matter, and that if, in exercising its power, it has erred, the remedy is not by a resort to this court, under the provisions of article 90 of the constitution, but by an appeal, this being a case in which it can be obtained. It does not appear affirmatively that the relator, in the proceedings for the appointment of a liquidator, ever excepted to the jurisdiction of the judge, and it is the settled jurisprudence of this court that prohibition will not issue unless it appears that the jurisdiction was pleaded to and the plea was overruled. The relator has not appealed from the judgment, and cannot substitute the application for a prohibition to an appeal. The functions of the two remedies are glaringly different. The omission to allot a civil case is not an absolute nullity. The allotment may be formally and tacitly waived and abandoned, and, after this is done, the door for a complaint that it did not take place is effectually closed. This court has held differently in a criminal case. State v. Addotto, 34 La. Ann. 1. The failure of the relator to complain of the absence of an allotment, either by exception, seasonably set up, or otherwise, prevents him from proving that irregularity here if it be a factor in this matter. The respondent urges, besides, that the relator is without interest, as he avers that he was discharged as administrator of the succession of E. Marchand; but the relator does not claim that in that capacity, or as an heir, or otherwise, he is interested in the succession. He assumes the attitude, in his petition, of a copartner, and complains that a liquidator was illegally appointed to take charge of the partnership in which he is concerned as a member. The relator complains of the order of sale granted at the instance of De Blois as liquidator. It may be said that if this order is illegal the relator should have set forth its illegality, and sought an injunction in the lower court, and that if that tribunal had jurisdiction to make the appointment of one to liquidate the partnership, it surely had the power of ordering the sale of its assets to discharge its liabilities. It does not appear that he has sought relief in that form below, and he cannot be allowed to invoke the powers of supervision of this court in the present form, to supply that omission. This sort of provisional relief should not emanate from this court, unless in very clear cases, in which a district court has arbitrarily declined to grant it, in one of the instances in which, upon proper and full averments, the law leaves no discretion to such court, but dictates the granting of the remedy, and where injury would evidently be sustained. The relator has also applied for a certiorari. It is unnecessary to give this application any extended attention. The writ issues sometimes to test a jurisdiction, and usually to ascertain not the intrinsic correctness of proceedings, but their extrinsic validity in point of form. These questions have been considered. We have determined that if the allotment was irregular the irregularity has been acquiesced in and ratified, and that the civil district court had jurisdiction, and was competent to do the acts complained of, in the absence of any objection to the exercise of its powers in that respect, in the form in which it did. It is therefore decreed that the preliminary orders herein made be annulled, and that this application for a prohibition and a certiorari be refused.

MAY et al. v. NEW ORLEANS & C. R. CO.
(No. 10,884.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

PARTNERSHIP PROPERTY — WHAT CONSTITUTES — BANKRUPTCY — TITLE OF ASSIGNEE — COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. A purchase of immovables by the members of a commercial firm, made with the partnership funds and for account and use of the partnership, as shown by the books of the latter, though the title be taken in the names of the individual members, has precisely the same effect as if the title had been taken in the name of the partnership. In either case the partners become joint owners, but as between themselves they hold for the benefit of the firm.

2. A transfer by one partner to his copartners or to a third person of all his interest in the firm and its property operates a divestiture of his beneficial interest in immovables held as above, and disables him from contesting the title of his transferee.

3. An assignment in bankruptcy under the bankrupt law of the United States, differing from a cession under the Louisiana insolvent laws, divests the bankrupt of his title to all his property, and transfers the same to his assignee.

4. While the assignee holds the title in trust for the creditors, and, as to any residuum after their satisfaction, for the bankrupt, his title cannot be divested without proper showing to, and order made by, the court which has the control and administration of the trust.

5. Until this has been done other courts must respect the title of the assignee, at least until his discharge.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; NICHOLAS H. RIGHTOR, Judge.

Action by Mary P. May and others against the New Orleans & Carrollton Railroad Company to recover an interest in certain land. From a judgment from defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Leovy & Blair, for appellants. John M. Bonner, for appellee.

FENNER, J. The pertinent and controlling facts in the case are as follows: On the 12th of April, 1866, G. T. Beauregard leased the railroad belonging to the New Orleans & Carrollton Railroad Company for the term of 25 years, with the stipulation that the same should be converted from a steam into a horse railroad at the expense of the lessee, and with the further stipulation that at the expiration of the lease the road and improvements should revert to the lessor. Thomas P. May and A. C. Graham signed the lease as sureties of the lessee. On April 18, 1866, Beauregard, May, and Graham entered into a copartnership by notarial act, which declared that the lease above referred to was to be held for the joint account; that Beauregard was to conduct, manage, and direct the enterprise; that May and Graham were to furnish the money necessary to carry it on, in amounts and at dates specified; that books of accounts were to be kept; and that each partner was to have an equal one-third of the net profits. The act of copartnership does not give any firm name to the partnership, but the evidence shows that the business was conducted and the books were kept under the name of the Carrollton Railroad Company. One of the first necessities of the enterprise was to establish stables for the live stock employed therein. Accordingly a square of ground, being the property here in controversy, was purchased for that purpose. The title was taken in the individual names of the partners, in the proportion of one undivided third each; but the books of the partnership show that the cash portion of the price was paid by a check of the partnership, and said books further expressly declare that the purchase was made "by the partnership." They also show that the first deferred payment, due May 8, 1867, was paid by the partnership. Stables were built on the property, and it was used by the partnership in its business. Subsequently, Thomas P. May, by facts not necessary to mention, became a debtor of the United States in an enormous sum. By an act passed on May 14, 1867, May assigned to the United States, in part payment of this debt, a large amount of property, "real, personal, and mixed," itemized in the act, and comprising the following, viz.: "The interest of the said May in and to the Carrollton Railroad Company, and the property, stock, and appurtenances thereto belonging; the value of which is estimated at $480,000." By a further clause in said act, May bound himself "to sign and execute all acts or other instruments of writing that may be necessary to give to the United States full, complete, and valid titles to the property herein transferred." Accordingly, on May 16, 1887, May executed a further and more specific transfer to the United States of his interest "in and to the New Orleans & Carrollton Railroad, the lease and other franchises thereof, and the railroad tracks, rolling stock, engines, cars, live stock, and other appurtenances thereunto belonging," proceeding to refer to and particularly describe the nature of the property and interest as fixed by the terms of the lease and the articles of copartnership. The act further recites that it was "executed in confirmation of the act of transfer of said right, title, and interest in the said railroad and the said lease thereof, and of other property, real and personal, belonging to said May, passed on May 14, 1867." On October 31, 1867, the United States executed an act of transfer to Bonneval, Hernandez, and Binder of all its right, title, and interest in and to the property therein described, including: (1) Its interest in the lease of the railroad; (2) in the partnership between May, Graham, and Beauregard; and (3) various pieces of real estate, specifically described, and among others the square of ground in controversy. In the same month an act was passed between the New Orleans & Carrollton Railroad Company, Beauregard, Bonneval, Binder, and Hernandez, by which this property passed to the present defendant, which has since possessed, occupied, and used the same. In April, 1871, Thomas P. May availed himself of the bankrupt law of 1867. His schedules exhibited large debts, and no assets whatever. He specifically declared therein, under oath, that he had no real estate, and that there was none to the possession or enjoyment of which he is entitled. He also inserted therein the following sworn statement: "In May, 1867, by act before Graham, notary, I transferred, to secure the United States, all my real and personal property, consisting of real estate in square bounded by canal, * * * the Payne plantation, * * * my interest in Carrollton Railroad, etc." A regular assignment was executed to E. E. Norton, assignee, who has never been discharged. There being no property surrendered, as appeared by the schedules, no creditor appeared to prove his debt. In due course, May obtained his discharge. He subsequently left New Orleans, and died in London, England, in 1887. The present is a petitory action brought by his major daughter and by his widow, as tutrix of his two minor children, to recover his interest in the square of ground hereinbefore alluded to, alleging that May validly purchased the same in 1866, had never sold or conveyed it, died in the ownership thereof, and that plaintiffs inherited the same from him; that defendant is a wrongful possessor, and should be condemned to deliver the same, and also to pay $46,000 as rent and revenues. Numerous defenses are interposed, which we shall consider, as far as necessary, in disposing of the case.

1. Whatever sympathy we might feel with the children of May, we are bound to recognize the fact that they stand in the shoes of their father, and have no title to any consideration which would not be extended to him if he were personally plaintiff. If there be any ambiguity in the acts by which it is claimed that May had divested himself of this property, his acts, words, and conduct showing the meaning and effect which he himself attributed to them should have great weight in their construction. His sworn declarations, which we have quoted from his bankruptcy proceedings, admit of but one of two explanations: Either (1) that he interpreted and intended his transfers to the United States as operating a divestiture of his title to this property; or (2) that he designedly concealed his interest, with the purpose of defrauding his creditors. The first hypothesis would go far towards ending this controversy. The second would drive him away from the portals of justice, as coming with unclean hands. Hood v. Frellsen, 31 La. Ann. 577. The first is unquestionably the correct hypothesis, which his children will hardly dispute, and which is maintained by May's silent acquiescence in the effect given to his conveyances down to the day of his death. We cannot concur in the restrictive interpretation placed by counsel for plaintiffs on May's sworn statement in his bankruptcy schedules, that he had transferred to the United States "all his property, real and personal." He claims that this expression is limited by the succeeding statement, mentioning the particular properties so transferred. We think the proper construction is reached, not by restricting the words "all his property," but by amplifying the meaning of the succeeding descriptive terms, and by attributing to the words, "my interest in the Carrollton Railroad," the signification of his interest in everything connected with the road, including the partnership and all its property. No other interpretation is consistent with reason or honesty; for, if he did not mean "all his property," why did he use that phrase? And, if he meant to exclude any property, why does it not appear on his schedule? It is obvious that this declaration was made to explain why he had no property to surrender, and surrendered none. It is nothing less than a solemn declaration, under oath, that May intended, by his acts of transfer to the United States, to embrace all his property, including that here in controversy.

2. There can be no doubt that by the act of May 14, 1867, May intended to transfer, and did transfer, to the United States, his interest in the partnership between Beauregard, Graham, and himself, and in all the property belonging to it. The terms used admit of no other interpretation. The Carrollton Railroad Company was the firm name in which the partnership conducted its business, and kept the books of account required by the articles. He transferred his interest, not in the railroad, but in the railroad company, and in the property belonging to the company. The distinction is emphasized by the succeeding act of May 16th, which was obviously intended to make a more specific and descriptive transfer of his particular interest in the railroad itself, the lease thereof, and its franchises and appurtenances. It is equally clear, under the evidence, that this square of ground was bought and paid for with the funds and for the account and use of the partnership. The books of the partnership explicitly show this, and May has never contradicted and could not contradict them, at least without showing fraud. Every fact in the case fully corroborates the books. Such a purchase of immovable property by members of a commercial partnership, with the partnership funds and for the partnership account, though the title be taken in the name of the individual partners, has precisely the same effect as if the title were taken in the name of the partnership. In either case the individual partners became joint owners. Allen v. Whetstone, 35 La. Ann. 849; Thomas v. Scott, 3 Rob. (La.) 256. But though the legal title vests in the individual partners, and the share of each is liable to seizure for his individual debts, yet as between the partners the property is equitably and practically partnership property. This subject was dealt with by this court in the case of Baca v. Ramos, 10 La. 417, where the title to the immovable was taken in the name of "J. Ramos, A. Baca, and J. Preba, partners trading under the firm and style of J. Ramos and Company." After the purchase Baca transferred his interest in the partnership to his copartners. He subsequently claimed that this transfer did not divest his ownership of the above immovable, and sued his former partners for a partition thereof. Judge MARTIN, as organ of the court, said: "The only question which this case presents is whether the house and lot was part of the partnership property. The counsel for plaintiff contends that this is joint property, in which he is a joint owner, and not partnership property. Skillman v. Purnell, 3 La. 496. The act of sale by which the premises were acquired shows that the purchase was made by the parties to this suit as partners trading under the firm of Joseph Ramos & Co., and a note was given for one-half the price, bearing the signature of the firm. The partners were joint owners, and either of them might have sold his undivided share or interest in the property, which was liable to seizure for his private debts. But, in case of such sale and seizure, he must have accounted to his partners for the price. Neither could he have occupied any part of the property for his private use without compensating his copartners. In fact, the title to one undivided third was in him, but the value thereof belonged to the partnership. When the plaintiff withdrew from the firm, and received a given sum, he relinquished his interest in the value of the house and lot in question to his copartners. He has therefore no right to demand a sale for partition, as immediately after it, the price, being the value of the premises, would instantly become the property of defendants. The distinction which we have taken between the title by which the property is held, and the value thereof, is well known in the other states of the Union, where the common law prevails. These rights are there distinguished by the expressions 'legal title' and 'equitable title.' There courts of equity enforce the rights of the equitable owner by compelling the legal one to make a conveyance to the other, precisely as this court did in the case of Hall v. Sprigg, 7 Mart. (La.) 243." This case was affirmed, and like principles announced, in a later decision. Thomas v. Scott, 3 Rob. (La.) 256. We consider that these authorities dispose of May's rights in this case. If a transfer by one partner to his copartners, of the former's interest in the partnership, divests his beneficial interest in immovables held by the partners jointly for account of the firm, a like transfer to a third person cannot have a less effect. In the latter as in the former case the transferrer is disabled from contesting the title of his transferee, or from setting up adverse claims on such property. We therefore hold that the transfer by May to the United States had precisely the effect which both parties obviously, at the time of the contract and ever afterwards, intended and considered that it should have, viz., a valid divestiture of May's rights in the property in controversy. As plaintiffs must recover on the strength of their own title, and not on the weakness of that of defendant, we have no occasion to discuss the question raised as to the validity of subsequent transfers by the United States and its assigns to the defendant.

3. The foregoing views render it unnecessary to discuss at length the defense based upon May's assignment in bankruptcy as operating a divestiture of his title which would bar this action. We have, however, studied the question very closely under the light thrown upon it by the authorities cited and by the very able arguments on both sides. The decisions of this court to the effect that cession of property under our state insolvent law does not operate a translation of title have no application to the United States bankrupt laws, because they are based on express provisions of our Revised Civil Code, of which it is only necessary to quote articles 2175 and 2178: "The surrender does not give the property to the creditors. It only gives them the right of selling it for their benefit, and receiving the income of it until sold." Article 2175. "As the debtor preserves his ownership of the property surrendered, he may divest the creditors of their possession of the same at any time before they have sold it, by paying the amount of his debts, with the expenses attending the cession." Article 2178. The bankrupt law contains no such provisions, but on the contrary declares: "As soon as the assignee is appointed and qualified the judge, or, where there is no opposing interest, the register shall by an instrument under his hand assign and convey to the assignee all the estate, real and personal, of the bankrupt, with all his deeds, books, and papers relating thereto, and such assignment shall relate back to the commencement of said proceeding in bankruptcy, and thereupon, by operation of law, the title to all such property and estate, both real and personal, shall vest in said assignee. * * *" Section 14 of bankrupt act of 1867. That the assignee holds the title in trust first for the creditors, and, as to any residuum after their satisfaction, for the bankrupt, is doubtless true. But it is certainly not in the power of the bankrupt, by his simple ipse dixit, to terminate the trust, and divest the title of the assignee in his own favor. If he has reasons to urge why the assignee's title should be terminated, and the property restored to him as residuary cestui que trust, this is not the forum in which to vindicate them. He must go to the court which has the control and administration of the trust, and there make his showing, and obtain such relief as he is entitled to. Bump, Bankr. (10th Ed.) pp. 247, 248. Until then, this and every other court must respect the title of the assignee. Erwin v. U. S., 97 U. S. 392; Clark v. Clark, 17 How. 315; Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet. 193.

CUTRER v. ADDISON et al. (No. 11,008.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. March 7, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

ILLEGAL REMOVAL OF FENCE—COMPENSATION—REASONABLENESS—APPEAL—DISMISSAL—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT.

1. An appeal may be dismissed proprio motu, in a proper case, in which the claim is inflated to give jurisdiction to the supreme court.

2. The matter here involved is one of fact, and relates to damages sustained by the illegal removal of a fence. The jury seem to have done justice by making a reasonable allowance, and their verdict, not having been shown to be erroneous either way, is not disturbed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Tangipahoa; JAMES M. THOMPSON, Judge.

Suit by Joseph B. Cutrer against Ashford Addison and others to recover damages for tearing down certain fences. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Reid & Reid, for appellants. W. B. Kemp, for appellee.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This is a suit for the recovery of $2,500, as damages alleged to have been occasioned by the defendants for illegally and maliciously breaking, tearing down, and hauling away a dividing fence between the contiguous farms of the plaintiff and of the defendants, "leaving a large portion of that of petitioner unprotected and in the woods." The answer was a general denial, a charge of malicious and vexatious prosecution, to harass defendants, who had been criminally prosecuted, but acquitted, and who have sustained $500 damages, which are asked in reconvention. The issues were tried by a jury, who returned a verdict of $200 in favor of plaintiff, on which the court, satisfied with the finding, rendered a judgment for as much. The defendants appealed, and the plaintiff, answering, prays for an increase of the judgment to the full amount claimed. Surely, the plaintiff has some cause for complaint for which he is entitled to be indemnified; but it is surprising that he should ever have imagined that a court of justice could allow him $2,500 to repair the injury which he has sustained. It is clear that he magnified and swelled it to that exaggerated figure for no other purpose than that of making a jurisdictional allegation for the recovery of a largely fictitious claim, in order to bring the case within the jurisdiction of this court. Had the appeal been taken by the plaintiff, and had the defendants moved for its dismissal, the motion would have prevailed, the claim being manifestly inflated; but as the defendants could not have taken their appeal to another appellate jurisdiction, and were bound, under the allegations, to come here, we cannot, proprio motu, dismiss it, as we might otherwise have done. The reconventional demand was not formally or expressly passed upon, although it may have been considered and acted upon. However this be, it is not before us, as might be a plea of payment or such other plea as it is an independent matter, which might have formed the object of a distinct suit. The defendants have not shown that the verdict of the jury is excessive, and the plaintiff has not established that it is for less than he is entitled to recover. Under the circumstances, the question involved being one of fact and of little importance, the finding of the jury, which has satisfied neither side, should not be disturbed. Judgment affirmed.

Succession of MONTGOMERY. (No. 10,998.)

MORTGAGE—RENUNCIATION OF INTEREST BY WIFE—REQUISITES—NOTARIAL CERTIFICATE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. The renunciation by a married woman of her rights against her husband and his property, in order to be valid and binding, must have been made as required by the act of 1835, embodied in Rev. Civil Code, art. 129.

2. The notary must have explained to her, out of the presence of her husband, the nature of her rights, and that of the contract she agrees to, and must have detailed the circumstances and the occurrence in the act.

3. A failure to comply with the requirements of the law, which are conditions precedent, vitiates the renunciation.

4. The presumption omnia rite acta does not attach in a case like this.

5. It does in that of a district judge, authorizing a married woman to borrow and mortgage, because he is a judicial officer empowered to hear and determine, but not in that of a notary, who is a ministerial officer, who has no judgment whatever to exercise and pronounce.

6. The burden is on the creditor who opposes the renunciation of a married woman, in order to defeat her money and mortgage claims against her husband and his property, to show by legal evidence that the essential formalities required by article 129, Rev. Civil Code, as conditions precedent for the validity of the renunciation, have been observed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of East Carroll; FIELD F. MONTGOMERY, Judge.

On opposition to accounts in the settlement of the succession of J. W. Montgomery. From a judgment dismissing the opposition, and allowing the claim of Mrs. A. E. Montgomery, the opponents appeal. Affirmed.

J. L. Dagg and C. S. Wyly, for appellant. J. M. Kennedy and Joseph E. Rausdell, for appellees.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This controversy involves the validity of a wife's renunciation of her rights against her husband, and the property mortgaged by him, in favor of a creditor. J. W. Montgomery having died, his widow filed an account of her administration of his estate, on which she placed herself as a creditor for $6,307 with the legal mortgage, accorded by law to secure its payment, the same to be satisfied in preference to the claims of all other creditors. The account was opposed. Mrs. Montgomery having died, her son was appointed to succeed her, and he filed another account, adopting that previously presented. There was judgment dismissing the opposition and maintaining the claim and the mortgage contended for, in favor of Mrs. Montgomery and of her succession. It is from that judgment that the present appeal is taken. There is no contention as to the amount of the claim, and as to a proper registry of it, at the date of the mortgage by Montgomery, in favor of Davis, in 1881. The litigation relates to the validity of the renunciation, mentioned in the notarial act, as having been made by Mrs. Montgomery. That instrument contains the following declaration: "I certify that there does not exist on the Deesona and other plantations any mortgage, except the following legal mortgage, in favor of Mrs. Eliza Vail, wife of the mortgagor, for $6,945.05, recorded on the 3d day of August, 1874; and she appears and declares that she renounces, unto said G. Malin Davis, her right of mortgage on said property, and agrees that his mortgage shall take precedence of hers; and she further declares that she has no other mortgage against her husband's property, recorded or otherwise." It is claimed that this renunciation meets the requirements of the law,—Rev. Civil Code, art. 129, (original act of March 27, 1835, section 2,)—which reads as follows. "Married women above the age of twenty-one years shall have the right, with the consent of their husbands, by act passed before a notary public, to renounce in favor of third persons their matrimonial, dotal, paraphernal, and other rights. The notary public, before receiving the signature of any married woman, shall detail in the act and explain verbally to said married woman, out of the presence of her husband, the nature of her rights and of the contract she agrees to." Also Rev. St. §§ 1717, 2518, 3985. On the other hand, it is contended that the recital does not show that those legal exigencies have been satisfied, and therefore, in the absence of such, the renunciation is defective and null. A simple reading of the provisions forcibly impresses upon the mind that the law permits a renunciation, provided the notary, before receiving the signature of the married woman, explains to her verbally, out of the presence of her husband,—First, the nature of her rights and that of the contract she agrees to; and, second, that he shows that he has done so by detailing in the act the nature of the double information which he has thus given her, and that the formalities have been fully observed. It is not until after he has so furnished her this information, and thus detailed what has occurred, that he has authority to receive her signature. A compliance with these requirements is an essential condition precedent for the validity of such renunciations, which is exacted for the protection of married women, who are inopes consilii, in order to shield them, as effectually as practicable, from marital pressure, intimidation, or captation. It is nothing but just that they should previously know their rights, just as they are, with precision, and it is for that purpose that the notary is required to inform them, and to show how he has done so, in order that they may not afterwards deny that they had full knowledge of those rights, the whole, of course, to occur out of the presence of the husband. The proof which the law allows to show that those formalities have been gone through faithfully is the notary's recital in the act.

In Succession of Gremillon, 4 La. Ann. 411, the declaration made by the parish judge, acting as a notary, was attacked as insufficient, and it was so held; yet by reference to the act it is perceived that it declares that Mrs. Gremillon voluntarily appeared, with her husband's authority, to renounce generally to all the rights whatever she had on the property mortgaged by her husband, in favor of Poydras, whereupon the judge explained to her specifically the rights which the law accords her in such a case, which he classified under five heads, covering upwards of a close-written page, and winding up with a statement that she, notwithstanding, persisted in renouncing, and had declared, that neither she nor her heirs would ever run counter to the mortgage, for any motive whatever. See Record No. 1183, in the clerk's office. It will be noticed that the parish judge, ex officio notary, had failed to mention the all important fact, if it existed, that all this had occurred "out of the presence of the husband." The then court therefore said: "The statute of 1835 contains the proviso that the notary public, before receiving the signature of any married woman, shall detail in the act, and verbally explain to her, out of the presence of her husband, the nature of her rights and of the contract she agrees to. A substantial compliance with the proviso is essential to the validity of the renunciation. One of its motives was to guard the wife against the influence of the husband, the moral effect of whose presence might control her will to the prejudice of her interest. This formality was disregarded in the instant case, and the renunciation must be held inoperative." In another case (Ashford v. Tibbitts, 11 La. Ann. 168) it appears from the transcript that the act of mortgage contained the following declaration of the notary: "Then appeared Mrs. Harriet Ashford, wife of said Tibitts, who, being by me made acquainted with her rights and privileges on the property of her said husband, apart and out of his hearing did, notwithstanding, declare to me that she does by the act formally renounce the same in favor of the said Mrs. Woodruff for the purpose aforesaid." See Record No. 4460, in the clerk's office. It will be observed that although the notary stated that he had made the lady acquainted with her rights and privileges, out of her husband's presence, he failed to specify or detail in the act the nature of the rights explained to her. On the contention that this statement was, however, a substantial compliance with the law, the court said, in a quite summary way: "We think that her (Mrs. Ashford's) mortgage should have been recognized, as her renunciation was defective, in that the notary did not detail in the act the nature of the rights she renounced," —referring to the statute of 1835 and to Succession of Gremillion, 4 La. Ann. 412. In the instant case it is more than apparent that the renunciation is fatally defective, not only because the notary did not detail the rights, (the donble information which is to be given by him to the wife,) but also because it does not appear that what transpired, if anything of that kind did, occurred out of the presence of the husband. A failure to have made a recital in the act of those circumstances implies that the formalities were not fulfilled by the renunciation.

The further defense that the presumption is that the notary, who is a sworn public officer, must be presumed to have done his duty, and that this presumption has not been rebutted, cannot hold. In support of this position decisions are invoked which go to the extent that where a district judge has issued a certificate to a married woman, to authorize her to borrow money, and in order to secure its reimbursement, to mortgage her individual property, omitting to mention that he had examined her out of the presence of her husband, as directed by the statute, the presumption omnia rite acta, that he had done his duty, had been held to attach. Rev. Civil Code, art. 128; Locke v. Lafitte, 28 La. Ann. 232; Pilcher v. Pugh, Id. 494. Loque, Dig. 408, (12.) In refutation of this contention it suffices to say that the judge, in such cases, acts in his judicial capacity, exercising a judicial discretion, hearing, and determining. He is required officially to ascertain a certain condition of things, and after he has done so to decide whether the authority shall or not be granted; so much so that, in a proper case, his refusal might be the subject of an appeal. The notary, on the contrary, is not a judicial officer. He is vested with mere ministerial powers. He is a scribe, who has authority to identify parties appearing before him, and authenticate their declarations. In cases of renunciations he is commanded to do certain things, and he must, where he has done them, detail in the act what he has accomplished. He has no power to refuse to receive the renunciation if made legally, or to approve or to disapprove the same. His omissions or commissions are not judgments subject to be appealed from. In the Case of Ashford, 11 La. Ann., in which it appeared in the act that the notary stated that he had made the lady acquainted with her rights and privileges, the court did not hold that the presumption attached that he had done his duty. It is proper to add that the burden of proving fulfillment of the formalities was on the creditor, who affirmed a valid renunciation, and not on the wife, who denied the same. Judgment affirmed.

STATE ex rel. BOTHICK et al. v. RIGHTOR, District Judge. (No. 10,994.)

PROHIBITION TO DISTRICT JUDGE—WHEN LIES—SUBSTITUTE FOR APPEAL—JURISDICTION.

1. Prohibition does not lie to test the jurisdiction of one of the divisions of the civil district court for the parish of Orleans, to which a suit was allotted, when it is pretended that its object is to annul proceedings had before another division, unless it clearly appears from the averments of the prayer that such is its purpose, and the division to which allotted is devoid of competency ratione personæ and materiæ, and the complainant, after exhausting all means of relief, is left without any other remedy.

2. Prohibition cannot be substituted to an appeal to determine, in an appealable case, whether the lower court, in the exercise of its legal discretion, has, after contradictory hearing, properly or improperly overruled an exception to its jurisdiction, when it is apparent that the court could render a judgment which might validly constitute res judicata, whichever way it goes.

3. The party aggrieved is not left without remedy, and, if error was committed to his prejudice, can be relieved by appeal.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application of James W. Bothick and others for writs of prohibition and certiorari to N. H. Rightor, judge of division D, civil district court. Application denied.

Augustus Bernan, for relators. J. S. & J. T. Whitaker, for respondent.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. The relators contend that a suit has been brought before the civil district court against them, having for its object to annul certain proceedings had in their mother's succession, which has been finally wound up; that those proceedings were duly begun, continued, and closed before division A of said court; that the suit to annul them was allotted to division D; that they have pleaded to the jurisdiction of the last division, contending that, as the suit grows out of the succession proceedings which they seek to annul, both under the rules of the civil district court, adopted in furtherance of the constitutional provision, and under the law which gives exclusive jurisdiction to the court which rendered a judgment to entertain and determine a suit to annul it, division D was incompetent, and should have referred the action to division A; that they have pleaded to the jurisdiction of division D, but that their plea has been overruled, and that their only remedy for relief is to apply to this court for a prohibition to arrest further proceedings in the suit before division D, and they accordingly pray. The district judge presiding over the division to which the suit was allotted returns substantially that the action brought against the relators does not avowedly purport to be one to annul the succession proceedings alluded to, and that it is simply a suit by parties who claim to be the legal heirs of their mother, (Catherine Connolly, who died in 1866,) and who ask to be recognized such contradictorily with their father, Thomas W. Bothick, who is an interdicted person, provided with a curator, and with certain parties named, who pretend to be his legitimate children by another person, (Annie Cunningham, who died in 1881;) that he properly overruled the exception to the jurisdiction of his division; and that, if he has erred, the parties aggrieved can be relieved on appeal, the case being appealable. The averment that the suit against them by the relators is one in nullity of the proceedings in the settlement of their mother's succession is not apparent from the allegations and the prayer of the petition of the plaintiffs in the case. They do not even refer to them, and they could not ask for any specific decree in the judgment on the merits to annul them. When the petition was filed, and the question of the allotment of the case arose, it surely could not be ascertained from its face that its object was to annul any proceedings, orders, and judgments before another division, and the allotment accordingly took place. After the exception to the jurisdiction was filed and heard, the issue whether the suit was one to annul was to be determined by the judge of division D, in the exercise of his judicial discretion. He considered the showing made as indicating that it was not a suit in nullity; that it was an original, independent action, which could be determined, regardless of the succession proceedings, to which the plaintiffs were not parties, and which were not, therefore, in their way, so as to require them to be annulled, to justify a recovery of the rights revendicated by them. It may be and it may not that the district judge decided correctly. If he did, his judgment will stand, if he did not, it will be reversed; but the relators are not permitted to question its correctness on an application for a prohibition. That remedy is not one of right. It is granted only in cases in which a court has no jurisdiction ratione personæ et materiæ, and where the complainant would not be entitled to adequate relief by appeal or otherwise. State v. Rightor, 32 La. Ann. 1182; State v. Monroe, 33 La. Ann. 923; State v. Judge, 34 La. Ann. 782. The suit brought against the relators and allotted to division D is surely in itself one over the subject-matter, of which that division can pronounce a valid final judgment, whether in favor or against the relators, and which, when definitive, could be successfully set up as res judicata. Should the relators be aggrieved by the judgment to be rendered on the merits, they would not be left without a remedy. They could appeal, and have, if they are right, either the judgment overruling their exception, or that against them on the merits, reversed, and themselves quieted in their status and property. It may be that the final judgment may go in their favor and against the plaintiff in the suit, who may never appeal; or it may be, if they do, that the judgment will be affirmed, and the defendants quieted.

The relators can take nothing under the prayer for a certiorari. The question of jurisdiction which might have arisen under it has been disposed of in considering that for a prohibition, and the proceedings in the suit before division D are surely regular in point of form. Their regularity is the only question which would perhaps, at best, have received any attention in the present application. It is therefore decreed that the restraining order made in limine herein be rescinded, and that the application be refused, with costs, without prejudice to the rights of the relators as appellants in the case.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. March 7, 1892. 44 La. Ann.).

MORTGAGE TO SECURE COMMUNITY DEBTS — PRESCRIPTION — POWER OF SURVIVING HUSBAND TO WAIVE — DATE OF ACKNOWLEDGMENT — RIGHTS OF CHILDREN.

1. Although a surviving husband, personally bound for the debts of the community, may, after the dissolution thereof, waive prescription which has since accrued thereon, still, when he is the tutor of his minor children, born from his marriage with his deceased wife, he cannot do so to the prejudice of her succession or to their injury so as to burden them therewith and to prevent their legal mortgage, duly recorded against him, from ranking the mortgage securing such debts.

2. Such acknowledgment may then be made before prescription has extinguished such debts, when they are made bona fide. They will, when so made, keep such debts alive, as well as the mortgage securing them, and bind the succession and the minors, but not otherwise.

3. The proceeds of property mortgaged cannot be applied to the payment of the prescribed, though revived, debts, to the detriment of the succession and of the minors, but will go to extinguish only the debts not prescribed, secured by a mortgage ranking that of the minors.

4. At the dissolution of the community by the death of the wife her share therein vests in her heirs, as owners, cum onere, as effectually as it would have vested in her, on a dissolution by judgment, subject to all legal and valid claims against it, and susceptible of divestiture in the enforcement of these claims.

5. Neither the wife nor her heirs can be relieved from the pact de non alienando, contained in an act of sale, retaining a privilege and mortgage on the property sold, to secure the unpaid price. Under such pact the creditor is dispensed from the hypothecary action, and is entitled to ignore subsequent alienations and incumbrances, which, by virtue of the terms of the law, cannot impair his previously acquired and vested rights under duly-recorded acts.

6. Although the creditor possess such rights, the incumbered property may be transferred cum onere; and the transferee, in case of seizure and sale, to pay the secured debt, has a right to the residue of the price of adjudication after payment of such debt.

7. The privilege and mortgage securing a debt ceased to exist when the debt secured is extinguished by prescription. The accessory follows the principal, which is an essential foundation for it.

8. Waiver of the prescription does not revive the privilege and mortgage thus extinguished to the prejudice of subsequent recorded incumbrances, which then ascend and rank the extinct registries.

9. Unliquidated claims of minors against their tutors cannot be satisfied unless at the termination of the tutorship, but their mortgage surviving such claims eventually may be recognized in the mean time.

10. Judgment reversed, and a new judgment rendered to apportion proceeds of sale and to allot costs.

ON REHEARING.

1. Acts under private signature have no date as to third parties unless the same are proved to have been executed on the day or at the time when they purport so to have been.

2. Merely offering such acts in evidence gives them, as to third persons, no other date than that of the day of offering.

3. In a proper case, in furtherance of the ends of justice, the court may proprio motu amend a previous decree so as to leave a door open for the proof of the date of an act under private signature, which was not made by some oversight, and which to all appearances can be furnished.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Iberville; EDWARD B. TALBOT, Judge.

Action by Lavina Gay via executiva against Amadee N. Hebert. Thomas B. Mary, the under-tutor of certain minors, filed a third opposition. From a judgment adjudicating an undivided one-half to plaintiff, the under-tutor and the administrator of plaintiff's succession appeal. Reversed.

Alex. Hebert, for appellant. W. B. Sommerville, for appellee.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This litigation involves the right of ownership of the minors represented by the third opponent, as their under-tutor, to one undivided half of the property seized and adjudicated herein to the plaintiff, and also the mortgage rights which they assert, on a like share of the same property, belonging to their father and tutor, who is the defendant, and which, they claim, are entitled to rank those contended for by the plaintiff and her succession, and which are said to exist no more. It appears that on February 4, 1881, Hebert bought, for $10,000, the undivided half of a plantation known as "Dunboyne," part ($4,500) cash and part ($5,500) on time, for which he issued five notes of that date, payable two at two years and the others at three, four, and five years, each for $1,100. The act of sale contained the stipulation of the pact de non alienando, and was duly recorded July 23d following, and subsequently seasonably reinscribed. In October of the same year his wife, Emiline Gallaugher, died leaving several minor children as the issue of their marriage. Her succession was opened. An inventory was taken of the property composing the community between them, which was appraised at upwards of $14,000, an abstract of which was properly recorded on December 10, 1881, and afterwards reinscribed in time. Hebert was appointed tutor, and qualified as such on the same day. None of the notes having been paid, and all being then due, Mrs. Lavina Gay brought suit via executiva, on the 9th of March, 1891, with the averment that on the 17th of January, 1890, Hebert had obtained from her an extension to 1895, which, owing to his failure to comply with the obligations taken, authorized the suit, the same proving an acknowledgment of full indebtedness, and evidenced by an authentic act, attached to the petition, along with a copy of the deed of sale and of the notes. The fiat having issued, the undivided half purchased was seized and advertised. Previous to the day of sale Mary, the under-tutor of the minors, filed a third opposition, claiming, in their name, the ownership of one-half thereof, free from plaintiff's averred vendor's privilege and mortgage, and a mortgage on the remaining half, ranking plaintiff's pretensions. No injunction was asked to stop the sale, but on the prayer a restraining order was made arresting the proceeds. The undivided half seized was adjudicated to the plaintiff, for $7,500. She joined issue by a general denial and an averment of ownership under the sheriff's adjudication, praying for the dismissal of the opposition and for a recognition of her title. There was judgment against the under-tutor in favor of the succession of the plaintiff, dissolving the restraining order touching the proceeds and reserving the right of the minors against their father and tutor. Made a party, he failed to join issue, and no judgment was rendered as to him. The under-tutor appeals, and the administrator of the plaintiff's succession joins, asking that the judgment be amended by recognizing the title of the estate to the undivided half.

The main contention of the under-tutor on behalf of the minors is that at the death of their mother they inherited the one undivided half of the property seized, which formed part of the community which existed between her and their father, subject to all valid community debts against it; that at the date of the institution of this suit the five notes were prescribed as to their mother's succession and themselves; that thereby the privilege and mortgage claimed by the plaintiff ceased to exist, and to incumber the property to their prejudice, so that their share therein was cleared; and that the share of their father was likewise relieved, and their legal and recorded mortgage against him, as their tutor, ascended and ranked the privilege and mortgage contended for by the plaintiff and her succession. The under-tutor prays accordingly, asking, besides, a judgment against the tutor. In answer the administrator retorts that at the date of the suit not one of the notes was prescribed; that as to such which might have been so considered the defendant had waived and interrupted prescription, and had formally acknowledged liability and indebtedness. By reference to indorsements on the two notes which matured at two years, in 1883, it appears that indeed Hebert waived prescription, and acknowledged indebtedness, and by inspection of the act of extension it also appears that he did the same thing, or the equivalent, as to all the five notes. The suit having been instituted on March 9, 1891, and the fifth note falling due on the 4th of February, 1886, it is apparent that they were all prescribed on their faces, on the 4–7th of February, 1891, more than a month before the filing of the petition, unless the acknowledgment relied on had a contrary effect. The waiver and acknowledgment on the notes at two years were made more than five years after they had matured; the acknowledgment and promises in the act of January 17, 1890, which referred to all the five notes, were made after the note at three years was prescribed, but before those at four and five years had so become. Hence they interrupted prescription as to these two only; but they revived the other three, as ordinary notes, as the privilege and mortgage securing them died away, as to third persons, the moment they became prescribed. Accessorium sequitur principale. Rev. Civil Code, art. 3285. The consequence was that the legal mortgage of the minors, duly recorded on the 10th of December, 1881, in consequence of the lapse of the privilege and mortgage securing the three prescribed notes, ascended and took precedence, and is entitled to a preference. Nevertheless Hebert had the right, before prescription had extinguished the last two matured notes, to acknowledge them, as he did, in the extension act, and thus to interrupt prescription, and the privilege and mortgage securing them on the undivided half bought could be and was maintained. It was a community debt, and the acknowledgment was made bona fide and rightfully. He was unquestionably at the time owner of one-half of that half, or one-fourth of the whole, and the usufructuary of the remaining like share. The act of extension shows that he was dealt with in that capacity, and thus implies an inheritance by the minors of their mother's share by her death. It was unnecessary for him to have acted avowedly, as tutor of the minors, in order to bind them by such acts, and continue the debt as a community debt, secured in the same way that it was from the beginning. The departure from the old jurisprudence, for a while, in this respect, has been repudiated, and the powers of surviving husbands continue shackled to a certain extent. There can be no doubt that, notwithstanding the pact de non alienando,—the object of which was merely to dispense with the hypothecary action eventually to enforce payment, but not to prevent the purchaser, although part of the price was unpaid and secured by privilege and mortgage on the property, from disposing of it by transfer or mortgage, in subordination of the vendor's claim, as long as valid,—the property could pass from Hebert by a complete divestiture of him. Hence he could have surrendered it to his creditors, and transmitted it by succession to his heirs, and his wife, common in property with him, could, under the law, notwithstanding any adverse will on his part, have acquired half of it at the dissolution of the community by judgment, and have transmitted, by her death, to her heirs, the same share therein, (minors being always beneficiary heirs,) as it actually happened in the present instance; but, of course, such transfer, as well by reason of the pact as of the law and sheer justice and equity, could not pass title to the prejudice of the anterior vendor's privilege and mortgage, securing payment of his just debt. The ownership passed cum onere, vesting a defeasible title, susceptible of divestiture, in case of non-payment of that claim and by proceedings directed alone against the original purchaser, regardless of subsequent transfers or incumbrances, in whatever form or under whatever circumstances made. Hence it is that, when the plaintiff brought this suit, she acted legally, clothed with the right of divesting Hebert and any subsequent owner or owners of the title in subjection of the undivided half of the plantation to the payment of what was due her, which happens to be only the amount of the two last matured notes, falling due on February 4–7, 1885, and February 4–7, 1886, as to which prescription was interrupted by acknowledgment and promise to pay in the extension notarial act of January 17, 1890, and which, on the day of the sheriff's adjudication, amounted in capital and interest from date to a figure which it is unnecessary to state presently; so that, when the undivided half of the property was adjudicated to Mrs. Gay, it passed absolutely to her, regardless of the inheritance of half thereof by the minors from their mother, who could not transmit to her heirs by succession more rights than she would have acquired on a dissolution of the community by judgment. The undivided half having been adjudicated for $7,500, the plaintiff is entitled to apply the same to the extinguishment or payment of the two last matured notes in capital, interest, and costs, absolutely, and to retain the balance of the price as accruing one-half unconditionally to the minors, as representing their share of inheritance, and the other half to Hebert, subject to any claim which the minors may have against him, at the termination of the tutorship, upon an account properly rendered contradictorily with all concerned; the whole of said balance so retained to remain secured by vendor's privilege on said undivided half, and to bear legal interest from the date of the sheriff's adjudication until legally deposited to be relieved from interest, or paid over to the tutor, for account of the minors and also for his own account, under suitable judicial proceedings to be had for the purpose. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and it is now adjudged that the third opposition of the under-tutor be sustained in part and dismissed in part, and that plaintiff's reconventional demand thereagainst be likewise sustained and dismissed; and accordingly it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff or her succession be recognized as the absolute owner of the undivided half of the Dunboyne plantation herein seized and adjudicated to her. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the proceeds of the sale of said plantation retained by the plaintiff be distributed as follows, viz.: That the plaintiff apply as much thereof as may be necessary to pay herself the amount of the last two notes sued on, maturing in 1885 and 1886, as stated in the opinion, in capital, interest, attorney's fees thereon, and costs of suit, up to the day of adjudication, and retain the residue of the said proceeds, the same to accrue as follows: One-half thereof to the minors herein, represented by the under-tutor, and the remaining half to the defendant Hebert, subject to the rights of the minors against him, at the termination of the tutorship; the same, while thus retained, to remain secured by vendor's privilege on said undivided half of said Dunboyne plantation, and to bear legal interest, as stated in the opinion, until legally deposited or paid over, as likewise therein mentioned. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the third opposition and the reconventional demand thereagainst, in so far as not sustained, be dismissed, and that the rights of the minors against their tutor, not passed upon, be reserved for future action. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff pay costs in the lower court, from the filing of the third opposition of the under-tutor, and that plaintiff and the third opponent pay, share alike, the costs of appeal.

ON REHEARING.

There appears on the note at three years an acknowledgment of indebtedness purporting to have been made on the 10th of January, 1889, before five years had run from the maturity; but the date at which it was made has not been proved. The offering of the indorsement during the trial proved the genuineness of the writing, but did not establish its date. Writings under private signature, offered in evidence, have, as to third persons, no other date than that at which they are thus offered. The authentic act of acknowledgment was executed after the five years, and fixed the date of acknowledgment only as to the notes maturing in 1885 and 1886. Justice will not permit that the note at three years, which is for part of the price of sale, be treated as prescribed, when it may not be so, and the absence of proof is an oversight. The right to recover its amount, if prescription was truly interrupted, should be reserved, and the decree shaped to that end. Norres v. Hayes, 42 La. Ann. 858, 8 South. Rep. 606. It is therefore ordered that the previous decree be amended so as to reserve the right of the succession of plaintiff to prove the date of the acknowledgment of the note at three years; that a sufficient amount be retained from the price of the adjudication to meet it and the two other notes, and that to that end the case be remanded, with instructions to allow that note if the acknowledgment is proved to have been made at the date it purports to have been made; and that, as thus amended, the previous decree be confirmed and remain undisturbed.

STANTON v. HARVEY. (No. 11,011.)[1]

LEASE IN NAME OF WIFE—LIABILITY OF HUSBAND—LEX LOCI SOLUTIONIS.

Rent due under a lease entered into by a husband in the name of his wife, though the lease was signed in another state, the place of their domicile, for property situate in this state, can be claimed from the husband. It is a community debt, incurred by him, for which he is liable, and can be made to pay. It is to be regulated by the lex loci solutionis, which thus fixes the responsibility.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Concordia; S. CHARLES YOUNG, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. H. L. Stanton against W. H. Harvey for the rent of property leased by him in the name of his wife. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Luce & Lemle, for appellant. Elam & Dagg, for appellee.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This is a suit to hold a husband liable for the rent of property leased by him in the name of his wife. The property lies in Louisiana, and the husband and wife were, at the date of the contract, residents of another state. The defense is that the defendant did not lease for his account, but for that of his wife; that he is not liable, but that she is. From a judgment condemning him to pay he appeals. The contention is that, under the laws of the domicile of the parties, the wife could lease the property for her own account; that the husband would not, in such case, be liable for the rent due under it; that the contract was entered into at that domicile, and that the wife is alone responsible. The laws of the place of the domicile where the contract was entered into and the domicile of the parties play no important part in this litigation. The same laws exist in this state, as a married woman may here lease property for her individual account; but this she can do only if she have the means necessary, and can show that the contract was entered into for her exclusive benefit, and not for that of her husband, or of the community, if any, between them. The law which is to govern in this controversy is not, however, that of the place at which the contract was formed, lex loci contractus, but that of the place at which it is to be executed, the lex loci solutionis. It is a well-recognized principle that each sovereignty has the right of regulating the acquisition of property within its terminal boundaries, and to fix the nature of its character. Hence it is that the lawgiver has declared that all property acquired in this state, by non-resident married persons, whether the title thereto be in the name of the husband or wife or their joint names, shall be subject to the same provisions of law which regulate the community of acquets and gains between citizens of this state. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2400. It is apparent that, had property been purchased situate in this state, by the wife, whether acting in person or through an authorized agent, with the sanction of the husband, that property would have become prima facie, at least, community property, whatever the domicile of the purchaser would have been, here or out of the state, and would have been thus dealt with, until the wife had proved that the purchase was made for her separate account, with her individual funds, and in no way for account of her husband or the community. Had the lease been signed by the wife with the authority of the husband, it would have been as much a community contract as it is when signed by the husband for the wife. In the absence of such proof, had any portion of the price of sale remained unpaid, suit could have been brought for it against the husband, as head and master, and as such alone responsible, and judgment could have been recovered. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2404. It would have been a community debt. This applies, whatever the property might be, for the law does not discriminate, and place any limit or characterize the same. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2402. It merely considers the date of the purchase, and not the person who made it. It needs no reasoning or authority to show that the husband, as head and master of the community, is liable for its debts contracted by him, for which the wife is not responsible, and which anyhow would be his, community or no community. It is unnecessary to determine whether a lease is real or personal property, as its character, in that respect, is no factor in this case. It is sufficient that it be a contract under which a right which is property has been acquired. Being property, it falls under the provisions of laws quoted, which apply as well to residents as to non-residents, and therefore to the defendant, for he is either the one or the other. Non-residents surely cannot claim to be placed on a better footing than residents. Where they do so pretend, they must show clearly that they are entitled to the preference. The right to enjoy the property leased was therefore a community asset, and failure to pay for it can be saddled on the husband. Judgment affirmed.

CITIZENS' BANK OF LOUISIANA v. MILLER et al., (EXCELSIOR PLANTING & MANUF'G. CO. et al., Interveners.) (No. 11,009.)[1]

SAME v. OBER & SONS CO. et al. (No. 11,009.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. March 7, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

MORTGAGES—PACT DE NON ALIENANDO—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER—COMPENSATION FOR IMPROVEMENTS.

1. The pact de non alienando inserted in a mortgage is nothing more than the expression in the act of a principle which, by the terms of article 3397 of the Rev. Civil Code, is, without any expression, conclusively implied in every mortgage.

2. The effect given to the pact under our jurisprudence rests on no general principle of our existing law, but simply on a judicial interpretation of its effect as a contract between the parties. The pact historically considered. Donaldson v. Maurin, 1 La. 89.

3. That effect is clearly defined and limited to be nothing more than the conferring of authority to seize the property, in the hands of a third possessor by proceedings directly against the original mortgagor without notice to third possessors or other preliminary proceedings required in the ordinary hypothecation.

4. The pact de non alienando does not prevent the alienation of the property, nor does it deprive the alienees of any right appertaining to third possessors, except so far as concerns the method of proceeding above indicated.

5. Hence a purchaser of property subject to a mortgage containing the pact is a third possessor, within the purview of article 3407, and entitled to claim compensation for his improvements to the extent they have enhanced the value of the mortgage security.

6. The improvements fall under the mortgage and are subject to seizure and sale; but equity requires that the third possessor should be indemnified to the extent that he has enhanced the value of the creditor's security.

7. In determining the amount recoverable the sole question is the extent to which they have enhanced the value. Repairs which only preserve the thing are not recoverable, only those improvements which increase the value.

8. Assumptions contained in contracts to which the bank was not party have no effect in its favor except as stipulations pour autrui, of which the bank might have availed itself by accepting them, but which, until acceptance, were revocable, and conferred no right on the bank.

9. Acceptance by the bank would have made it a party to the contract, which it would have been bound to respect. Its whole course in the case has been an absolute repudiation of these contracts as in no manner affecting it, and it is estopped from claiming uno flatu an acceptance.

10. Where a seizure takes place during the pendency of a plantation lease for the entire year, payable in kind out of the crops when gathered, the seizure only covers the proportion of rents due for the unexpired term after its date.

11. The suing creditor is also responsible for its like proportion of the necessary expenses of management required to realize the crops, and which it left undisturbed after seizure.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Concordia; S. CHARLES YOUNG, Judge.

Two actions,—one by the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana against David F. Miller and others to foreclose a mortgage; the other by same plaintiff against G. Ober & Sons Company and others, to recover rent. In the former plaintiff obtained an order of seizure and sale, and the Excelsior Planting & Manufacturing Company and J. K. Ober and others intervene. The actions were consolidated. From the judgments plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Luce & Lemle and Henry C. Miller, for appellant. Elam & Dagg, for third opponents, appellees.

FENNER, J. The Citizens' Bank is the holder of a mortgage on the Point Pleasant plantation, executed, in its favor, by David F. Miller, in 1838, and containing the pact de non alienando. In the long period since the date of the mortgage the property has experienced several changes of ownership. In the year 1882 its then owners transferred the property to the Excelsior Planting & Manufacturing Company, which was the owner and possessor in 1891, when the Citizens' Bank, proceeding via executiva directly against the heirs of the original mortgagor, David F. Miller, obtained an order of seizure and sale in foreclosure of their mortgage. In this proceeding intervened the Excelsior Planting Company, claiming that during its ownership and possession of the property it had placed thereon valuable improvements, which had enhanced its value, and that to the extent of the enhanced value it was entitled to be reimbursed out of the proceeds of sale. J. K. Ober et al., mortgage creditors of the Excelsior Company, also intervened, claiming a ranking mortgage on whatever might be found due to their debtor for improvements. The Citizens' Bank opposes the claims of interveners on various grounds, which will now be considered and disposed of seriatim, forming the issues involved in the first of these consolidated cases, which, though disposed of by one judgment, are entirely independent of each other.

First. The bank claims that a purchaser of property subject to a mortgage containing the pact de non alienando stands in the shoes of the original mortgage debtor, and cannot, any more than that debtor himself, claim reimbursement on account of improvements made on the property; in other words, that he is not, in the eye of the law, a third possessor, and is not, therefore, entitled to the protection of the article 3407, Rev. Civil Code, which is the basis of interveners' claim, and which reads as follows: "The deteriorations which proceed from the deed or neglect of the third possessor to the prejudice of the creditors who have a privilege or mortgage give rise against the former to an action of indemnification; but he can claim for his expenses or improvements only to the amount of the increased value which is the result of the improvements made." The question raised is an interesting one, and we have considered it very closely. To the student of our Codes the effect given to the pact de non alienando is an anomaly, only explained by reference to its derivation in our law from the Spanish system. The pact is nothing else than the expression in the act of mortgage of a principle which, by the very terms of article 3397 of the Code, is, without any expression, implied in every mortgage, viz.: "That the debtor cannot sell, engage, or mortgage the same property to other persons, to the prejudice of the mortgage which is already made to another creditor." It is difficult to understand why the fact that this principle is expressed in the act should confer any different rights than would result from its conclusive implication. There is no express provision in either our Civil Code or Code of Practice on the subject; and in the French law, from which our system of mortgages is derived, this pact de non alienando is not recognized as conferring any particular right. Under the Spanish law, however, which long prevailed in this state, the holder of a mortgage containing this pact was allowed to disregard subsequent alienations, and to proceed directly against the original mortgagor, and have the property seized and sold without notice to actual third possessors, which was required in other cases. After the adoption of our Code of 1808 the question arose as to whether this effect of the pact was not destroyed; but the court held that "the mode of proceeding under orders of seizure and sale is still regulated in a great measure by the Spanish laws which remain in force in this country," and that the mortgagee's right under the pact de non alienando was not repealed. Nathan v. Lee, 2 Mart. (N. S.) 32.

After the act of 1828, which repealed the Spanish laws and rules of proceeding, the question again arose, and it was contended "that there is now no express law in force to support any exception to the rules of proceeding established by the Code of Practice for hypothecary actions." But the court said: "Admitting this to be true, it is a universal principle, founded in reason and law, that effect must be given to all the parties of a written contract or agreement, and meaning to all its stipulations and phrases, unless such a construction leads to absurdity. It is also a general rule that owners of property must be presumed to know the titles and incumbrances under which they hold it. In applying these rules to the case under consideration, it is evident that the mortgagee intended some advantage to himself by the introduction of the clause 'de non alienando,' consented to on the part of the mortgagor, beyond what he would have had without such a pact or agreement, and that the only manner in which it can have the effect intended by the parties is to construe it into an authority to seize the property in the hands of the third possessors, without preliminary proceedings, as in case of an ordinary hypothecation." Donaldson v. Maurin, 1 La. 39. This decision is the fountain head of our whole subsequent jurisprudence on this subject. We consider that it conclusively negatives the contention so ably urged by counsel of appellants. It distinctly holds that, after the repeal of the Spanish law formerly prevailing in this state, there remained in force no law giving any exceptional effect to the pact de non alienando, and that whatever effect it had was derived from that law which the parties made unto themselves by their contract. It interpreted the meaning and effect of that contract, and declared that its only effect was to authorize a direct seizure in the hands of third possessors, "without preliminary proceedings, as in case of an ordinary hypothecation." There are not wanting very clear reiterations of this principle in later cases. On this point the court in the case of Watson v. Bondurant, 30 La. Ann. 10, said: "We understand the effect of the pact de non alienando to be this: Where a mortgage contains this stipulation, the sale by the mortgagor does not prevent the mortgagee from proceeding by executory process, and he need give no notice to the purchaser. * * * A little reflection will show that the pact de non alienando contains nothing that the law does not imply in every mortgage." Again, in Ducros v. Fortin, 8 Rob. (La.) 167, the court said: "We do not consider the clause "de non alienando" as producing the effects supposed by the counsel. It does not absolutely prevent a sale of the property by the mortgagor. The latter may transfer the property subject to the right which such a clause gives the mortgagee of proceeding summarily against it, as if it still belonged to the mortgagor. The purchaser acquires a valid title which he can, in like manner, transfer to others." In Linn v. Dee, 31 La. Ann. 218, the right of the purchaser of property subject to a mortgage containing the pact, to recover for improvements, was expressly recognized. See, also, Ducros v. Fortin, 8 Rob. (La.) 167; Jamison v. Barelli, 20 La. Ann. 453. The correctness of this is conspicuously illustrated by the particular form given to the pact in the very mortgage on which the bank proceeds, and which is derived from section 24 of the charter, as follows: "That all property mortgaged to said corporation for any purposes may be seized and sold at any time, according to law, in whosesoever hands or possession the same may be, notwithstanding any alienation thereof, or change of possession, by succession or descent to heirs or legatees, by last will and testament or otherwise, in the same manner as if the same was in the possession of the original mortgagor." This is the only pact of nonalienation contained in the charter or mortgage, and it has been held by this court to be the exact equivalent of the common pact de non alienando. Gillaspie v. Bank, 30 La. Ann. 1321; Bank v. Freitag, 37 La. Ann. 271. Now, this section simply expresses in plain language the precise sense and meaning which the jurisprudence above referred to had held to be implied in the pact de non alienando, conferring no exceptional right beyond that therein stated of proceeding directly against the property without notice to third possessors. The learned lawyers who framed this charter in 1835 were obviously doubtful whether, under the changed law, the interpretation given to the ordinary pact would be maintained, and preferred to give a clearer expression to their contracts. They have done so, and can claim nothing beyond what their contract gives them. This they have been allowed, and have actually proceeded, in this case, by executory process against the original mortgage, without notice to third possessors, in the very manner stipulated by their contract.

The apprehension suggested by counsel that mortgage creditors may be deprived of their security by ruinous improvements on the part of third possessors, has no greater application to the case of mortgages in which the nonalienation pact is expressed than in that of all others in which the law itself writes it; and, besides, it has no foundation under a just application of the principle. The improvements, by whomsoever made, fall under the mortgage. If they have not actually enhanced the value of the property, the mortgagee absorbs them without compensation. If they have enhanced the value of the property, why should the mortgagee enrich himself at the expense of the third possessor? In the language of Troplong: "There is no room for doubt that improvements placed by a third possessor fall under the mortgage, and are subject to seizure for its satisfaction; but equity requires that the third possessor should be indemnified to the extent that they have enhanced the value of the property quatenus res pretiosior facta est; for the creditors who dispossess him should not be permitted to enrich themselves at his expense." 3 Troplong, Hyp et Priv. No. 836. Or, as Pont says: "From a sense of equity, the legislator who forbids the third possessor to injure the creditor by deteriorating the security while in his possession will not, on the other hand, permit the creditors to profit gratuitously by his improvements. Therefore the law, after announcing the principle of indemnity for deteriorations, by a just reciprocity assures to the third possessor the reclamation of the enhanced value given by his improvements." 2 Pont, Priv. et Hyp, No. 1205. This is justice; and it is undoubtedly the law applicable equally to all mortgages, whether the pact de non alienando be expressed or only implied in the contract.

Second. The bank further contends that the planting company and its authors, by reason of their assumptions contained in their contracts with each other, have become personally bound to the bank for the debt secured by its mortgage, and that this prevents them from asserting any claim for improvements. These assumptions are contained in contracts between these parties, to which the bank was in no manner a party. They can have no effect in favor of the bank except as stipulations pour autrui, of which, perhaps, the bank might have availed itself by accepting them, but which, up to the time of such acceptance, were revocable between the parties, and conferred no right whatever on the bank. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1890; Gravier v. Gravier, 3 Mart. (N. S.) 207; Wiggin v. Flower, 5 Rob. (La.) 406; Mitchell v. Cooley, Id. 240. The bank has never accepted. If it had done so, it would thereby have made itself a party to those contracts, which it would thereafter have been bound to recognize and respect. Mitchell v. Cooley, Id. 240. While such acceptance would not have operated an ovation of the debt, it would unquestionably have disabled the bank from disregarding these alienations to which it had thus made itself a party. The proceeding in this case, and all the contentions of counsel which we have considered, are based upon the assumption that the bank is in no manner affected by those alienations; that, as to it, they produced no effect, and that it was entitled to treat them as if they did not exist. It is impossible to say this, and then, uno flatu, to say: "I have accepted these stipulations, have made myself a party to these contracts, and hold you bound by them." The case of Latiolais v. Bank, 33 La. Ann. 1444, only held that by the acceptance of such an assumption the bank did not waive the pact de non alienando so far as the original mortgagee was concerned, who was the only party urging it. We said: "The pact de non alienando was not abandoned; on the contrary, it was carried out by the proceedings against Sproule and others. Admitting that it was, however, what is it to the plaintiff, who is the administratrix of the succession of the original mortgagor, whether it ever existed at all?" No one could question the correctness of this decision, but it has no application to the point here at issue which concerns only the rights of third possessors. It is too late for the bank now to urge an acceptance of these stipulations, and it is conclusively estopped from doing so.

Third. The final question, under this branch of the case, is as to the settlement of the amount due for improvements. The principle applicable is very clearly stated by Toullier: "The third possessor can recover only for improvements quæ rem maliorem faciunt, and not for those quæ rem deteriorem non sinunt. The only question is to ascertain if there has been an enhancement of value. Whether such enhancement result from expenses necessary in their origin, but carried to the point of improvement, or whether they resulted from less urgent expenses, matters nothing. If there has been an enhancement, the right arises to claim it to the extent of the increased value. If there has been no enhancement, the third possessor has no recourse except against his vendor." 3 Trop. Priv. et Hyp. No. 838, (bis,) p. 505. We have examined the evidence in the case very critically. No doubt some of the improvements claimed belong to the class of ordinary repairs, merely intended to preserve the status quo, which the possessor was bound to make, and for neglect to make which he would have been responsible under article 3407 as "deteriorations proceeding from his neglect." Of course, these could not operate to enhance, but only to maintain, the value. But the new church, the new cabins, the new fences, the new levee, and, perhaps, to some extent, the extensive repairs to the dwelling-house, are certainly entitled to consideration. The following decisions, relied on by counsel for appellant, do not apply to this case: Daquin v. Colron, 8 La. 398; Haynes v. Harbour, 14 La. Ann. 237; McKenzie v. Bacon, 41 La. Ann. 13, 5 South. Rep. 640. They relate to controversies between evicted possessors and their warrantors or vendors, or between such mere possessors in good faith and the true owner, which rest on different principles. In those cases the benefits derived by the possessor from his improvements, as well as their cost, are to be considered. Here we have nothing to do with either benefits or cost, except with the latter as limiting the possible claim of the third possessor. We have simply to inquire whether the improvements have enhanced the value, or are of a nature which only prevented deterioration. The improvements are not to be considered separately, but in block, and it is to be determined whether as a whole they have enhanced the value of the security, and to what extent. The estimates of various witnesses on this precise question are found in the record. They differ widely. We think the judge a qua made, in his judgment, a very conservative and satisfactory estimate; and, while both parties complain, we should not feel that by disturbing we could improve it.

2. The suit of Bank v. Ober & Sons Co. et al. is to recover rents alleged to have been collected by the latter after the date of the bank's seizure in the case just decided. It appears that early in 1891 Ober and others, vendors of the Excelsior Company, had issued a seizure and sale in foreclosure of their mortgage, under which the property was taken in possession by the sheriff. In that suit it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that the sheriff should cultivate the property, provided the plaintiffs would furnish the means, the expenses up to date of sale to be taxed as costs; and D. M. Slocum was appointed as custodian and manager. Slocum made contracts with tenants by which the land was leased for the year for rents payable in kind out of the crops. Defendants in this case furnished the tenants with mules and teams to work the land, and also advanced them supplies. In May, 1891, the bank issued its executory process, and seized the property. After this seizure, the cultivation and management of the plantation went on as before. Slocum remained in charge, and devoted his time as manager, without interference by the bank. As the crop was gathered and ginned, he collected the rents. After he had collected rents to the extent of 8,271 pounds of lint cotton, the bank, under an order from the sheriff, demanded delivery thereof, and it was handed over to the bank. He refused to give to the bank any more of the rent cotton, the balance of which was shipped for account of defendants. The total rent cotton collected was 22,000 pounds, worth in all about $1,800, of which, as above stated, the bank received 8,271 pounds, worth about $700. It is claimed that defendants must pay over, without deduction, the whole of the rent collected. We consider the claim inequitable, and untenable in law. The rent, though it became due after the bank's seizure, was contracted for and attributable to the year, and the defendants were entitled to the proportion thereof due on account of the part of the year which had expired prior to the bank's seizure, which took place on May 1st, being four months, or one-third of the total rents. The bank should also be held for two-thirds of the expenses of Mr. Slocum's management and services, which are shown to have been worth about $800, and which were necessary to the realization of the rents. A brief calculation on this basis will show that there remained due to the bank out of the rents just about the sum decreed in the judgment of the court below, which we see no reason to alter. Judgment affirmed.

PATUREAU v. MCCARDLE et al. (No. 10,996.)

A. WILBERTE SONS LUMBER & SHINGLE CO. v. PATUREAU. (No. 10,996.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. March 7, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

JOINT TENANCY—REMOVAL OF TIMBER—LIABILITY—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. A joint owner of swamp land is at liberty to cut and remove timber from the community, without becoming amenable to charge of tort or trespass, as against the co-proprietor.

2. In such case, the person cutting and removing timber, for purposes of manufacture without waste or other destruction to the premises, is not liable ex delicto, but ex quasi contractu; and the measure of damages is the value of the trees when taken at the stump.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Iberville; E. B. TALBOT, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Emma Patureau against Frederick Wilberte McCardle and others to recover damages to the amount of $3,366, as the value of her alleged half interest in certain cypress trees which had been cut and removed from land of which she was half owner with A. Wilberte Sons Lumber & Shingle Co. This action was consolidated with a suit by A. Wilberte Sons Lumber & Shingle Company against Mrs. Emma Patureau for the partition of the common property by licitation. Defendants consented to a sale. Judgment for plaintiff for $412, from which she appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel Matthews, for appellant. Sims & Gondran and A. Talbot, for appellees.

WATKINS, J. In the former of these consolidated causes the plaintiff seeks to recover of the several defendants damages in solido to the amount of $3,366, as the value of her alleged one-half interest in 1,122 cypress trees that they had wrongfully and tortiously cut, felled, and removed from a certain tract of swamp land, designated as section 62, township 9, of range 10 E., situated west of the Mississippi river, of which she was at the time half-owner with the plaintiffs in the latter of said consolidated causes, same being a suit for the partition of the common property by licitation. Some resistance was at first made on the part of the plaintiff Patureau to the order of consolidation, and to an adverse ruling in this regard she reserved a bill. She also appeared and filed an answer in the partition suit, and insisted upon a division in kind. But she subsequently appeared in the consolidated cases, and filed a waiver of her demand for a partition in kind, and consented that a sale be made; thus practically renouncing her objection to the consolidation of the two causes, as her consent to the sale necessarily abandoned her claim to a severance. This leaves but one issue in the case,—the value of the trees. The judge a qua found the number of trees cut to be 824, and fixed their value at $1 apiece at the stump; and gave plaintiff judgment for $412, or one-half of their value. From that decree plaintiff Patureau appeals, and demands an increased allowance.

Whether or not the amount of the judgment should be increased depends upon one ruling of the judge a qua, rejecting evidence of "the market value" of the raw material, that is to say, the value of the trees for the purpose of their manufacture into lumber, thus restricting the plaintiff to the value of the trees as they were taken in the forest. His theory was that, inasmuch as the Wilberte Sons Lumber & Shingle Company was the half owner with Mrs. Patureau of the lands, as well as all the timber growing thereon, they had a perfect right to cut and remove the timber therefrom without becoming amenable to a charge of trespass on the part of the co-proprietor; and, possessing that right, it had a corresponding right to contract with others to cut and remove timber for it without their becoming thus amenable; hence defendants are not liable ex delicto, but only ex quasi contractu. This proposition is not quite clear, or altogether free from difficulty; but we cannot see how defendants can be held liable for tort or trespass on land in which they have one-half interest, to the other co-proprietor, by the simple cutting and removing of trees for manufacture and sale, in the ordinary course of affairs, and without waste or destruction. A simple course is always open to a dissatisfied co-proprietor,—a suit for partition,—and that has been availed of. Under the law and evidence the judgment appealed from seems to have done substantial justice, and it is affirmed.

CALHOUN v. McKNIGHT et al. (No. 10,987.)[1]

WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—REVIEW ON APPEAL—PRESUMPTION OF FRAUD.

1. Evidence of extrajudicial admissions by a dead man, out of the presence of others, is the weakest of all testimony.

2. In cases of conflicting evidence, the judgment of the judge a qua will not be disturbed except on clear showing of error.

3. Fraud is never presumed. While it may be inferred from circumstances, these must be of a character clearly convincing the judicial mind in order to support the charge of an offense closely akin to crime.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Grant; A. V. Coco, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. C. E. P. Calhoun, as executrix of William S. Calhoun, deceased, and as tutrix of his only surviving child and sole heir, against Mrs. Elizabeth McKnight, as administratrix, and others, for the restoration of certain lands. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing refused.

Hunter & Hunter, for appellant. T. H. Thorpe and Andrew Thorpe, for appellees.

FENNER, J. The plaintiff sues as the legal representative of the succession of William S. Calhoun, deceased, and as tutrix of his only surviving child and sole heir. The petition avers that William S. Calhoun was the sole heir of his father, Meredith Calhoun; that he had accepted his succession unconditionally, and been put in possession by a decree of court; and that Howard McKnight was administrator of the succession of Meredith Calhoun from May, 1882, to the date of his acceptance of said succession, January 29, 1887; and that W. S. Calhoun died January 4, 1891. Howard McKnight, as administrator, secured orders, and procured three succession sales of the lands of the succession of Meredith Calhoun, had on the 4th day of November and 2d day of December, 1882, and on the 17th day of February, 1883. The petition charges that at these several succession sales, while he was administrator, and in violation of his duty and the prohibitory statute, Howard McKnight, having formed a conspiracy and had an understanding with his son-in-law, John H. Mc-

[1] Rehearing refused April 4, 1892.

Neely, Ludlow McNeely, the brother of J. H. McNeely, and George S. Johnson, through these several persons interposed, purchased the property described in the petition, and which it is sought to recover from his succession and heirs. The petition then avers the nullity of these sales by reason of said conspiracy and the prohibition of the law, and asks for the restoration of the lands, for judgment for rents, and for the value of timber cut from off the pine lands. All parties in interest were made parties and cited. The district judge gave judgment in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from that judgment.

The defendants pleaded various estoppels by judicial admissions and by conduct, and also the general issue. Waiving consideration of the estoppels pleaded, except in so far as the facts on which they are based bear upon the merits, we are clearly of opinion that the case is with the defendants under the general issue. McKnight, the administrator of Meredith Calhoun's succession, was not a bidder or an adjudicatee at the sale made therein. The property was adjudicated to John H. McNeely, Ludlow McNeely, and George S. Johnson, who acted for himself and his father, John W. Johnson, jointly, receiving title in their joint names,—persons entirely competent to buy at the sale. The plaintiff's case rests upon the charge that these adjudicatees were mere nominal purchasers interposed by McKnight to evade the prohibition of the law against such purchases by administrators, and to acquire the property in their names, but for his account and benefit. This charge rests upon the testimony of two witnesses, detailing conversations had with McKnight and with John H. McNeely before and after the date of the sale. These conversations are said to have taken place out of the presence of any third person. At the date of testifying, McKnight had been dead for several years, and the statements as to him could not be contradicted. McNeely, however, testified, squarely denying the statements attributed to him, and vindicating thoroughly the reality and honesty of his purchase. J. W. Johnson, a venerable man of 84 years, also testified, denying any interest or concern of McKnight in the joint purchase made by him and his son, and declaring the absolute reality and honesty of their action. If McNeely is believed, the evidence of the two opposing witnesses falls under the principle, falsus in uno falsus in omnibus. Witnesses are to be weighed, not counted. We do not know these persons who thus contradict each other. The district judge, presumably, does know them. He evidently gave credence to the witnesses of the defendants, and there is nothing in this record that would justify us in disturbing his conclusion in a matter on which he had so much greater advantages for judging than we have. Moreover, it has passed into an axiom of the law of evidence that parol testimony as to extrajudicial admissions made by a dead man, and out of the presence of others, is the weakest kind of evidence. It further appears, from the statement of these witnesses themselves, that they communicated the substance of these reported conversations to William S. Calhoun, the father of these plaintiffs, and the little reliance he placed upon them is illustrated by the fact that, instead of acting on them, he, in many ways not necessary here to recite, recognized the validity of these sales, and that, though informed of every fact now relied on to support this charge of fraud, he died without taking any steps to attack or impugn them.

Outside of the testimony of these witnesses, all other circumstances relied on by plaintiff in support of her theory are readily explicable on grounds entirely consistent with the honesty of the transactions attacked. Fraud is never presumed. While courts recognize the cunning concealment in which it shrouds its devious practices, and the difficulty of tracing it by direct proof, and therefore give due weight to all circumstances indicating its existence, yet such circumstances must be of a character to convince the mind clearly before they can support a conviction of such an offense, almost akin to crime. We rise from a careful study of this record without feeling any such conviction in the present case, and satisfied that the judgment appealed from accords with the law and the evidence.

STATE v. CURTIS et al. (No. 10,985.)

AMENDMENT OF INFORMATION.

1. The defendants were prosecuted by information filed. It contained two counts, one for burglary and one for larceny. The verdict was, guilty in manner and form as charged. In framing the information the district attorney in the allegations as to burglary made the proper recitals. In the count for larceny he used the language proper in an indictment. On the day he filed the information he discovered the error, and under section 1047, Rev. St., amended the same. Held, that the recitals in the information were clerical errors, and the information could be properly amended. The verdict was a general one, and responsive to the information, and was valid.

2. When the information charges that four pairs of shoes and four pairs of pants were stolen, it is sufficient description of the property.

3. Irregularities imputable to the jury commission cannot be taken advantage of, unless the injury is such as is described in section 10, Act No. 44, of 1877.

4. Motions to set aside the venire must be filed on the first day of the term. When the indictment or information has been presented at a previous term, the objections to the venire, drawn at a subsequent term, must be urged on the first day of the term, unless it is shown that the facts upon which the motion was based were of such a character that it was impossible for the defendant to know them until after the commencement of the term.

5. On an application for a change of venue, the defendant must give notice of its filing in a reasonable time to the district attorney.

6. In ruling on applications for change of venue, the trial judge is vested with a certain discretion, that will not be disturbed unless his rulings are manifestly erroneous.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Acadia; E. T. LEWIS, Judge.

Conviction of Richard A. Curtis and others for burglary and larceny. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph A. Chargois and E. P. Veazie, for appellants. Walter H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

McENERY, J. The defendants were indicted for burglary, convicted, and sentenced to hard labor for three years. They have appealed. The defendants were prosecuted by information. In the information there are two counts,—one for burglary, and the other for larceny. In the second count the district attorney, in framing the information, probably using a blank form for the purpose, charges that "the grand jurors aforesaid, under their oaths aforesaid, do further present," etc. The district attorney, on discovering the error on the same day, moved to amend the information so as to insert, instead of the above words, the proper allegations. The information was amended in accordance with the motion. The accused objected that the information purported to be an indictment, and to change it as requested by the district attorney was altering it in substance. The grand jury never presented the indictment. The prosecution was by information. The error was purely clerical, and the court, under section 1047, Rev. St., was authorized to permit the amendment. The defendants further objected that the amended information served on them was not a correct copy of the indictment. If the original had been served, it would have been sufficient, as the amendment was not one of substance, but of form only. The information contains two counts,—for burglary and larceny. The first is properly charged. The verdict was a general one, of guilty in manner and form as charged in the information. This is sufficient to obviate the objection of defendants.

In the second, objection is made to the description of the offense charged. It is alleged that the articles alleged to have been stolen were not described with sufficient particularity. They are particularized as four pairs of shoes, four pairs of pants, one lot of jewelry, one lot of shirts, cravats. The description is sufficient, as the articles stolen are in part described with as much certainty as it would be possible to give by alleging the exact number of articles stolen.

The defendants complain of the denial of their applications for a change of venue. The defendants neglected to give the notice required by section 1023, Rev. St., to the district attorney. In the matter of granting the application for a change of venue, the district judge is vested with a latitude of discretion, and his rulings in these matters, like those in matters of continuance, will not be disturbed, unless manifestly erroneous. The motion was demurred to, and during its consideration the counsel for the accused required the introduction of testimony on the motion. The fact that the motion was filed at a late day in the progress of the case, without notice to the district attorney, and was taken up to be disposed of before any request was made for the introduction of testimony, leads us to believe, with the trial judge, that the motion was for delay. The defendants moved to quash the venire because the general venire box was not kept locked, and the names of jurors drawn were not written on the slips by the clerk of court. These were irregularities imputable to the commissioners, and, in order to serve the defendants, it must be shown that they have suffered some injury, or some fraud has been practiced, as designated in section 10, Act No. 44 of 1877. State v. Taylor, 43 La. Ann. 1131, 10 South. Rep. 203; State v. McCarthy, (La.) 10 South. Rep. 673, (not yet officially reported.)

In the same motion the additional reasons are assigned for quashing the venire drawn for the second week of the term, that some of the jury commissioners who drew the jury were disqualified to act, having accepted offices since their appointment as jury commissioners, which vacated the latter. We have held that, when the accused was put on trial during the term the indictment was found, he could, after the first day of the term, file a motion to quash the venire. State v. Ashworth, 41 La. Ann. 683, 6 South. Rep. 556. The defendant was indicted November, 1891. This motion was filed January 19, 1892, at a subsequent term of the court, eight days after the commencement of the term. The case was fixed, without objection, for trial January 18, 1892, and on this day refixed for the 20th. The defendants make oath that these facts as to the disqualifications of the jury commissioners have come to their knowledge since the 18th day of January, the day on which the case was fixed for trial. The accused have failed to show these facts could not have been ascertained by them by diligent inquiry. They were all matters of record in the parish of Acadia, and could have been easily ascertained. The motion was filed too late.

Judgment affirmed.

ON REHEARING.

(March 21, 1892.)

The assignment of errors, filed herein before submission, was misplaced and not brought to our attention. The error assigned is the failure of the judge a qua to comply, in his sentence, with the requirements of section 2 of Act 112 of 1890, which requires the judge to state at time of sentence "that it is subject to commutation and diminution, provided," etc. It does not appear that appellants called the judge's attention to this matter in any way or made any application to him on the subject. Under such circumstances, we do not feel called upon to reverse the judgment. State v. Benjamin, 7 La. Ann. 47; State v. Romano, 37 La. Ann. 98; State v. Johnson, 33 La. Ann. 889. It is doubtful if the judge's omission prejudices defendants' rights under the statute, and they will no doubt find means to secure its benefit.

Rehearing refused.

GREVEMBURG et al. v. BRADFORD. (No. 10,916.)[1]

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. March 7, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

JUDICIAL SALE — IMPEACHMENT — JURISDICTION — DUTY OF PURCHASER—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT.

1. A purchaser at a judicial sale is not bound to look beyond the decree recognizing its necessity. The jurisdiction of the court is an essential inquiry, but the truth of the record, concerning matters within its jurisdiction, cannot be disputed.

2. A purchaser under a decree of a probate court is bound to look to the jurisdiction of the court granting the order of sale. Such order is to be received as conclusive, and is not to be impeached from within, but it is impeachable from without.

3. A judgment, sentence, order, or decree passed by a competent jurisdiction, which creates or changes a title or any interest in an estate, is not only final as to the parties themselves, and all claiming under them, but furnishes conclusive evidence to all mankind that the right or interest belongs to the party to whom the court adjudges it.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Action by Louis Grevemburg and others against James L. Bradford to establish and enforce their interest in certain land. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed. Rehearing refused.

Calhoun Fluker and Merrick & Merrick, for appellant. Rouse & Grant, for appellees.

WATKINS, J. This is a petitory action in ordinary form, instituted by certain persons, alleging themselves to be the heirs of Euphrosine Boisdore, widow of Francois Grevemburg, deceased, for the recovery of a tract of land situated in the parish of St. Landry, quoad that portion held by him at the date the suit was filed, and for the avails of such portion thereof as had been theretofore sold by him. The plaintiffs' claim of title may be stated in this wise, viz.: That Euphrosine Boisdore died in the parish of St. Martin, this state, in the year 1818, and upon an inventory of the property of her estate, taken in the following year, was scheduled "by way of a memorandum" a land claim for 800 arpents of land, or 680.56 acres, situated in the old county of Attakapas. That this claim was acquired by her under a Spanish grant or order of survey, during the year 1781, prior to her marriage, and it was subsequently and regularly listed by the register and receiver of the United States land office in their report, as land commissioners, to congress, on the 30th of December, 1815, and was thereafter confirmed to her by act of congress in 1825. This claim was not satisfied by survey or location in place, and no provision was made, looking to the satisfaction thereof, until by act of congress passed on June 2, 1835, the surveyor general was authorized to issue "to the claimant, or her legal representatives," of such land claim, a certificate of location or land scrip for the number of acres called for, which was locatable on any public lands of the United States at any land office in the United States. That the immediate heirs of Euphrosine Boisdore died in 1851 and 1864, respectively, and two of her grandchildren died in 1856 and 1864, respectively,—the third and only grandchild now surviving,—and that none of said children and heirs at any time applied for or received scrip under the act of 1835, or procured any other satisfaction of said land claim. Nothing further appears to have been done in the premises until, during the year 1872, said land claim was adjudicated to one D. J. Wedge at public judicial sale made in the succession of Euphrosine Boisdore, in the parish of Lafayette, on the 29th of August, 1872. Claiming thereunder to be, quoad hoc, the legal representative of said claimant, this adjudicatee applied to the surveyor general for land scrip in satisfaction of said land claim, in pursuance of the provisions of the act of June 2, 1858, and the same was accordingly issued and delivered to him on the 27th of October, 1887. This scrip was duly certified by the commissioner of the general land office on November 16th of same year, and on the 8th of December following the surveyor general certified it, and indorsed thereon, that "by reason of the evidence on file in my [his] office, Daniel J. Wedge is the legal representative of the confirmee, and as such is entitled to locate the within certificate." On the 12th of December following, Wedge assigned the land scrip thus indorsed to the defendant, Bradford, and for which he obtained patents to the lands in suit on the 28th of October, 1888. That those patents substantially recite that they are in full satisfaction of the unsatisfied claim of Euphrosine Boisdore and of the land scrip issued in satisfaction thereof, in pursuance of the act of congress of date June 2, 1858, and that they evidence the title of the defendant, Bradford, assignee of D. J. Wedge, representative of Euphrosine Boisdore, deceased. We have premised this much of the undisputed facts of this case, so that the demands of the plaintiffs, and the exceptions and answer of the defendant, might appear more striking and distinct.

Plaintiffs, representing themselves to be the lineal descendants of Euphrosine Boisdore,—about 25 in number, and for the greater part residing in parishes of this state in the vicinity of Lafayette parish,—come into the civil district court of the parish of Orleans upon demands against Bradford alone, not making Wedge a party, and averring that "they never applied for nor received certificates of location in satisfaction of the land claim of their ancestrix, Euphrosine Boisdore, but remaining in ignorance of their rights until within the year last past, (1889,) they sought the advice of counsel and instituted this suit. In their petition they make the following averments and representations, viz.: "That for the reasons heretofore stated the heirs of Euphrosine Boisdore accepted her succession; and *because she did not die and was not domiciled in Lafayette parish * * * the said parish court was without jurisdiction to open her succession*, and that all proceedings in said court in that behalf, and all orders therein made, are and were absolutely null and void, and that the sale made by the said sheriff to said Wedge thereunder was not preceded by the formalities prescribed by law." (Italics ours.) Further, "that said proceedings were absolutely null and void, and that the absolute nullity of said proceedings was [and is] patent upon the face thereof, and that the defendant, Bradford, was bound to take notice of [the] petitioners' rights in the premises, and was bound to take notice of the nullity of said pretended probate proceedings in said parish court, so, as aforesaid, patent on the face thereof, and of the total lack of jurisdiction in said court in the matter of said succession." (Italics ours.) On the foregoing theory and averments, plaintiffs allege that they have a right "to claim the benefit of said certificates, * * * and to be decreed the joint owners of the land located therewith." The foregoing are supplemented by the following averments, viz.: "That notwithstanding the nullity of said probate proceedings, * * * and the sale made thereunder, they had the right to hold said Wedge as their negotiorum gestor, and to claim said scrip so obtained by him, and they have the right to hold said Bradford as such negotiorum gestor, and to claim the lands located by him with said scrip." Upon these averments, plaintiffs pray "that there be judgment in [their] favor, declaring that said proceedings in the parish court of the parish of Lafayette, pretending to open the succession of Euphrosine Boisdore, are absolutely null and void for want of jurisdiction in said court in the premises, and that all orders therein made, and thereunder the sale of said land claim to said Wedge, are and were absolutely null and void, and without effect to vest any title whatever in him, and that the defendant took said scrip with full knowledge of the nullity of said proceedings, and that he acquired no title thereto by an assignment thereof to him by said Wedge," etc. To this petition defendant tendered an exception, to the effect that plaintiffs' averments were bad for duplicity and inconsistency, and ruled them for cause why they should not be compelled to elect whether they would pursue their allegations ex delicto, in disaffirmance of said probate proceedings, or those ex contractu, in affirmance of them. This exception having been overruled, and a bill of exceptions thereto reserved, defendant filed an answer, in which he pleaded the prescription of 1, 5, and 10 years, and the general issue, supplemented by the following special defenses, viz.: That the land claim of Euphrosine Boisdore was of little value at the date of the probate proceedings in 1872, and for many years thereafter, and that the plaintiffs and their authors "have been guilty of such laches and gross neglect of said claim that they have no just right thereto, and have no right to speculate upon [such] laches and negligence, and avail themselves of money and labor expended by others," and to recover property, to the acquisition of which they have contributed nothing. He further represents that, had the plaintiffs been mindful of their supposed rights, they could at any time between August, 1872, when said land claim was adjudicated to Wedge, and the 27th of October, 1887, when the surveyor general issued land scrip therefor, have appeared and set up claim thereto as the legal representatives of Euphrosine Boisdore, and contested Wedge's right thereto before the officers of the interior department of the United States government; the same being at that time a matter of which such department had undoubted jurisdiction. That having failed to take timely and proper steps in that regard antecedent to the issuance of patents to him, predicated upon the scrip he surrendered, this inquiry cannot be gone into now, and he be deprived of the property, his title to which is evidenced by such patents. Accepting plaintiffs' theory of the case, the judge a qua rendered judgment in their favor in conformity to their prayer, and the defendant has appealed.

1. The defendant's exception is suggestive of some embarrassment in the discussion and decision of the case, of which we consider it important that it be relieved preliminarily. We take it to be clear and undoubted that this is a petitory action of ordinary form, in which it became necessary for the plaintiffs to set up the absolute nullity of the probate sale to Wedge of the Boisdore land claim in 1872, and the consequences flowing therefrom, in order to remove an apparent obstacle to their recovery of the property from Bradford, as Wedge's assignee of the land scrip which he gave in exchange for patents. This is not in any sense an action of nullity or rescission, seeking the help of a judicial decree revoking an illegal sale. Such sale and proceedings are only collaterally drawn in question, and plaintiffs' full reliance is placed upon the Boisdore succession records to exhibit and prove the want of jurisdiction in the probate court of Lafayette parish to grant the order of sale, and the consequent absolute nullity of Wedge's title to the land claim. The difficulty suggested by defendant's exception is that, while adhering to their charges of absolute nullity, plaintiffs' contention is that they had "a right to hold said Wedge as their negotiorum gestor and claim said scrip," and that they have the right to hold said Bradford as such negotiorum gestor, and to claim the lands located by him with such scrip,"—thus placing themselves in the position of asking this court to find and decree the nullity of a judicial sale, and in the same judgment to decree them entitled to its avails; asking us to declare Wedge to have been their negotiorum gestor throughout the whole course of his negotiations with the officers of the land department in receiving scrip in settlement of the Boisdore land claim, and at the same time to declare that the defendant likewise became their negotiorum gestor in obtaining the scrip from Wedge, and that he acted as such in obtaining patents in his own name, in the face of allegation and proof that their alleged negotiorum gestor, Wedge, had made an assignment of scrip standing in his name to the defendant, Bradford, for a consideration. This embarrassment is increased when the fact is taken into consideration that Wedge has not been made a party to this litigation; that no judgment is asked, requesting the revocation of the acts and contracts of these two negotiorum gestores; and that this suit was brought and decided in a jurisdiction wholly different from that of Wedge's domicile, as well as that of the succession of Euphrosine Boisdore, whether in St. Martin or Lafayette parish. These various positions seem to us to be altogether incompatible with each other; but as the district judge left them undisturbed, and preferring to try the case as a unit, we will simply adopt the course he pursued, and treat the issues in detail as they occur, chronologically.

2. Addressing ourselves to the questions appertaining to the nullity of the Lafayette probate sale in 1872, we have examined the transcript, and reproduce therefrom the following summarized statement of facts, viz.: The petition of the public administrator of the parish of Lafayette avers "that Euphrosine Boisdore departed this life in said parish [of Lafayette] many years since, leaving some property, consisting of an old, deferred, private claim for lands, against the government of the United States, as shown by the reports of the register and receiver," etc.; and it further avers "that said property should be inventoried, appraised, and sold according to law;" and thereupon said administrator prayed for an order of court, directing and requiring "that the property be sold according to law to pay debts," etc. The judge of the parish court, exercising probate jurisdiction, entered up an order directing that said public administrator, "after ten days' notice, if there is no opposition, take charge of said estate, and administer it according to law." He further ordered "that after legal delays and advertisement the property appertaining to the estate be sold for the purpose of paying debts and settling the succession." Subsequently, and in due form of law, an inventory was taken of said property, and same was duly advertised for sale, and adjudicated to D. J. Wedge for cash at the full amount of its appraised value, and a proces verbal was duly executed and properly filed in the clerk's office. The evidence of the Boisdore land claim physically and actually passed into the possession and under the control of the adjudicatee at the price of $40, the valuation fixed in the inventory by two sworn appraisers, and which amount is neither alleged nor shown to have been an undervaluation thereof. These are the facts exhibited on the face of the Boisdore mortuaria in Lafayette, upon which we are requested to maintain and decree the absolute nullity of Wedge's title in this collateral action. Not content with this showing, however, the plaintiffs introduced as their witness the present clerk of the court of the parish of St. Martin, who in the course of his testimony made the following statements, viz.: "Question. Have you made search for the record of the succession of Euphrosine Boisdore? Answer. Yes, sir. Q. Did you find the record of the succession of Euphrosine Boisdore amongst the records of your court? A. I find what I have of the succession of Francois Grevemburg, and nothing entered in the name of Euphrosine Boisdore in the records of my office." (Italics ours.) Upon further interrogation, and having his memory refreshed by the exhibition to him of some loose papers, fragmentary in character, he said that, upon a very careful search among the archives of his office, he found what appeared to be a proces verbal of an inventory and a marriage contract, and added: "But nothing more having reference to the estate of Euphrosine Boisdore, except the file I hold here, marked: 'No. 816. Estate of Widow Francois Grevemburg. 1819.'" It was upon this inventory that the memorandum entry of the Euphrosine Boisdore land claim appears to have been entered, as above stated. In addition to the foregoing, there are a few parol statements made, to the effect that Euphrosine Boisdore lived and died in the parish of St. Martin; but among the oldest members of the family, who were interrogated as witnesses, there was an old lady, of 78 years of age, who stated that she once saw Euphrosine Boisdore, who was her grandmother, and that she died soon afterwards. She must have been but a little girl then, as she must have been born in 1812, and was consequently but six years of age at the date of her grandmother's death, in the year 1818. This circumstance is cited for the purpose of illustrating how desultory is the proof on this score. Of the testimony it may be fairly said that it leads to the inference of Euphrosine Boisdore having resided and died in the parish of St. Martin, but it does not prove it fully, nor does it clearly establish the fact that an actual administration of her estate was ever commenced in that parish. Much less does it prove the commencement and termination thereof in that parish by an acceptance by the heirs of the deceased, or otherwise. It is a noteworthy fact that in the plaintiffs' original petition no mention is made of the residence of any one of the 22 heirs of Euphrosine Boisdore, who instituted this suit, and it was only in response to an exception of the defendant that plaintiffs filed a supplemental petition setting forth their various places of present residence; further illustrating how obscure and scarce are the facts on which plaintiffs place reliance for the overthrow of the jurisdiction of the court of Lafayette parish in 1872, even if it be conceded to be perfectly competent evidence in such a proceeding as this.

Accepting the situation of affairs to have been as above outlined, and what was the exact status of the jurisdiction of the parish court of Lafayette parish in 1872, in respect to the succession of Euphrosine Boisdore? It appears from an authoritative publication of the statutes and resolves of the legislative session of the general assembly of this state for the year 1823 that an act was passed thereat, creating "a new parish in the county of Attakapas, to be called the 'Parish of Lafayette,'" section 1 of which declares "that the parish of St. Martin is and shall be, by the present act, divided, and a new parish formed out of the western part of the said parish, which shall be called and known by the name of the 'Parish of Lafayette.'" (Italics are ours.) Among other things needful for the complete and perfect organization of the new parish, the act provided for the election of certain officers, the establishment of a courthouse, and for the administration of justice therein, so as to make it a complete and perfect political entity in all respects. Adams v. Forsyth, 44 La. Ann. —, 10 South. Rep. 622. In pursuance of this theory the act, in its ninth section, declares "that as soon after the said parish of Lafayette shall be established, * * * it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court of the parish of St. Martin to transmit to the clerk of the court of the parish of Lafayette all the papers, documents, and other judicial proceedings unfinished, which may be in his office, and which, from the residence of the defendant and the situation of the parties, belong to the parish created by this act." It is evident that, from a fair and reasonable interpretation of this section of the act, unfinished and incompleted mortuary proceedings were contemplated by the term "other judicial proceedings unfinished;" and it seems quite clear that such unfinished and incomplete mortuary proceedings, in the courts of the parish of St. Martin, as those in which persons who were domiciled in the new parish might have an interest, were contemplated by the phrase "from the situation of the parties, belong to the parish created by this act." (Italics ours.) Reading the petition of the public administrator of the parish of Lafayette in the light of this statute, his declaration, "that Euphrosine Boisdore departed this life in said parish [of Lafayette] many years ago," seems quite suggestive of that court having jurisdiction of her succession; and when we take into consideration the order of the judge, made on the faith of that declaration, directing the public administrator to "take charge of said succession, and administer it according to law," that suggestion becomes convincing proof, and gives substantial support to his further order directing the sale of the land claim "for the purpose of paying debts," etc. That upon this state of the then existing law, and in view of the status of the succession of Euphrosine Boisdore at that time, the probate judge of the parish of Lafayette had authority to grant that order of sale, in the exercise of the jurisdiction his court possessed over said succession, is a conclusive presumption of law, so far as this case is concerned, we cannot doubt, nor can it be successfully denied. The legislature of 1823 was fully competent to deal with the question in hand, and no one doubts its constitutional authority to thus alter and change the jurisdiction of courts, so as to transfer "judicial proceedings unfinished" into the courts of the territory in which the litigants were to reside thereafter, and which "from the situation of the parties belongs to the parish thus created."

This identical question arose and was decided in the case of Beale v. Walden, 11 Rob. (La.) 68; the controversy being whether the probate court of the parish of Jefferson had jurisdiction to order a sale of property therein situated at the time, though previously forming a part of the territory of the parish of Orleans, from which the parish of Jefferson had been taken, and wherein the succession of the deceased had been opened, and upon the authority of two previous decisions (Patoulet v. Patoulet, 2 La. 270, and Forstall v. Forstall, 4 La. 214) the court said: "The succession of Thomas Beale, Sr., was opened, in a legal sense, by his death, which took place in the parish of Orleans before its division. If the court of probates had already taken cognizance before the parish of Jefferson was cut off, its jurisdiction was not divested by the separation." That case would appear to be conclusively in favor of the plaintiffs, if it be conceded that Euphrosine Boisdore's succession was once under administration in the parish of St. Martin antecedent to 1823; and indeed it would be, but for the fact that is stated by the court, that the act of February, 1825, creating the parish of Jefferson, does not contain any "provision relating to a transfer of causes pending in the courts of the parish of Orleans to those of the new parish, nor relative to administration of successions already opened before the separation of the two parishes." But, as we have already seen that the act creating the parish of Lafayette does contain such provisions, the supposed partial administration of the succession of Euphrosine Boisdore in the parish of St. Martin did not prevent the acquisition of jurisdiction by the probate court of the former to continue and terminate said administration, but on the contrary expressly sanctioned it. Act 39 of 1871, creating and providing for the organization of the parish of Red River, and the supplemental act, (No. 78 of 1873,) containing similar provisions to those of the act of 1823, creating the parish of Lafayette, were construed in Hammett v. Sprowl, 31 La. Ann. 325; and therein the court maintained the jurisdiction of the court of the new parish to try and decide a suit to revive a judgment anciently rendered in the parish of Natchitoches, from which a portion of its territory had been taken in its formation,—the court basing its decision on the ground that the statutes referred to "put the Red River court in the place and stead of the Natchitoches court; vesting it, as regards the judgment, with the jurisdiction of the latter;" considering "the proceeding to revive a judgment not as a new suit, but simply a proceeding in the same suit to continue and keep alive a judgment rendered therein, and to furnish proof that it has not been satisfied or extinguished." Even so, under the terms of the act creating the parish of Lafayette, was the probate court thereof vested with complete jurisdiction of the unfinished gestion of the Euphrosine Boisdore succession, who apparently resided in that portion of the territory of the ancient parish of St. Martin which was embraced therein.

The case of Duson v. Dupre, 32 La. Ann. 896, was a petitory action instituted by plaintiff as curator of the succession of Le Blanc, to which the defendants excepted on the ground that the order of his appointment by the parish court of the parish of St. Landry was a nullity, because "Louis Le Blanc having died in the parish of Orleans, where he resided, the probate court of St. Landry had no jurisdiction over his succession." That exception was sustained in the court below, but in this court the judgment was reversed; the court expressing the following view, viz.: "Defendants' position could be maintained if the appointment of the curator was absolutely void, and the nullity apparent on the face of the papers and pleadings. * * * The late parish court had probate jurisdiction, and was exclusively competent to grant letters of administration in all successions properly opened in that court. Defendants contend that this succession was not properly opened in that court, for the reasons urged in their exceptions. This denial presents a question of fact,—that the deceased was not a resident of that parish," etc. "* * * These questions can be looked into and adjudicated upon only in a direct action before the same court," etc. That decision is but the announcement of what is the settled jurisprudence of this court, and it is perfectly conformable to the views hereinabove expressed. Evidently, had Duson, curator, made a sale of the property of the Le Blanc succession in the parish of St. Landry, and the heirs had contested the validity of the title conferred on the purchaser, who, like the present defendant, was a stranger to the succession, this court, acting on the authorities therein cited, would unquestionably have denied their action, and affirmed the validity of the sale.

The principles of law recognized in the cases cited were recognized and applied by the supreme court, speaking through Mr. Justice LAMAR, in the recent case of Simmons v. Saul, 138 U. S. 441, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369. That was a suit in equity, brought in the circuit court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, by citizens of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas, claiming to be the legal descendants of Robert Simmons, late a citizen of Louisiana, against H. R. Saul, a citizen of Pennsylvania. Its object was to charge the defendant, as the former owner of a tract of land in Wisconsin, as a trustee for complainants with respect to said ownership, and have him account for the value of the lands, their rents and profits, and for loss and damage resulting from the cutting and removal of timber therefrom. The bill represents that Simmons died intestate in the parish of Washington, La., seised and possessed of an inchoate land claim in the parish of St. Tammany, for 640 acres, founded upon the purchase of a settlement right, which was confirmed by the act of congress of March 3, 1813, but remained unlocated until subsequent to the passage of the act of congress of June 2, 1858,—the identical act under which the Boisdore land claim, of identically similar character, was located. It further represents that precisely similar probate proceedings were inaugurated in the parish of Washington, whereby said land claim was adjudicated in the year 1872 at a public judicial sale for the alleged purpose of paying debts of the succession; the price paid being $30 in cash, which was consumed in the payment of costs. That thereafter said purchaser presented this land claim, thus acquired, acting as the legal representative of Simmons, to the surveyor general, for certificates of location, and same were issued, and duly approved by the commissioner of the general land office, and delivered to him; and thereafter he located them upon the lands in controversy, situated in Wisconsin, for which patents regularly issued "in the name of Robert M. Simmons or his legal representatives." Those lands were subsequently acquired by mesne conveyances from said adjudicatee by the defendant. To the averment of nullity of all of said probate proceedings and sale, had in and entertained by the parish court of Washington parish, for want of jurisdiction, the defendant demurred on the ground that the relief demanded "is barred by the judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, rendered in proceedings regular on their face, and which have not been attacked by any proceeding in that court, or in any appellate court." The court below sustained this demurrer and dismissed the complainant's bill, and the latter appealed. Thus paraphrased, the Simmons Case appears to be an exactly parallel case to the instant one, excepting the solitary question of the decedent's disputed place of domicile and death. First reciting the provisions of the various articles of our Civil Code and Code of Practice applicable to the administration of small successions, the supreme court said: "The general principles of probate jurisdiction and practice, as settled by a long series of decisions in state courts and in courts of the United States, are applicable to the powers and proceedings of the parish courts of Louisiana, and have been recognized and enforced by the supreme court of that state. They also show that under the averments of the bill the parish court of Washington parish had jurisdiction of the succession of Robert Simmons. The succession had been open for over forty years, and no one had claimed it; nor did any of the complainants, as heirs, accept it expressly in writing or by judicial proceeding, nor tacitly, by doing any act which necessarily supposed their intention to accept. It was properly adjudicated to be vacant, and was administered as such. * * * The petition, in reciting that Robert M. Simmons departed this life in said parish many years since, * * * leaving some property, consisting of an old, deferred, unlocated, private land claim, * * * set forth the necessary jurisdictional facts to warrant the court in proceeding to administer the estate." On this statement of fact and those conclusions of law the court said: "It is our opinion that the parish court of Washington parish had a clear and unquestionable jurisdiction of the intestate estate or succession of Robert M. Simmons," and affirmed the judgment. As authority for that opinion the court cited and relied upon several preceding and pertinent decisions of that tribunal, and notably that of Comstock v. Crawford, 3 Wall. 396, a case involving the validity of an administrator's sale in Wisconsin, on the authority of the court to order which they said: "It is well settled that, when the jurisdiction of a court of limited and special authority appears upon the face of its proceedings, its action cannot be collaterally attacked for mere error or irregularity. The jurisdiction appearing, the same presumption of law arises that it was rightly exercised as prevails with reference to the action of a court of superior and general authority." Also, upon McNitt v. Turner, 16 Wall. 352, a like case, in which they said: "Jurisdiction is authority to hear and determine. It is an axiomatic proposition that, when jurisdiction has attached, whatever arises or may subsequently occur in its exercise, the proceeding, being coram judice, can be impeached collaterally only for fraud. In all other respects it is as conclusive as if it were irreversible in a proceeding for error." Also, Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, 2 How. 319. Their review of authorities on this question is concluded by a reference to the case of Lalanne's Heirs v. Moreau, 13 La. 433, cited infra. Also, Pintard v. Deyris, 3 Mart. (N. S.) 32; Beale v. Walden, 11 Rob. (La.) 67; and Sizemore v. Wedge, 20 La. Ann. 124; and various other like cases,—but particularly emphasizing the case of Duson v. Dupre as "a case of great importance in this connection," quoting with approval the paragraph we have cited above. This case is referred to as illustrating the fact that the courts of other states have, as well as the supreme court of the United States, accepted the decisions and jurisprudence of this court in reference to the effect of decrees and orders made and granted by the inferior courts of this state in successions under their control, and, maintaining their jurisdiction as appearing on the face of the record, have upheld titles of purchasers thereunder as valid and legal, and in cases precisely similar to this one. The case of Weeks v. Railway Co., (Wis.) 47 N. W. Rep. 737, presents a case quite similar to this, in which a land claim in favor of a certain deceased citizen of the parish of St. Tammany was involved; the land scrip issued in exchange for which, having been located on lands situated in the state of Michigan, and the plaintiffs setting up the identical claim the plaintiffs do here,—the defendant claiming title by mesne conveyances founded primarily upon similar probate proceedings and sale of the land claim in the parish of St. Tammany as those had in Lafayette. But all the mention that is made of the proceedings in, or the jurisdiction of the probate court of, St. Tammany parish, is "that the complaint sets out sufficient to show that said court had no jurisdiction of said estate of said deceased, and that the whole proceedings were a fraud upon the rights of the plaintiffs." But none of the facts are stated. Of course, on that hypothesis, judgment went in favor of plaintiffs. Walker v. Daly, (Wis.) 49 N. W. Rep. 812, is quite a similar case, arising upon a similar state of facts and proceedings in the parish of St. Tammany, La., with the material distinction that it is alleged therein that the land claim was not the property of the person whose succession was administered. Of course that was quite sufficient to justify a judgment for plaintiffs. The case of Hardy v. Harbin, 4 Sawy. 536, practically rests upon the declaration of the court that a prefect under the Mexican government in California had no jurisdiction over the estates of deceased persons, or authority to appoint an administrator, and that the confirmation of a land grant inured to the benefit of the confirmees. But, however pertinent those cases may be to the case in hand, they must yield to the paramount authority of Simmons v. Saul, and the established jurisprudence of this court.

3. Having ascertained that the probate court of the parish of Lafayette in 1872—and it is not doubted, and cannot be disputed, that parish courts had unlimited jurisdiction, under article 87 of the constitution of 1868, in all succession and probate matters—had apparent jurisdiction of the succession of Euphrosine Boisdore, what is the effect that must be given to the order of sale therein granted by the judge in respect to the title of Wedge as adjudicatee of the Boisdore land claim? The authorities are uniform, and our own jurisprudence is consistent and emphatic, to the effect that such a decree must stand, and is entitled to the respect and observance of all those whose interests may be affected by it, until same is set aside in the due course of law. The sanctity and authenticity of judicial sales founded upon orders of competent courts is so clearly defined, and the principle involved so well stated, in Lalanne's Heirs v. Moreau, 13 La. 431, we will quote it, as concisely announcing our views: "We place our decision," say the court, "on the broad ground that sales directed and authorized by courts of justice are judicial sales, to all intents and purposes." And, in treating of their effect, they further say: "The necessity and wisdom of such a rule of property has long been felt and acknowledged in the most important states of the Union, and none is better settled by the decisions of their courts. They all maintain that a purchaser under a decree of the orphans' court is bound to look to the jurisdiction, but the matters within that jurisdiction cannot be disputed. That the decree of the court is to be received as conclusive evidence, not to be impeached from within, and, like all other acts of the highest judicial authority, impeachable only from without, and that a judgment, decree, sentence, or order passed by a competent jurisdiction which creates or changes a title or any interest in an estate, is not only final as to the parties themselves, and all claiming under them, but furnishes conclusive evidence to all mankind that the right or interest belongs to the party to whom the court adjudged it." In many different forms of phraseology, this principle has been in many subsequent decisions announced, but in none has it been more correctly or forcibly expressed. In Sizemore v. Wedge, 20 La. Ann. 124,—a very similar suit,—the court expressed itself thus: "The purchaser at a probate sale, which is a judicial sale, is not bound to look beyond the decree recognizing its necessity. The jurisdiction of the court is an essential inquiry, but the truth of the record, concerning matters within its jurisdiction, cannot be disputed." In Woods v. Lee, 21 La. Ann. 505; Webb v. Keller, 39 La. Ann. 55, 1 South. Rep. 423; Linman v. Riggins, 40 La. Ann. 764, 5 South. Rep. 49; and in many other cases,—this court has consistently and rigorously adhered to that principle. It was recently applied by us in a very similar case, (Gale v. O'Connor, 43 La. Ann. 717, 9 South. Rep. 557,) and the same was repeated in Succession of Theze, 44 La. Ann. —, 10 South. Rep. 412, citing many previous cases; and among others the cases of Succession of Dumestre, 40 La. Ann. 571, 4 South. Rep. 328, and Succession of Lehmann, 41 La. Ann. 987, 7 South. Rep. 33, were quoted with approval. This doctrine is likewise cited and relied upon in Simmons v. Saul, as the epitome of Louisiana jurisprudence on this question.

On reason and authority, we are of opinion that the case is with the defendant; that on the face of the record and mortuaria of the parish of Lafayette the parish court of that parish in 1872 had probate jurisdiction of the unfinished gestion of the succession of Euphrosine Boisdore; that the order of the court directing a sale of property of that succession to pay debts is prima facie valid and jurisdictional; that the sale thereunder conveyed a fee-simple title to the purchaser; and that said proceedings and the sale must stand until, in some direct proceeding in the courts of the parish of Lafayette, the recitals thereof are proven untrue, and annulled and set aside. Entertaining this view, we must reverse the judgment appealed from. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the judgment and decree pronounced by the court a qua be and the same is annulled and reversed; and it is further ordered and decreed that the demands of the plaintiffs be rejected, at their costs in both courts; their rights being reserved in a different form of action in a competent court.

RECEIVERS—EX PARTE APPOINTMENT—DISMISSAL OF APPEAL.

1. An appeal taken by a third person, not a party, who appears in the capacity of receiver of the defendant corporation, will be dismissed, when the order appointing him such receiver, attached to his petition of appeal, shows upon its face that it was made ex parte, and without notice to the corporation.

2. Section 688 of the Revised Statutes does not authorize the forfeiture of the charter of a corporation and the appointment of a receiver by ex parte order without notice. The statute discussed and construed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Concordia; S. CHARLES YOUNG, Judge.

Action by I. K. Ober and others against the Excelsior Planting & Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiffs. An appeal was taken by H. N. Soria, who alleged that he had been duly appointed commissioner and receiver of defendant corporation. Appeal dismissed. Rehearing refused.

D. C. & L. L. Labatt, for appellant. J. L. Dagg, for appellees.

FENNER, J. The appeal is taken by H. N. Soria, who alleges that he has been duly appointed commissioner and receiver of the defendant corporation. He annexed to his petition of appeal an extract from the minutes of division D of the civil district court for the parish of Orleans, of proceedings in a case entitled Smith, Limited, v. Excelsior Planting & Manufacturing Company, reciting that "on motion of D. C. and L. L. Labatt, of counsel for plaintiffs, and on suggesting to the court that in the above-entitled suit plaintiffs have issued an execution, which has been duly returned by the civil sheriff of this parish nulla bona, it is ordered by the court, under and by virtue of section 688 of the Revised Statutes of Louisiana, that the charter of the Excelsior Planting and Manufacturing Company is hereby forfeited for insolvency, and that H. N. Soria be, and is hereby, appointed commissioner, for effecting its liquidation, and also as receiver," etc. This purports, on its face, to be a purely ex parte order, entered without any notice whatever to the corporation; and the appellee assigns as ground for dismissal of the appeal that it is a patent and absolute nullity, conferring upon the appellant no right to intervene in these proceedings, or to appeal from the judgment therein rendered. No general principle is more firmly founded in reason and justice, or better recognized by authorities, than that announced by Mr. High as follows: "Courts will not exercise their statutory power of appointing receivers over an insolvent corporation upon an ex parte application, and without giving the defendant an opportunity to be heard; but, upon filing a petition, duly verified, setting forth the grounds on which the application is based, an order to show cause should issue, and a copy thereof should be served upon the officers of the corporation, directing them to show cause on a future day why the application should not be granted." High, Rec. par. 346. Appellant relies upon section 688 of the Revised Statutes, which, in treating of this class of corporations, provides: "They shall forfeit their charter for insolvency, evidenced by a return of no property found on execution; and in such case it shall be the duty of the district court, at the instance of any creditor, to decree such forfeiture, and to appoint a commissioner for effecting the liquidation, whose duty it shall be to convert all the assets of the company, including any unpaid balances due by stockholders on their shares, into cash, and to distribute the same, under the direction of the court, amongst the parties entitled thereto, in the same manner, as near as may be, as is done in cases of insolvency of individuals." The most critical study of this statute fails to furnish to our minds the slightest reason for supposing that it was intended to authorize any such summary proceedings, without notice, as that here presented. The statute provides a particular ground for forfeiture of charter; it authorizes any creditor to invoke the forfeiture on such ground; and it invests the district court—meaning any district court having jurisdiction of the parties—with jurisdiction of such cases. It does not confine the relief to the particular creditor at whose instance the execution was issued, nor to the particular court from which it was issued, nor does it make the proceeding necessarily an incident of the particular suit wherein the execution was invoked. The statute evidently contemplates a judicial proceeding, and does not prescribe the special form thereof.

In two former cases we had under consideration an analogous statute, being section 4 of Act 47 of 1873, viz.: "That the tax collectors shall be, and they are hereby, authorized to give a title in the name of the state of Louisiana to all persons purchasing property sold in pursuance of this act; and such title shall be held in and recognized by the courts of this state as valid in law. Upon the presentation of a title so given to the district or parish court, it shall be the duty of the judge to order the sheriff to put such persons in possession of the property so purchased by them." Under that statute a purchaser conceived that he had an unqualified right to demand an order of possession without notice to adverse parties. But this court said: "As the act does not declare in express terms that the order to the sheriff to put a purchaser in possession shall issue without notice, we may well construe it as adopted with reference to the general laws relating to summary proceedings in the courts of the state, and as authorizing the district courts to which application is to be made to require the necessary legal notice to be issued to the party to be ousted, and to dispose of the contest in a summary manner." State v. Judge, 27 La. Ann. 705. In a later case we cited the above with approval, and further emphatically held that, if the statute were construed to authorize a proceeding without notice, it would be void, as not being "due process of law." Fischel v. Mercier, 32 La. Ann. 704. We need not quote from the last case, but a reading of it will throw light upon the principles involved in the proper construction of the statute now before us, and the proceedings authorized thereby.

We have said enough to sustain our conclusions that the ex parte order presented by appellant as the muniment of his right to intervene in this case and invoke a review of the judgment rendered is an absolute nullity, and confers on him no right to stand in judgment on this appeal. We do not exercise our appellate jurisdiction except at the instance of those who exhibit a legal right and interest to demand it. When the right of a third party to appeal has not been established contradictorily in the lower court, and is denied in this court, it is our practice to remand the issue for separate trial in the court below. Succession of Lauve, 6 La. Ann. 529; Griffing v. Bowmar, 8 Rob. (La.) 112; Anselm v. Wilson, 8 La. 36; Brown v. Williams, 12 La. 614. But in this case, it being apparent, on his own showing, that he is without right, remanding would be useless. It is therefore ordered that this appeal be dismissed at appellant's cost.

ON REHEARING.

(April 4, 1892.)

We have given grave consideration to the points and authorities urged in this application.

1. We discover therein no suggestion tending to contradict the facts on which the opinion was based, to-wit, that the decree (if such it can be called) forfeiting defendant's charter and appointing a receiver, was rendered upon an ex parte motion, without any notice or attempted notice, and under the supposed authority of section 688, Rev. St.

2. The more we study the statute, the more firmly we are convinced of the correctness of the construction we have placed upon it, and that it does not authorize or contemplate any such proceeding as that here presented. The so-called "decree," finding no support in the statute, stands just as it would if there were no statute.

3. The nullity is absolute, and it is patent on the face of the decree itself. Authorities denying collateral questioning of such orders have no application to intrinsic and patent absolute nullities.

4. The claim that a receiver represents the corporation, and is not subject to the rules governing appeals by third persons, involves a petitio principii. If appellant is not receiver, he is certainly a third person, without any pretense of right to appeal. He is not a receiver because he calls himself so. He presents his alleged title to the office, which, upon its face, is an absolute nullity, conferring no title whatever. He himself shows that he is not receiver. What, then, is he, if not a third person undertaking to appeal from a judgment in which he sets up no other interest whatever?

5. This case presents no analogy to that of Stark v. Burke, 5 La. Ann. 740. There the corporation had been for years in liquidation before the court, which held all its affairs in gremio legis, under statutes regulating the liquidation. The liquidator, in charge under direction of the court, was destituted by a decision of this court declaring the law under which the governor had appointed him unconstitutional. The court thus found itself in control of the affairs and property of the corporation, without any legal representative to manage them. Under such circumstances, this court sustained the judge in appointing a receiver, saying: "The court, ex proprio motu, was bound to prevent the confusion and dilapidation consequent upon the abandonment of its affairs produced by the inefficiency of the law under which Stark had taken possession of and continued to hold the records, papers, and assets of the company. The proceedings for the forfeiture of the charter and the liquidation, as far as it had progressed, being before the fifth district court, we think the court properly exercised its authority in making the appointment." In Baker v. Railroad Co., 34 La. Ann. 754, we referred to the above case, and held that in this state "courts have no jurisdiction to appoint receivers for corporations in absence of express statutory authority. This court has recognized no exception to this rule, unless where the corporate property is abandoned, or where there are no persons authorized to take charge of or conduct its affairs." Holding that, on the face of the title presented by himself, it fully appears that appellant's appointment rests on no statutory authority, but is based on a statute which did not authorize it, we are bound to maintain our decree.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. March 7, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

SUIT FOR WAGES—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS—LIBEL AND SLANDER.

1. In a suit for extra compensation of a clerk and bookkeeper against his employer, when the proof discloses false entries in the defendant's books, evidencing the employer's assent thereto, if unexplained and unsupported by confirmatory and satisfactory evidence, they create a strong presumption against the demand.

2. Instructions given to the employer's counsel to investigate such questioned entries, and make protest to the bookkeeper against them, cannot serve as the foundation of a charge of slander and libel, or ground an action in damages against the employer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Action by A. B. Levy against D. C. McCan for a balance alleged to be due on plaintiff's salary and for damages. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Benedict and Lionel Adams, for appellant. Farrar, Jonas & Kruttschnitt, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. This is an action brought by a discharged clerk for balance of $11,400, as the amount due him on his salary for the full term of his contract of employment, and for damages. Plaintiff's claim is somewhat ambiguous and involved, but the substance of it is that on the 15th of September, 1886, he was employed by the defendant as bookkeeper, at a salary of $100 per month, but for the term of one year; the defendant being engaged in operating a foundry and iron works. Soon after his said employment Charles P. McCan, son of defendant, became a partner of his father in business, and the capital thereof was very largely increased, and the business, also, was increased, and extended to the purchase of plantations, and the furnishing of supplies to sugar planters, whereby the labors of petitioner were greatly increased; that during the time Charles McCan was a member of the firm, and prior to his death, he was the active man of the firm, and was chiefly interested with and responsible for its management and administration; that after his death, on the 19th of September, 1886, the defendant requested him to take the place of his son in the conduct of the business, but simply as an employe,—the transactions of the firm in liquidation aggregating many hundred thousands of dollars annually; and that defendant promised to pay him a compensation commensurate with the value of his services, over and above his assured salary, which was, at that time, $200 per month, to which he assented. Under this arrangement, plaintiff claims that the scope of his services was enlarged and extended, so as to embrace, not only all of the various details of the foundry establishment, but to extend to all the receipts and disbursements thereof, and also to those of the defendant's several plantations, situated in different parts of the state; including the supervision of the laborers and lessees thereof, and the furnishing of them with plantation supplies. Plaintiff specially avers that his said services continued from the 19th of September, 1886, until the 1st of January, 1890, when he was discharged by the defendant without sufficient cause or any serious ground of complaint. He further avers that during the time he was so engaged, and prior to the date of his discharge, the defendant, "while frequently promising, failed to fix a proper remuneration for the services of petitioner outside of his regular line of duty as such bookkeeper, and for the entire and active management and control of the property and business of the defendant;" but he further avers that subsequently, on or about the 9th of August, 1889, the defendant gave him $300 on account of said extra services, and authorized him to credit himself with $200 additional on that account, the remainder to be settled thereafter, and corresponding entries were made on the defendant's books. He further avers that in the fall of 1889 he demanded of defendant a settlement in the premises, and same was referred to defendant's counsel, who drew up a document, wherein the amount of his salary was increased from $2,400 per annum to $8,000 per annum, but same was so coupled "with conditions that your petitioner did not feel that it was proper for him to sign, and he declined to sign, same;" but, on the contrary, he expressed a willingness "to sign same without such obnoxious conditions, and defendant declined to abate said conditions." Notwithstanding what had transpired, plaintiff represents that he continued his services until January 2, 1890, when over his written and verbal protest, and expressed desire to continue to perform his services, he was discharged from further employment by the defendant. On the score of extra services, the plaintiff claims the sum stated above; and, charging defendant to have slandered and defamed him by making and publishing as true a false statement to the effect that he had, as bookkeeper, made false entries in his books in relation to the alleged agreement with petitioner, the latter claims and demands an additional $10,000 as damages for slander and libel.

plicit in detail, and we reproduce from his counsel's brief the following careful synopsis of it, as the best mode of presenting his side of the case, viz.: His entries in the defendant's books show "an admission that plaintiff was employed by defendant, and by his firm of D. C. McCan & Son, and that the salary agreed to be paid to him prior to 1882, and which was paid to him in full, was at the rate of $100 per month, which was duly and regularly paid to him from month to month; that from January 1, 1882, to September 30, 1885, plaintiff's salary, fixed at $125 per month, was also duly and regularly paid to him; that from October 1, 1885, to December 31, 1887, his salary, fixed at $150 per month, was also duly and regularly paid to him; that from January 1, 1888, to January 1, 1890, his salary, fixed by agreement at $200 per month, was also duly and regularly paid to him; and he avers that these salaries were in full for all services rendered, and that no other agreement was ever entered into between plaintiff and defendant, or defendant's firm, or his deceased son, concerning the salary of said Levy, or any further compensation ever agreed to be paid to him for his services as clerk or otherwise; that on or about the 10th of December, 1889, Levy informed respondent that, in his opinion, his services had actually been worth to respondent far more than his agreed salaries, and notified respondent that, unless a material pecuniary recognition of this claim were made, he would leave respondent's service on the 1st of January, 1890; that respondent positively and emphatically declined to do this, stating to said Levy that throughout the term of his said engagement he had been at all times at perfect liberty to resign his position if he had considered the salary agreed upon and regularly paid as insufficient compensation for his services; that Levy thereupon fully and unreservedly admitted the legal correctness of respondent's position, and without asserting that he had any legal claim upon respondent for past services, or pretending that such claim existed, notified respondent that he would withdraw from his service on the 1st of January, 1890; that thereupon respondent, not wishing at that time to lose the services of said Levy, requested him to name a salary for the single year of 1890, which he (Levy) would consider, not only a full compensation for all services to be rendered during the year, but it would likewise remove from his mind all dissatisfaction caused by his belief that his agreed salary in the past had been insufficient; that Levy thereupon suggested the sum of $8,000, which respondent assented to; that when the agreement was prepared, on the 12th of December, 1890, Levy refused to sign the same, and, refusing longer to remain in the employment of respondent, voluntarily withdrew therefrom on or about the 1st of January, 1890; that by his course of action respondent's suspicions were excited, and he employed an accountant to examine his commercial books, which had been kept solely by said Levy, and were exclusively under his control; that an investigation of said books thus made showed the following entries made therein in the handwriting of and by said Levy."

Thereto is appended a statement of the various entries upon the ledger and cashbook that were kept by the plaintiff, exhibiting the proof of the amounts that were due him on account of his salary during various years of his service. Then follow quoted extracts from the same books, the alleged false entries made therein by plaintiff while he was in defendant's employ as bookkeeper, and, as he (defendant) avers, wholly without his knowledge or consent, and in reference to plaintiff's claim for the extra services, and which are as follows, viz.: "Cashbook, at page 244, July 31, 1888, is the following entry: 'A. B. Levy, by D. C. McCan. Balance July salary, as agreed by the year, from July 1, 1888, of $4,800.' (5) In ledger, June 30, 1889, and in the cashbook, June 30, 1889, is the following entry: 'A. B. Levy, by D. C. McCan. As agreed between A. B. Levy and D. C. McCan; credit for back wages from October 1, 1886, to June 30, 1888, to compensate A. B. Levy for extra services connected with the several plantations of the estate of C. P. McCan and D. C. McCan, as per contra entry of this date, $4,950.' (6) In the cashbook, June 30, 1889, is the following entry: 'D. C. McCan to A. B. Levy. Salary of $4,800 per annum is hereby renewed from June 30, 1889, for one year, under the same conditions as those of July 31, 1888, as agreed between A. B. Levy and D. C. McCan, and, in addition to said renewal, D. C. McCan agreed to give A. B. Levy credit for back wages from October 1, 1886, to June 30, 1888, to compensate A. B. Levy for extra services connected with the several plantations of the estate of C. P. McCan, and of the said D. C. McCan, $4,950.' And on a check stub No. 2,409, of August 9, 1889, is the following entry: 'A. B. Levy, on account of accumulated salary to his credit to July 30, 1889, amounting to $7,550, $300.' And a similar entry appears in cashbook No. 381." (Italics ours.)

The defendant refers to the foregoing entries as those he complains of as incorrect, and not authorized, and to which he requested his counsel to direct the plaintiff's attention; at the same time denying that he ever, at any time, defamed or slandered him, though he denounced said entries to be false. Defendant specifically denies any recognition or acknowledgment of the plaintiff's claim for extra services, and affirms that when he signed a check in favor of plaintiff in August, 1889, he was ignorant of the statement he subsequently ascertained was contained on the stub of said check book.

These comprehensive statements from the petition and answer narrow the controversy to a very small compass, and leave us practically nothing to do but settle one or two disputed questions of fact. It is well to premise our discussion by the statement that plaintiff's petition concedes that, whatever may have been the course of the negotiations with the defendant, they never reached and perfected an agreement with relation to such extra services, and no price therefor was ever agreed upon between them. His claim, therefore, must necessarily be upon the score of a quantum meruit, and not on a contract. At the outstart, we will further observe that while the plaintiff in his petition makes special reference to the disputed entries pointed out in the defendant's books, he seems to have done so for the sole purpose of supporting his charge of slander against the defendant; for, while he avers "that each and every of said entries so made as aforesaid on the books of said firm * * * were so made at the instance of said firm and said D. C. McCan by your petitioner, then their employe, under their orders and directions," etc., yet there is neither statement nor claim made in the petition to the effect that said entries furnished evidence of defendant's acknowledgment of his liability for the extra services claimed of him; for if said entries were, indeed, authorized by defendant, the claim of the plaintiff would be clearly and fully made out; but if they were false entries, made in the defendant's books by plaintiff, secretly and without the defendant's knowledge, they do not constitute evidence against the defendant at all, but, on the contrary, completely confound the plaintiff, as his case could not, for a moment, stand in the presence of such a palpable fraud on defendant.

But when we consider the fact of plaintiff's failure to claim the full benefit of said alleged true and correct entries in the defendant's books, in verification of his claim, and further consider the fact that he explicitly places reliance upon the written document that was prepared by the defendant's counsel alone, as containing an admission of the value of his services, the conclusion becomes irresistible that he deems those entries unreliable as testimony, and puts the ban of distrust upon them. The testimony of the plaintiff, as a witness, is equally equivocal and self-contradictory as his petition is, for he fixes an altogether different date in his evidence for the beginning and termination of his contract from that fixed in the ledger entries; and, instead of relying upon those entries as furnishing positive proof of the defendant's consent to pay a specified price of $200 per month additional for said extra services, his testimony places an altogether different interpretation upon the transaction, and shows, at most, that a state of negotiation existed at date of the conference that occurred at the law office of the defendant's counsel, which the testimony of other witnesses establishes never matured or ripened into an actual agreement at all. We quote, in this connection, the following from the plaintiff's testimony, viz.: "After he had given me two hundred dollars, and up to the 31st of December, 1889, I frequently spoke to him about fixing up a definite amount, and he asked me how much I thought I ought to have. I told him five thousand dollars a year was fair enough. He says, 'I will tell you what I will do; I will give you forty-eight hundred dollars,—two hundred dollars for plantations and two hundred dollars for the regular business;' and I said to him that I had lost time, from the time that I started in; and he says, 'I will fix that for you;' and on July 1, 1888, he agreed to give me forty-eight hundred dollars a year; and in June, 1889, he told me I could credit myself with back wages from October, 1886, to June 30, 1889. Then I continued drawing that two hundred dollars, and crediting myself, to keep it straight, just as the books show there." (Vide italicised paragraphs, particularly.)

Per contra, we have the statement of the defendant's lawyer, who prepared the projet of agreement plaintiff's petition makes reference to, who, upon finding that his testimony was required, withdrew from the case; and from it we make the following pertinent extract selected from his evidence touching the interview at his office, viz.: "Mr. Levy then repeated, in a very emphatic manner, the sense of the injustice, or his sense of the injustice, as he considered it, of Mr. McCan having employed him in a very responsible and difficult position for many years, without proper compensation. He stated that Mr. McCan time and again promised to make him some effectual recognition of those services by an increase of salary or otherwise, and that he had never done it, and had never kept his word." (Italics ours.) Again: "He stated that he had a number of conversations with Mr. McCan, and that Mr. McCan had promised to give him one fourth of Promised Land, and that he had discussed giving him an interest in the foundry; but he said that he knew, as a matter of course, that verbal arrangements of that kind were not legal, and were inoperative, and that 'I come here for the purpose of making arrangements that I knew would be legal and binding;' and then I said to him, 'Mr. Levy, before I discuss this thing, let me understand one thing,—have you made, or have you pretended to have made, any arrangement which is final and closed with Mr. McCan in this connection?' and he said, 'I have not.' I said, 'Very well, then, we are discussing this question absolutely as an open question, and nothing has been done between you and Mr. McCan; nothing has been said which you regard as final, binding, or operative,' and he answered, 'That's the position which I occupy in this matter to-day.' I said, 'In order that I might understand your position towards Mr. McCan, what is your salary?' Mr. McCan and Mr. Levy answered simultaneously, Mr. McCan saying, '$200,' and Mr. Levy saying, 'I am drawing two hundred dollars.' I said, 'Very well, then, I understand your position to be that Mr. McCan has been paying you a salary of two hundred dollars, and that you consider your salary is insufficient for the services which you have rendered to him;' and he says, 'Yes; that's it. I have taken the responsibility,—a very heavy responsibility. I have worked incessantly and have worked faithfully for Mr. McCan, and he has not paid me sufficiently.'" (Italics ours.)

had not been, prior to that date, any agreement between him and the defendant; and the following shows just as conclusively that the proposed written agreement, in which it was stipulated that defendant should pay to the plaintiff $8,000, related to one year's services only, and those services were to be thereafter rendered, and during the progress of the liquidation of the business of D. C. McCan & Son, viz.: "Then it seemed as though there could be no agreement between them. Mr. Levy said, 'Very well, I shall leave on the 1st of January; that's all there is about it.' McCan seemed very much loth to have him quit. I then said to Mr. Levy, 'It seems to me that you might state some amount in dollars and cents—some round sum—that would be satisfactory; some round sum that would not only be ample compensation to you for your services for one year,—[and there was never any question of any engagement being made except for one year,]—which would not only be ample compensation for your services, but would enable Mr. McCan to retain you during the liquidation; and would also be sufficient to remove from your mind any sense of the injustice, as you claim it, that has been done to you, by not having heretofore given you a sufficient salary for your services.' He asked me to state an amount, which I declined to do, and after some hesitation he stated, as it were, tentatively, 'Will you give me eight thousand dollars?' and before I could speak Mr. McCan jumped up, and said, 'Yes;' evidently glad to have the tension of his mind relieved. They went out, after a few unimportant words, and I heard nothing more of it at that time."

It just as clearly appears from the foregoing that plaintiff proposed to discontinue his services after the 1st of January, 1890, unless the defendant consented to pay him additional compensation during the year 1890. From all that has been disclosed by the preceding quotations from the pleadings and evidence, and from other evidence not quoted, but equally convincing and clear, we are satisfied the case is with the defendant on both branches of plaintiff's action. The entries made in defendant's books were never known to or sanctioned by the defendant, and are wholly without efficacy to make proof of a contract. The projet of agreement discloses a simple and incomplete compromise as to plaintiff's contemplated extra services to be thereafter rendered in 1890. There is no evidence to support a quantum meruit for years prior to 1890. The defendant is an old and infirm person, possessed of large means, and who was evidently solicitous of retaining the plaintiff in his employment during the liquidation of the business of the firm, during the year 1890, consequent upon the death of his son and partner, and upon whose services the defendant placed a high estimation. It is also evident that the plaintiff both saw and appreciated the advantage to himself of this situation, and had made up his mind to take all the benefit possible of it; and, finding his schemes circumvented, he brought this suit, in the hope of recouping the profit of his unsuccessful negotiations. It is our deliberate opinion that the plaintiff has no well-founded claim for extra services, and none whatever for damages on the score of defamation of character and slander. In the court below there was judgment for defendant, and it is affirmed.

1. Plaintiff and defendants, having traced their title to a common author, cannot question the validity of the title.

2. The American State Papers, published by order of congress, and the copies which they contain of legislative and executive documents, are admissible in evidence.

3. To maintain the prescription of 30 years, the intention of possessing as owner and the corporeal possession of the thing must be proven.

4. To maintain the prescription of 10 years, there must be a title received from one the possessor honestly believed the real owner.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Madison; FIELD F. MONTGOMERY, Judge.

Action by J. W. Clemens, curator, against V. A. and S. Meyer and others to recover an interest in certain land. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles J. Boatner, for appellants. Stone & Murphy, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiffs brought this petitory action to recover from the defendants the half of the E. ½ of section No. 3, in township No. 15 N., of range 12 E. They are the children of Horace Groves, who, with his brother Elijah, inherited from Moses Groves and wife. One of the plaintiffs was born on 26th January, 1853, and died on the 29th July, 1884; the other was born on the 6th day of March, 1854. In April, 1830, Rachel Rundle and others sold a tract of land to Moses Groves containing 160 acres. In the deed the land is described as part of the land entered by Chiliab Smith. On the 14th day of August, 1830, Sydney M. Smith sold to the same purchaser, Groves, another tract, also containing 160 acres. This completes the title of Moses Groves to 320 acres. The defendants are the owners of Araby plantation, in the parish of Madison. Since many years the lands in controversy have been cultivated as part of that plantation. S. W. Fisk, defendants' author, purchased from Elijah Groves, in 1860, an undivided one-half interest in the east half of section 3. The deed contains a declaration that the half section contains 320 acres. The most ancient title to Araby plantation dates from the year 1850, 38 years prior to the institution of this suit. In the deed of that date H. Nutt was the vendor and Mrs. Urquhart the vendee. No description in that deed includes the land claimed. The sections and other subdivisions make no mention of any portion of section 3. It is, next in order, proven that in June, 1870, S. W. Fisk sold one-half of the plantation to D. Urquhart.

The land in controversy was not described in that deed. On the 18th day of November, 1870, Urquhart sold to Mrs. E. W. Fisk the undivided half of the E. ½ of section 3. On the 19th day of April, 1872, Mrs. E. W. Fisk sold to Urquhart the one-half of the E. ½ of section 3, containing 320.76 acres. In 1882 all the lands were sold to the defendants, and completely described as belonging to the defendants. Then, for the first time, the E. ½ of section 3 is described in its entirety as the property of the defendants. But Urquhart, their author, owned only the one-half of the E. ½ of section 3, which he had bought from Fisk, and therefore could not transfer the entire one-half of that section. S. W. Fisk did not purchase a larger area from Groves than the one-half of the E. ½. Defendants' answer is a general denial, and the prescription of 30 years and of 10 years is pleaded.

With reference to the former prescription, it will not be denied that, to maintain it, the intention of possessing it as owner must be proven, and the corporeal possession of the thing. It is not shown that the possession of this land by the successive owners of Araby plantation has been continuous. It is established by the testimony that, at times, the owners of this plantation cultivated the land in controversy, but it is not proven that they exercised the right of ownership over it, or ever in any manner claimed to be the owners, or did anything showing the intention to possess as owners. The immediate predecessor of the defendants, Urquhart, testifies that he possessed the E. ½ of section 3; occupied and cultivated it by right of ownership, as per act of sale. This purchase to which he refers, witness testifies, was in 1870. He does not state that this possession as owner preceded 1870. He is the only witness who has testified with reference to acts of ownership, such as contemplated by article 3436, Rev. Civil Code, to enable a party to maintain the prescription of 30 years. Another witness, Zeigler, testifies that he has known the property about 30 years. When he knew it first, about 30 years ago, it was cultivated by the owner of Araby plantation. We are not informed by him that the cultivation was that of an owner, even of the crop, or of one known or looked upon as the owner, nor that the owners of that plantation have since cultivated this land or claimed to own it. Another witness, Stanbraugh, testifies that the land now claimed was in in the plantation inclosures after the purchase of J. W. Fisk. The deed of purchase dates from 1852. It is not shown how long it was after the sale. This witness afterwards states that the land was cultivated by Nutt, who was the vendor to Fisk. He only knows of the cultivation. These are the facts submitted to prove the intention of possessing as owner, and the consequent ownership of the realty. The defendants also plead the prescription of 10 years.

After a study of the record, we have not found any title in defendants or their authors prior to 1882. Title, good faith, and possession must concur to maintain this plea. The question of good faith and possession does not arise, as there is no title upon which to base that prescription. We will not return to propositions already considered, to show why we reach the conclusion that defendants have no title prior in date to 1882. It suffices at this time to state that in selling and transferring the one-half of E. ½ it did not include the entire one-half section.

The plea of prescription of 30 years must be overruled, the evidence not having established the condition required from a date sufficiently remote. The prescription was suspended during the minority of plaintiffs. The prescription of 10 years or of 30 years does not run against minors. Rev. Civil Code, arts. 3522, 3554. One of these minors had 19 years of minority, the other 20 years of minority, after their father's death. They married; the dates of their marriage are not proven. The proof would not change the result, as prescription is suspended until majority, and the marriage of the minor does not affect the plea. Vide Barrow v. Wilson, 39 La. Ann. 405, 2 South. Rep. 809. The time necessary to bar their claim is therefore 49 years as to one, and 50 as to the other.

It is also objected that plaintiffs have failed to prove title from the government. The American State Papers (volume 20) were offered to show title in Chiliab Smith, the transferee of the United States government The evidence offered should have been admitted to prove the right of plaintiffs' author as grantee. It is legal evidence. Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 55; Dutillet v Blanchard, 14 La. Ann. 97. It is properly before us by bill of exceptions, and will be considered. In our judgment, this plays no important part. The defendants trace their title to E. W. Groves, the coheir of plaintiffs' father, under which they claim the whole tract. Their author was Moses Groves, also plaintiff's author. We have already stated that in 1860 defendants' author, J. W. Fisk, bought from E. W. Groves; they, therefore, each trace title to the same author. It is held as settled, if the parties trace their title to the same source, neither will be permitted to attack the title of their common author. Girault v. Zunts, 15 La. Ann. 684. Defendants, having no right except such as is derived from E. W. Groves, are a privy thereto, and bound by its recitals equally with the author. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 23.

The defendants also contend that the locus in quo is not proven; that if it be admitted that a confirmation was made to Chiliab Smith of the whole of section 3, that 360 acres of the section was sold to plaintiffs' ancestor, and that plaintiffs' right is not barred, there is still nothing to show that they have acquired any right to the east of half of the section. The deed of sale by Sidney M. Smith to Moses Groves describes part of the land as containing 160 acres, and refers particularly to certificate 1,499, granted to Chiliab Smith by the commissioner. The boundaries are also given. They correspond with the description and boundaries given on the plat in evidence. The plat locates section 3, and the boundaries set forth in the deed locate the land in controversy as being in that section. We therefore conclude that one-half of the east half is the property of plaintiffs, viz., 160 acres; that the prescription of 30 years is not a bar, for the reason that the intention to claim as owners is not made evident by the facts proven; that the prescription of 10 years is unavailing, as defendants' title does not date 10 years prior to the institution of the suit; that the plaintiffs and the defendants own jointly the E. ½ of section 3, once owned by a common author; that the locus in quo is proven. Judgment affirmed, at plaintiffs' costs.

GRAUGNARD v. FORSYTH. (No. 10,964.)

SEIZURE AND SALE—RETENTION OF PROCEEDS BY SHERIFF—STIPULATION.

1. A party having entered into an agreement authorizing the sheriff to retain an amount,—part of the proceeds of the sale of a plantation, realized under executory process,—not having alleged that the agreement had been violated, having introduced a copy of it in evidence without any stipulation or restriction, having proven certain facts by the agreement and by its introduction in evidence, which, had they not been proven, might have resulted in a loss, cannot be relieved from its effects.

2. The sheriff is directed to retain part of the amount agreed upon to await the result of a decision in another court.

3. Although one of the parties to the stipulation may not be a party to the suit, conducted in part at least for his benefit and in compliance with the agreement, he is bound by the proceedings and the result of the suit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. James; HENRY L. DUFFEL, Judge.

Suit by J. B. C. Graugnard against Lucius Forsyth, Jr., to foreclose a certain mortgage lien. Pugh & Co. file their opposition. From the judgment opponents appeal. Modified.

Sims & Poche, for appellants. T. J. Semmes & Legendre and P. E. Edrington, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiff, on the 14th of January, 1891, bought four notes of the Citizens' Bank, of $4,037.25 each. He at the same time bought one note of $5,375 from the Burbridge heirs, and three notes of $3,000 each, all secured by mortgage on Pike's Peak plantation in the parish of St. James. The last three are secured, in addition, by special mortgage on the Burbridge plantation, in the parish of Plaquemine. Plaintiff, on the 27th of January, 1891, obtained from the district court of the parish of St. James a writ of seizure and sale on the said mortgage notes against Pike's Peak plantation. Afterwards plaintiff obtained in the United States circuit court a writ of seizure and sale against the said Burbridge plantation under the said four notes of $3,000 each. On the 6th day of March, 1891, as directed by the plaintiff, the sheriff discontinued all proceedings under the writ of seizure and sale issued in St. James parish on the said four notes of $3,000 each, and continued with the seizure on the other notes. A satisfaction of judgment was entered by plaintiff's counsel, and payments of the five notes attached to plaintiff's petition (the first notes before mentioned) was acknowledged, and the clerk was authorized to cancel the mortgage. Pike's Peak plantation was sold under the said writ on the 7th day of March, 1891, for $39,200, and with the machinery in the sugarhouse, which was appraised and sold separately, it brought $41,325. On the 5th day of March, 1891, the plaintiff and Pugh & Co., holders of an inferior mortgage, entered into an agreement setting forth that executory process had been obtained, and Pike's Peak plantation seized on nine promissory notes, due by the defendant, being the notes before referred to; that four of these notes were secured by mortgage and vendor's privilege as per act passed January, 1889; that another was also secured by mortgage on the 26th of January, 1889; and that four, (of the said nine notes,) dated November 18, 1885, were secured by mortgage and vendor's privilege on the Burbridge plantation, as per act of sale of that date; that they were also secured by mortgage on Pike's Peak plantation, under the before-mentioned act of January 26, 1889; that since the said proceedings were instituted executory process was issued on said four notes of $3,000 each before the circuit court of the United States, whereby the said notes have been withdrawn from the operation of said writ of seizure and sale in the district court of St. James; that Pugh & Co. are mortgage creditors of the defendant in the sum of $12,271.79 and interest and attorney's fees, for which judgment has been obtained as per said mortgage on Pike's Peak plantation, dated May 1, 1890; that they sued out, or were about to sue out, a third opposition in said district court, claiming to be paid, by preference over the plaintiff as holder of the said $3,000 notes, bearing on said plantations, out of the proceeds of said Pike's Peak plantation, and claiming, as to their four notes, that plaintiff is bound to discuss the said Burbridge plantation, and that an injunction might become necessary to protect their interest as mortgage creditors. After these preliminaries had been written, it was agreed that the sheriff should return the writ, quoad said notes, and retain in his hands, out of the proceeds of the sale of Pike's Peak plantation, (after paying plaintiff's said four notes of $4,031.25 and said note for $5,375, also interest, attorney's fee, and costs,) a sum sufficient to pay and satisfy the judgment of Pugh & Co., and hold the amount subject to the decree of the court in said opposition. It was also agreed that, after the sale of the Burbridge plantation under the writ in the circuit court of the United States, the plaintiff "shall credit said writ with the proceeds of said sale, and that any balance due to said Graugnard, after exhausting the proceeds of said Burbridge plantation, shall be paid out of the proceeds of the said Pike's Peak plantation by preference over Pugh & Co.; the intent and purpose of this agreement being to prevent litigation, and the arrest of the sale of Pike's Peak plantation by injunction, which would inflict injury on all parties in interest; and it being also the interest hereof that, while Graugnard authorizes and instructs the sheriff to discontinue the writ in so far as the said four notes, each for $3,000, are concerned, he in no manner abandons his mortgage rights in Pike's Peak plantation or the proceeds to satisfy any balance which may be due him on said four notes of $3,000, after the sale of the Burbridge plantation." The sheriff, in accordance with agreement, paid to plaintiff the five notes and interest, but refused to pay the fee of plaintiff's attorney, of $1,270, and retained the remainder of the proceeds. The Burbridge plantation was sold in April, 1891, by the United States marshal, and brought $7,700; the taxes, commissions, and costs of planting the crop were $2,186; balance, $5,514.

A. F. Slangerup, a creditor of the defendant, intervened in the United States circuit court in the case of Graugnard v. Forsyth, and claimed the proceeds of the sale of the Burbridge plantation in an amount sufficient to satisfy his claim. Four thousand dollars were retained, subject to the further orders of the court, leaving $1,514, which were paid to plaintiff, and properly credited. Pugh & Co. filed their opposition in the district court on the 6th day of March, 1891, and claimed the proceeds to which they laid claim in the said agreement. Plaintiff denied their right to recover, and further alleged in his answer that, should the court recognize their right, he was entitled to be paid the sum of $11,500 out of the proceeds in the sheriff's hands, leaving $4,000 to be paid after the determination of the case before the United States court. At the instance of plaintiff's counsel, a rule was issued against the sheriff to show cause why the fee stipulated in the act of mortgage should not be paid to them. That officer, in his answer, denied their right. The interveners made themselves parties, and, answering, alleged that plaintiff in rule had no right to stand in judgment. Other creditors, hereafter named, also intervened. The district court rendered judgment ordering the sheriff to pay plaintiff's claim secured by mortgage, and including attorney's fee, by preference over all opponents, from the $12,854.90 retained by him subject to a credit of $1,514, collected by the plaintiff from the proceeds of the sale of the Burbridge plantation, and decreed that the sum of $2,125 be paid to H. Kehoe, M. Schwartz & Co., and Taylor Bros., respectively, being due on amount secured by privilege recognized by the judgment, leaving an amount of more than $400 due plaintiff. The claim of A. G. Payne, also an intervener, was rejected. From this judgment Pugh & Co. are the only appellants.

Plaintiff chose to enter into an agreement, the purpose of which he declares was to avoid litigation. He was to endeavor to secure an amount under the mortgage on Pike's Peak plantation which also attached to another plantation. The consideration for the agreement on his part is not made conclusively apparent by its terms, for under the law he had the right to proceed with the foreclosure of his mortgage on Pike's Peak plantation. The want of consideration of this agreement is not alleged, nor its violation. By reference to the record it appears that the stipulation in question was of some use to plaintiff. The plaintiff entered satisfaction of judgment and payment of five notes attached, (the first notes described in the agreement,) and authorized the clerk of court to cancel the mortgage, as before mentioned. The stipulation to pay this fee as contained in the agreement dispenses with the necessity of passing upon the effect of this order to cancel, in so far as relates to the fee. This payment having been agreed upon, it was properly ordered in the judgment appealed from. Without the agreement plaintiff in argument seeks to have ignored, serious questions as to the right to recover might have arisen. The act of agreement was offered in evidence by the plaintiff without restriction as to its effect. A party introducing himself evidence he might exclude must abide its effect. Lafon's Ex'x v. Gravier, 1 Mart. (N. S.) 243; Maclin v. Insurance Co., 33 La. Ann. 801. It was not offered to prove its nullity, for it was not alleged. This agreement had the force of a contract, and cannot be set aside upon grounds less than would warrant the rescission of a contract. Plaintiff refers to several decisions in support of the propositions that, "if a party refuse to comply with his part of the contract, the other may decline his, and that in commutative contracts the failure or refusal of one party to comply liberates the other." It is not decided in any of the cases quoted that the contract is void to the extent that without issue as to its violation a contract admitted without any limitation can be disregarded. In referring to one of the cases, the syllabus from the digest is correctly quoted as above. From the decision to which the syllabus refers we quote: "In synallagmatic contracts the refusal of either party to perform his agreement entitles the other to his liberation." Chase v. Turner, 10 La. 21. On proper issue in this last case the contract was annulled. Although there has not been willingness and promptness on the part of said interveners in complying with its terms, and the sheriff has been erroneously encouraged in retaining this fee, we will not regard the contract as null, and treat it as void, without any issue to that effect. We quote the following from Thompson on Trials, (page 196,) not as conclusive authority, or as having a direct bearing on the subject, but as a reference somewhat in point: "When several cases are pending in court, depending upon the same facts in questions of law, it is competent to stipulate that only one shall be tried, and that the others shall abide the result of that one." "Such a stipulation is not merely an independent executory agreement, but it operates presently to affect the status of the case itself, and invests the plaintiff with rights in respect to its conduct which he otherwise would not have had, and of which neither the opposite party nor the court can lawfully divest him."

The issue is reduced to the amount of $4,000, deposited with the marshal, awaiting the decision of the United States circuit court. We cannot relieve plaintiff, as to this amount, from the effect of his agreement. At the same time justice requires that interveners should be equally bound. In following the terms of the agreement, they are met by the defense in the United States court that a mortgage creditor cannot divide his mortgage so as to affect the rights of third persons. The question must be decided by the court before which it is pending. The interveners cannot ignore nor question the legality of proceedings to which they have consented, carried on contradictorily with the plaintiff, and raise issues which have been settled with him in a tribunal of their selection. In making the agreement it necessarily gave some control of the proceedings to the mortgage creditor. The interveners cannot abstain from all concern in that litigation, and be heard to question the binding effect of the proceedings in the said circuit court. When the decision will have been rendered, if adverse to plaintiff, he will have a right to the immediate payment of the $4,000. If it be rendered in his favor, he will be entitled to all balance due him, principal, interest on all principal due, cost, and balance which may be due on fee, secured by mortgage. The intervenors will have right to the remainder.

Plaintiff, in his answer to the appeal, asks that the judgment appealed from be amended and corrected, in so far as it recognizes the privileges claimed by Schwartz & Co., Taylor Bros., Kehoe Bros., and that these privileges be rejected. All the parties are appellees, except Pugh & Co. Plaintiff is an appellee, and cannot, as such, have the judgment of his coappellees amended. If he desired to have the judgment amended as between him and his coappellees, he should have appealed. Bowman v. Kaufman, 30 La. Ann. 1021; Vance v. Vance, 32 La. Ann. 186; Boisse v. Dickson, 31 La. Ann. 742. It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended, by ordering the sheriff of the parish of St. James to retain $4,000 of the funds realized by the sale of Pike's Peak plantation to be paid to plaintiff if he be cast in the suit pending before the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Louisiana in the case of J. B. C. Graugnard v. L. Forsyth, Jr., Aug. L. Slangerup, intervener, (No. 11, 986,) or, if rendered in his favor before said court, so much of said amount to be applied to the payment of the balance due said plaintiff, Graugnard, as may be necessary, and the remainder to be applied to the payment of Pugh & Co., interveners, on the judgment. After amendment as above, judgment is affirmed, at appellee's costs.

SALE OF SCHOOL LANDS—RIGHT TO ANNUL—TENDER—ELECTION.

1. The residents and the alleged tax-payers in a township in whom is vested the title of the sixteenth section, for the maintenance of the schools, have the right to invoke the interpretation of the court to annul a sale of this section.

2. Tender as a prerequisite to the suit cannot be required.

3. The price was not received by the plaintiffs.

4. No title passed to the adjudicatee of the property.

5. The amount should be returned by the authority by which it was received. In the mean time plaintiffs can prosecute their suit to have the sale annulled.

6. The general government donated the sixteenth sections to the township, and authorized their sale, with the consent of the inhabitants residing within their respective limits.

7. The legislative department of the state, in compliance with the conditions of the grant, adopted laws requiring elections to be held to ascertain the will of a majority of the voters residing within the township, and providing certain prerequisites to the sale.

8. An election not having been held in the township, the return of the election not being sustained at all, the adjudication made was null.

9. The sixteenth section offered for sale should bring its appraised value, which cannot be less than $1.25 per acre.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. Tammany; JAMES M. THOMPSON, Judge.

Suit by Edwin Telle and others against St. Tammany school board and others to annul a sale of land adjudicated to defendant Joseph D. Taylor by the parish treasurer of St. Tammany parish. Judgment was rendered annulling the sale, from which Taylor appeals. Affirmed.

J. Q. A. Fellows, for appellant. Charles T. Madison, for appellees.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiffs sue to annul the sale of the sixteenth section of township 7, range 15 E., adjudicated to defendant Taylor by the parish treasurer of St. Tammany parish on the 17th day of December, 1887, for the sum of $250 cash. They charge fraud, and allege non-compliance with legal requisites. The school board joins the plaintiffs. The defendant filed an exception of no cause of action, and that petitioners had no right to stand in judgment. He also pleads a want of tender. These exceptions were overruled. The defendant Taylor, in his answer, sets up the validity of the sale. Judgment was rendered against him, from which he prosecutes this appeal. No evidence was introduced on the trial of the exceptions. The district judge, having heard the testimony of the witnesses on the merits, part of which related to the issues which had been raised by the overruled exceptions, decided that the alleged taxpayers resided in said township.

The conclusion of the district judge on the issue of fact will not be disturbed on appeal where no error is shown, and it appears correct. State v. Bradley, 37 La. Ann. 623. The names of at least two of the petitioners are on the list of voters, and, it is proven, voted in favor of the said sale. If they were residents of the township, and voted for the sale, they are conclusively residents, as alleged in the petition to have the sale annulled. The illegal disposition of public property can be avoided and annulled at the instance of individual taxpayers. "The courts may be safely trusted to prevent the abuse of their process in such cases." Crampton v. Zabriskie, 101 U. S. 607. We will not maintain the plea of want of tender. The adjudicatee has placed the amount of his bid, less costs, in the treasury of the state. The title to the land has not passed from the township to the said defendant. Those applying for a decree annulling the sale have authority to stand in judgment. They have not the least control over the price received. The state is trustee of the lands, or of the proceeds of their sale. When the lands are sold in compliance with law the amount is placed to the credit of the township, and the interest is applied to the maintenance of its schools. If the title is not such as to divest the owner, the trustee holds the proceeds of the sale illegally. It should be returned to the purchaser. The state, as an act of justice, should return the amount, and doubtless, if application to the legislative department be made, authority for the return will be granted. In the mean time, we cannot give sanction, even temporarily, to a sale that is null, by deciding that the defendant shall hold until the plaintiffs tender an amount which they have not received, and for which they are not responsible.

ON THE MERITS.

The sixteenth section should be sold in the manner directed by law; and, in the apportionment of the interest paid by the state in the proceeds, each township is entitled to the interest on the sums arising from the sale of its school lands. Act of congress of the United States, approved February 15, 1843, authorizes the sale of lands previously reserved and appropriated for the use of schools within the state, and authorizes the investment of the money arising from the sale thereof in some productive fund, and the proceeds to be applied under the direction of the legislature to the support of the schools within the several townships for which they were received, and for no other purpose. These lands are to be sold, under the said act, with the consent of the inhabitants of the township. This was made one of the conditions of the grant. The right of the general government to dispose of the lands, as has been done, and of requiring compliance with the conditions of the donation has never been denied. In several decisions of the United States supreme court the right to require compliance has been recognized. In conformity with the requirements by the government the state legislature, also, has adopted laws to govern in the disposition of these lands. It is made the duty of the parish treasurers to take the sense of the inhabitants of the township, whether or not any lands donated by congress for the use of schools shall be sold, and the proceeds invested as authorized. Polls shall be opened at the most public places in the township after advertisement of 30 days. The evidence satisfies us, as it did the district judge, that no polls were opened, and no election was held. Witnesses whose names appear on the list of the names of voters as having cast their votes at the election for the sale declare that they did not vote. Twelve names are on the list as having voted. The witness at whose residence the election is returned as having been held declares that he saw no box and no ballots. Only two persons came. They did not vote, for no election was held, he says. The return of the justice of the peace, that 12 persons voted, is not sustained by the testimony of record. That the required notice of the election was given is not satisfactorily shown. The law was not complied with. It was never contemplated that those lands could be disposed of without obtaining the consent of a majority of the voters, after a compliance with the legal prerequisites. Without an election the order to sell was void, and the adjudication did not confer any right. If the property of a minor were sold without holding a family meeting, in a case in which it is provided one should be held, the sale would be null. In selling school lands, a sale not authorized by an election is a nullity. The right to sell depends upon compliance with the statute.

The land was sold for less than $1.25 per acre. Section 34 of act 321 of 1855 provides that in no case shall the land be adjudicated for less than $1.25 an acre. This act did not require any appraisement of school land before the sale. Section 34 of said act makes provision for an appraisement. In construing these two acts the court held "that the meaning of section 34 is that the land should bring its appraised value, but that in no case it should be appraised or sold for less than $1.25 an acre." School Directors v. Coleman, 14 La. Ann. 186. To the same effect is section 2944 of the Revised Statutes. In the case to which we have just referred the sale was annulled solely on the ground stated.

In the case under consideration the advertisement was not made as required, the election was not held, and the property was adjudicated for much less than the amount fixed by law.

Judgment affirmed, at appellant's costs.

MORTGAGE IN FRAUD OF CREDITORS—CANCELLATION—RIGHT OF SYNDIC TO SUE—INSOLVENT SUCCESSIONS.

1. The syndic can maintain a revocatory action to have a mortgage canceled, if given in fraud of creditors.

2. He may maintain the action against a creditor, as he can against a non-creditor, of the insolvent.

3. The origin or the date of the claims of certain creditors will not be a cause of dismissal of the action, should it appear that some of the creditors have a right under the actio pauliana.

4. The laws applying to the settlement of insolvent successions in pari materia may be construed with those applying to proceedings affecting the insolvents.

5. Although a judgment is not conclusive on the creditors, similar, in that respect, to judgment against administrators, representing creditors, the syndic can maintain the revocatory action to have the mortgage of a creditor annulled, if it was given in fraud of the creditors.

Appeal from district court, parish of Iberville; EDWARD B. TALBOT, Judge.

In the matter of the insolvency of Anna Chapoton. Suit by the syndic of her creditors against her and her mortgagee, to annul a certain mortgage. From a judgment sustaining defendant's exceptions, the syndic appeals. Reversed.

Alex. Hebert, for appellants. Ernest T. Florance, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. The syndic of plaintiff's creditors brought suit to revoke and annul a mortgage she executed in favor of one of her creditors, on the ground that it was given a short time prior to the surrender of her property to her creditors; that she was insolvent at the time, to the knowledge of the mortgagee; that it was granted to the creditor with the intention of giving him an illegal and fraudulent preference, to the detriment and loss of her other creditors. The defendants (the insolvent and the mortgagee) tendered separate exceptions to plaintiff's action, in which they aver, substantially, that it is not competent for the syndic to maintain such a suit, because, being the representative of all the creditors, he could not champion the cause of some against others, or one class against another class; that creditors must litigate their claims inter sese and en concurso, and not by separate suits instituted by a syndic. The district judge maintained these exceptions, and from the judgment the syndic has appealed.

This action is revocatory. Counsel representing one of the defendants seeks to establish a difference between a class of actions brought under the term actio pauliana, for the purpose of bringing back into the debtor's estate property that has passed out of it, and another class brought to have a right annulled, resting on the property that is still in the debtor's estate; that is, suits in one case against non-creditors, and in the other against a co-creditor. It is conceded that in proceedings against those who are not creditors, to bring into the estate property that has passed out of it, the syndic, as the representative of all the creditors, is authorized to stand in judgment. But it is contended that in cases falling under the latter category, where the litigation is between creditors and creditor, the syndic cannot "take sides;" that he must leave to his constituents the burden of settling their rights among themselves.

It is urged that if this distinction be kept in mind, apparent inconsistencies in the decisions will disappear, because suits by syndics have been maintained where the property which was the subject thereof had passed out of the possession of the insolvent, and had to be brought back, and that suit had not been maintained whenever the issue has been the right of priority of payment out of the property surrendered to the syndic. The law does not seem to contemplate the difference urged in giving to the representative of all the creditors, where there is a cession, an action to annul any contract, in fraud of their rights, and in authorizing him to sue and be sued in everything, respecting the rights and actions which may belong to the insolvent debtor, and which concerns the mass of creditors. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1970; Rev. St. § 1811. Judicial interpretation recognizes the right, in matter of claims such as the one under consideration, of creditors in a concursus opposing the claim of an alleged preferred creditor. This right has not been held as exclusive, and as precluding the direct action between a syndic and a creditor who claims an adverse right. In Giraud v. Mazier, 13 La. Ann. 147, it was held that the creditor can institute an action to cancel a contract made in fraud of creditors after the cession of property. The authority of the syndic to bring a similar action was not questioned. In Tenny v. Provosty, 14 La. Ann. 221, and other cases, it was decided that the syndic was incapable of standing in judgment in a suit to have a privilege recognized; that he represents the mass, and not individual creditors. This must be held correct when creditors bring suit to establish their claims as against their co-creditors, for the syndic cannot stand in judgment for the purpose. The creditors have an interest in a fund to be distributed by the court, and must contest in the distribution contradictorily with each other. The syndic is without authority to oppose a creditor in this respect, or to recognize his claim in any manner, so as to bind the other creditors. But when a creditor has a right on property, and holds it against the concursus, and it becomes necessary to invoke the actio pauliana to have the property brought to the estate free from incumbrance, the syndic has the authority to stand in judgment.

The question arose in the case of Byrne & Co. v. Their Creditors, 33 La. Ann. 201, in which it was urged that the syndic is without authority to question the validity of any claim on the part of creditors. The court held that his duty requires that he should resist all claims which he suspects as illegal or fraudulent, and maintained his answer, setting up the nullity of the judgment of one of the creditors. "The right to plead in behalf of the estate and of the creditors, being once recognized in the syndic, cannot be affected or modified by the nature, origin, or the date of the claims of any creditor of the estate." We have referred to the law authorizing the syndic to stand in judgment in all matters of interest to the creditors. The ground urged for restricting the right to non-creditors in a revocatory action is that the judgment may be rendered annulling a mortgage given before the claims of some creditors were created, and to this judgment such creditors would not be entitled. It sometimes happens in a concursus that creditors have rights in which their co-creditors do not share. A fund may be distributed among particular creditors who have privileges. "The revocatory action may be instituted by a syndic or administrator without regard to the date or origin of the claims of the creditors." Sullice v. Gradenigo, 15 La. Ann. 582. In distributing the funds, the syndic represents all the creditors. In suing to establish a right, he may be placed in a position in opposition to the illegal or fraudulent demands of one or more of the creditors.

The next objection,—"A suit of the latter character would not, if decided against the syndic, constitute res adjudicata as against the creditors." This is correct. The decree between the creditor and syndic would bind them, but would not bind the creditors in all respects. In this we do not find cause to dismiss the action. A decree against an administrator, representing creditors, does not unqualifiedly bind the latter. That would not be considered good ground to dismiss an action against an administrator. The laws applying to the settlement of insolvent successions in pari materia may be taken and construed together with those applying to proceedings in insolvency, as one system, and as explanatory of each other. Although a judgment may not be conclusive on the creditors similar in that respect to judgment against administrators representing creditors, the syndic can maintain the revocatory action to have the mortgage of a creditor annulled if it is given in fraud of creditors. State v. Ellis, 41 La. Ann. 41, 6 South. Rep. 55. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be avoided and reversed, that the case be remanded to the lower court, and that it be reinstated on its docket for further proceedings according to law; appellee to pay costs of appeal.

SEVIER et al. v. DOUGLASS. (No. 10,982.)

WILLS—DEVISEES—CHILDREN BY SECOND MARRIAGE—USUFRUCT—SUBSTITUTION.

1. The testator bequeathed a life estate to his wife, and directed that in case she, at the time of her death, left a child or children, his estate was to descend in fee simple to such child or children. The testator having died, the wife contracted a second marriage, of which the plaintiffs are the issue. The child not conceived at the death of the testator is as incapable of receiving a conditional legacy as he is incapable of receiving a legacy pure and simple.

2. Under the French system, article 906 applies to conditional as well as to legacies pure and simple, and the legatee must exist at the testator's death.

3. Under the corresponding article of the Louisiana Revised Civil Code, (article 1473,) a legacy was limited to the number of children born at the testator's death, although left to all the children of a person named.

4. The suspensive condition of the legacy inured only to the benefit of the children in esse at the death of the testator. Fisk v. Fisk, 3 La. Ann. 494.

5. As the right of the usufruct expires at the death of the usufructuary, the heir does not receive by descent, if the mother was a usufructuary.

6. If she became the owner, the legacy was null, as a prohibited substitution.

7. And if it was not a prohibited substitution, having sold the land, her heirs cannot recover it from the defendants, who hold under the purchase from their mother.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Tensas; S. CHARLES YOUNG, Judge.

Suit by A. J. Sevier and others against Mary B. Douglass to recover land. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wade R. Young and Don Caffery, for appellants. Lemuel P. Conner, Jr., for appellee.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiffs brought this suit to recover a tract of land described in their petition. They allege that they are the children of Sarah H. Sevier, who died in 1891; that by a former marriage she was the wife of Arva Wilson, who died in 1833. At the time of his death he was the owner of the land claimed. By his last will and testament he gave to his wife, who was their mother by second marriage, a life estate in all his property. The will contains directions and conditions which have given rise to this litigation. The testator bequeathed to his wife all his estate, to have and to hold the same during her natural life, and, in order to enable her to live with convenience and comfort, he made it a part of his will that she should enjoy as her own, subject to her control and disposal, all the interests, rents, or profits to arise from the estate; and he provided that, should such income be insufficient to support her in a style suited to her condition in life, an additional sum of $500 was to be annually allowed her by the judges of the orphans' court of Claiborne county. The estate was to be under "her own control and management during her natural life, but in no case chargeable with any incumbrance or debt, except as above provided." The testator directed that should his wife, at the time of her death, leave a child or children, his estate was to descend to them in fee simple; and, in the event of their dying without issue or before attaining the age of 21 years, his estate was to revert to trustees, after deducting particular legacies, small in amount, to two nieces; and he directed that, in case none "of the contingencies before mentioned prevent, the whole of my estate * * * which I may leave at the time of my death shall after the death of my wife be secured in trust for the education of the poor children of Claiborne county."

The propositions are, on the part of plaintiffs: (1) That testator bequeathed to his wife the life estate or usufruct of all his property for the term of her natural life. (2) That, if at her death she left a child or children, the property should descend in fee simple or full ownership to such child or children. (3) That, if at her death she left no child or children, the property should go to the persons designated as trustees to be disposed of, and the proceeds devoted to charitable uses. (4) That if such child or children died without issue, or before attaining the age of 21 years, the property should revert to the trustees for charitable uses, and that the condition contemplated by the testator has happened, and the wife died leaving children. The defendant contends that the testament is void: (1) Because the legacy of the life estate in favor of the wife, and the ownership in favor of the children, is a prohibited substitution. (2) That the legacy has failed, because the children were not in existence at the death of the testator. The exception of no cause of action was maintained. From this judgment plaintiffs appeal.

It being alleged in plaintiffs' petition that the will is valid in substance and form by the laws of Mississippi, in which state it was made, the allegation is taken as true, it being admitted by the exception for the purpose of its trial. The will being valid as to form in the place where it was made, questions of form are not at issue. Forms and the solemnities of instruments are governed by the lex loci. But that rule does not hold in determining as to the capacity of an heir to receive immovable property by last will. He must receive under the lex rei sitæ, it being a right of inheritance, to be governed by the laws where the land lies. It is not argued that one not in existence at the death of the testator is capable of receiving an unconditional legacy; but that, when the donation depends on the fulfillment of a condition, it is sufficient if the donee is capable of receiving at the moment the condition is accomplished. The child unborn at the testator's death is incapable of receiving a legacy. The birth of the child or children was made the condition of the will, and is pleaded as suspending the effect of the legacy until their birth some time after the death of the testator. In Succession of Strauss, 38 La. Ann. 59, referred to by plaintiff's counsel, the amount given to the testator's grandchildren was on the condition of their attaining the age of majority. In case either died, his portion was to be received by the survivor on his attaining the age of majority. In case the children died before reaching the age of majority, certain charitable institutions were instituted universal legatees. The question for determination was not as to the incapacity of the children to receive because of their nonexistence at the time of the testator's death, for all the legatees were alive, but as to whether the suspensive condition was a prohibited substitution. The court held that it was not. The institution of the heirs depended upon a suspensive condition among legatees capable of receiving at the time of the disposition. The suspensive condition was not accomplished after the death of the testator. The questions involved and discussed in Succession of Law, 31 La. Ann. 456, do not apply to conditional legacies, such as the one under consideration. It was decided in that case that the disposition, the property "to be used, enjoyed, and occupied" during the life of the legatee, was the legacy of the usufruct; that the legacy of this property and the suspensive condition caused by the usufruct was not a prohibited substitution.

In the case under consideration it is contended that the legacy was conditional, and that it was sufficient if the heir was capable of receiving it at the time the condition was fulfilled. The question would not present great difficulty were it an application of the principles of article 1474 to a conditional legacy to one in esse at the death of the testator, such as, for instance, a legacy to a feme sole dependent upon her marriage, or to an infant en ventre sa mere; for in that event, by the marriage or the birth, the condition is accomplished for the benefit of a person existing at the time the testator died. It does not conclusively appear that it was the will of the testator to bequeath his estate to children born by another marriage by his widow, subsequent to his death. He bequeathed to the children of his wife. In the second place, the future event, as it resulted, is a condition violative of the article of the Civil Code which provides that the capacity to receive must exist at the opening of the succession. The French system is invoked. We have not found that it sustains plaintiffs' contention. The proposition is broadly announced by Fuzier-Hermann, and a number of authorities are quoted by him, in its support, that jurisprudence the most recent maintains the general rule that the child not conceived at the death of the testator is incapable of receiving a conditional legacy, as he is incapable of receiving a legacy pure and simple. 2 Codes Annotes, art. 906, note, p. 445. "If it is sufficient, in matter of conditional legacies, that the legatee should exist at the moment of the fulfillment of the condition, it would not be difficult to elude article 906 of the Code [to which article 1473 of our Code corresponds] by a condition postponing indefinitely the date of the existence of the legatee." Id. It is true, says the commentator, that we recognize generally under article 1040 of the Code (1698 of our Code) that in conditional legacies it suffices that the legatee be capable of receiving at the moment that the condition is accomplished. "The induction which that article furnishes, although in the main correct, does not justify a derogation from the special rule of article 906 [1473 of Revised Civil Code] as to the necessity of the existence of the legatee at the death of the testator." 7 Aubry & Rau, p. 24. "It is sufficient, under article 906, if the capacity to receive exists at the death of the testator. What should be the decision if the legacy is conditional? The question is not free from doubt," says Laurent, (volume 17, p. 207, par. 159.) "The law requires that the legatee shall exist at the death of the testator, for the reason that the right of the former dates from that epoch. When the legacy is conditional, the right dates from the time it is accomplished. Must we not conclude that it suffices to be conceived at that moment? The opposite decisions are generally followed, and we must admit for historical reasons." Id. "Article 906 only generalized the disposition of the ordinance of 1735, which prohibits the institution of heirs not conceived." Id. D'Agnesseau explains the motive which prevailed in departing from a doctrine which had received the sanction of jurisprudence. "The first capacity is the existence of the legatee. It was objected that in conditional legacies the fulfillment of the condition has a retroactive effect, from which it followed that the instituted heir was to be considered capable of receiving from the date of the death of the testator." Id. D'Agnesseau replies to the objection "that this fiction cannot have any effect; is it not possible to maintain that a child not conceived is conceived?" "The ordinance applied only to instituted heirs, and, thus limited, the disposition explains itself; at the death of the testator the hereditament must rest on some one." Id. "Article 906 applies to conditional as well as to legacies pure and simple." Court of Cassation, 4th February, 1884, (Journal du Palais, p. 1059.) Fisk v. Fisk, 3 La. Ann. 494, is an analogous case. The testator bequeathed an amount to be divided, at the death of the legatee, equally among the children of a younger brother. At the decease of the testator, only two of the plaintiffs were born. The court holds that under the terms of the will, and in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Code, arts. 1457–1459, 1469, the children living at the decease of the testator can alone take under the title. Those born after the death of the testator, but within the condition of the legacy, were excluded from the benefit of the legacy. We prefer to adhere to these principles. They are sustained by the weight of French jurisprudence. We have not found a case before this court extending the effect of a condition to an uncertain future, after the death of the testator, and thus suspending the fee simple or ownership of property.

An alternative plea is presented by plaintiffs to which we have given consideration. It is urged, if plaintiffs, not being born or conceived at the death of the testator, cannot take by devise from him, that, by disposition of the will, the property has descended to them as an estate of inheritance from their mother. They allege that their mother entered into possession of the land as usufructuary. Should it be held that the mother had the usufruct of the property under the will, it did not, on her death, pass to the heirs. It does not confer any rights upon them. The right of the usufruct expires at the death of the usufructuary. Rev. Civil Code, art. 606. Should we, on the contrary, decide that the bequest constituted an ownership, and vested the property in the mother, the case would fall within the prohibition, and the question would be within the grasp of the articles of the Code which prohibit the vesting of property in one person to vest in another at the death of such person. The principles laid down in Marshall v. Pearce, 34 La. Ann. 562, would then apply. "This implies, necessarily, the charge to preserve and return; and under the imperative mandate of Revised Civil Code, art. 1520, the disposition must be declared null." Either the usufruct was bequeathed to the mother, or the ownership, with the charge to preserve and return. It must necessarily be the one or the other. The plaintiffs are without right in either contingency. Lastly, if not a prohibited substitution, their ancestor having sold the land, her heirs cannot recover it from the defendant, who holds under the purchase.

Judgment affirmed, at plaintiffs' costs.

SCHOLEFIELD et al. v. Succession of WEST et al. (No. 10,835.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. March 21, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

MORTGAGES—SEIZURE AND SALE—LIEN FOR TAXES.

When the privileges by which taxes are secured are prescribed, such taxes become mere personal claims against the tax debtor, and mortgage creditors are not debarred from seizing and selling, nor the sheriff from executing title to, the property, by reason of the non-payment. They cease to be taxes due on the property, within the meaning of section 3615, Rev. St., which must be construed in connection with other laws in pari materia.

ON REHEARING.

1. When the sheriff sells property, he must retain in his hands a sufficient amount of the price, regardless of the amount for which the property sold, to pay the taxes due thereon prior to the adjudication.

2. When property is assessed in the name of a person not the owner, and the owner pays the taxes due thereon, he is estopped from disputing the correctness of the assessment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; THOMAS C. W. ELLIS, Judge.

Scholefield, Goodman & Co. sued the succession of B. J. West and foreclosed a mortgage given by deceased. The land was sold and adjudged to plaintiff Goodman, but the sheriff refused to make a deed until the taxes on the premises, due the city of New Orleans, were paid. Goodman took a rule on the city to show cause why the taxes should not be canceled. The rule was made absolute, and the city appealed. The judgment was modified, but on rehearing was affirmed.

Walter B. Sommerville, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for appellant. Carroll & Carroll and White, Parlange & Saunders, for appellees.

MCENERY, J. B. J. West, during his lifetime, mortgaged certain property situated in the city of New Orleans to the plaintiffs. After his death the plaintiffs foreclosed their mortgage, and it was seized and sold, and adjudicated to plaintiff Goodman. The sheriff refused to make a deed to the plaintiff until the taxes due the city of New Orleans, prior to the seizure, were satisfied out of the proceeds of the sale of the property. F. B. Goodman, a member of said firm, and the adjudicatee, took a rule on the city, ordering her to show cause why the taxes, and liens and privileges for taxes, which he alleged had prescribed, should not be canceled and erased. The rule was made absolute for the tax liens of the year 1887 and prior thereto. The city has appealed.

The sheriff has in his hands a fund derived from the sale of property, upon which there was due at the time of the sale city taxes. These taxes are imprescriptible. Section 36, Act 96 of 1877; Act 26 of 1886; Succession of Stewart, 41 La. Ann. 128, 6 South. Rep. 587; Succession of Mercier, 42 La. Ann. 1135, 8 South. Rep. 732; Rivers v. City, 42 La. Ann. 1196, 8 South. Rep. 484. It is immaterial, therefore, under the facts of this case, whether or not the liens and privileges securing said taxes have prescribed. Section 3615, Rev. St., was in force when this adjudication was made. The duties of the sheriff are therefore controlled by it, and not by Act 88 of 1888, amending said section of the Revised Statutes, which is not a remedial statute, and therefore not retroactive. In the case of Laplace v. Laplace, 43 La. Ann. 286, 8 South. Rep. 914, in interpreting section 3615, Rev. St., we said: "The law requires the sheriff to see that the taxes are paid on immovable property before he executes any act for the sale or transfer of the property. The tax ought to be paid before the adjudication, as this act transfers the title to the property. * * * If the sheriff fails to collect the tax himself, or is not furnished with the evidence of the payment, he must pay it out of the proceeds of the sale of the property, regardless of the amount for which the property sold." The rule prays for the cancellation of the taxes for the years 1882 to 1890, inclusive. After the death of West, the property was continued on the assessment roll in his name. So far as the sheriff is concerned, he is only interested in the payment of the taxes due prior to the adjudication to Goodman. Goodman has paid the state taxes due on the property since the adjudication to him, and also the tax of 1887. By so doing he has ratified and approved the assessment of the property, and is estopped from contradicting or disputing the same. The object of requiring a description of the property, and the name of the owner, when it is assessed, is for the purpose of identifying the property, so that the owner cannot be misled by the description of the property and the alleged ownership. If the property is assessed in the name of a person not the owner, and the real owner pays the tax thus assessed, he certainly has no reason to complain of the defective assessment. The object of the law has been accomplished in conveying to the real owner the knowledge of the assessment of his property.

Where there are two authorities levying the tax on the same assessment rolls,—the state and the municipality,—it would be a grave injustice to permit the tax debtor to continue on the rolls a defective assessment, which he recognizes by paying the tax assessed to the one, and then permit him to take advantage of the defective assessment, and escape the payment of the tax due to the other. Such would be the case here. The plaintiff in the rule on a defective assessment has paid the taxes assessed to the state. He now repudiates the assessment, and attempts to evade the payment of taxes due the city. His recognition and approval of the assessment by the payment of state taxes effectually estops him from denying the same assessment in favor of the city. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled so as to discharge the rule as to all taxes. In other respects it will be affirmed.

ON REHEARING.

The plaintiffs, mortgage creditors of the late B. J. West, seized and sold, under executory process, the property subject to their mortgage. The price realized is not sufficient to pay the mortgage of plaintiffs. The property is incumbered by inscriptions of taxes due the city of New Orleans for numerous years, and the sheriff declined to proceed in execution of the adjudication until the conflicting claims between the plaintiffs and the city should be settled. Thereupon the plaintiffs took this rule on the city to show cause why the inscriptions of these taxes as liens and privileges on the property should not be canceled and erased, on the ground that said liens and privileges were prescribed. Issue was joined, and, after trial, judgment was rendered rejecting plaintiffs' demands, so far as the taxes of 1888, 1889, and 1890 are concerned, recognizing the superior privilege of the city for the same, but making the rule absolute as to the taxes of former years. From this judgment the city appeals. The right of the plaintiffs to purge the property of prescribed privileges, apparently priming their mortgage, is not questioned. No objection is made to the mode of proceeding. The city admits that the liens and privileges for taxes of 1887 and prior years are prescribed; therefore we are relieved from the necessity of examining that question. We can discover no possible force in the city's contention that plaintiffs must be denied relief because it was stipulated in their act of mortgage that the mortgagor should pay the accruing taxes. That stipulation imposed no duty on the mortgagees, added nothing to the legal duty of the mortgagor, and took away nothing from the rights of the city. The city was entirely unaffected thereby.

The city further contends, as we understand it, that plaintiffs are entitled to no relief on account of the prescription of the privileges, because the taxes themselves are not prescribed, and section 3615 of the Revised Statutes prohibits the sheriff from passing sale of the property "unless the state, parish, and municipal taxes due on the same be first paid." Pretermitting the question, much controverted in argument, as to whether section 3615 remains in force or has been repealed by subsequent revenue laws, further reflection has convinced us that the terms "taxes due on the same," as used in the law, must be confined to taxes having a subsisting privilege on the property. The privilege in favor of taxes, like all other privileges, is derived from the law. The Code defines a privilege to be "a right which the nature of a debt gives to a creditor, and which entitles him to be preferred before other creditors, even those who have a mortgage." Rev. Civil Code, art. 3186. The law granted this privilege to the city for its taxes, but the same law declares that the privilege should be prescribed by three years. If the law had not granted the privilege, the city would not have had the right to be preferred over mortgage creditors. While the privilege subsisted, the city had this right. After the privilege was extinguished by prescription, the city lost the right. To maintain the construction of section 3615 contended for by the city would render equally nugatory the laws granting privileges for taxes, and those prescribing such privileges; for if, under that section, mortgages can, in no event, be satisfied until the taxes are first paid, it seems absurd and superfluous either to grant or to prescribe privileges for such taxes. Obviously, when the privileges for the taxes were prescribed, the taxes became mere personal claims against the tax debtors, having no greater right against this particular property than against any other property of the debtor. They were no more "due on" this particular property than on any other property. Such taxes do not fall within the provision of section 3615, which must be so construed as to harmonize with other laws referring to the same subject-matter. It is therefore ordered that our former decree herein be set aside, and it is now decreed that the judgment be affirmed.

3. The succession should not receive credit for the value of property, the title to which is not proven, nor that it was appropriated by the widow and tutrix.

4. The widow and minors' portion, being a provision for the destitute, cannot be waived in favor of a creditor, and carried in the account of administrator as a claim ranked after his.

5. Privilege on a crop must be paid from the proceeds of the crop on which advances were made, and not from the proceeds of crops of subsequent years.

6. Protest was not necessary. Fee cannot be charged.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of East Carroll; FIELD F. MONTGOMERY, Judge.

Succession of A. G. Waddill. The administrator filed a provisional account, which he petitioned to have homologated. Jane Waddill, widow and tutrix, intervened, joining the petition of the administrator. R. H. Hamlin, D. G. Tutt Grocery Company, and Chaffe & Powell opposed the account. From a judgment homologating the account the opponents appeal. Modified.

C. S. Wyly, for D. G. Tutt Grocery Co., appellants. J. M. Kennedy and E. J. Delony, for administrator and tutrix, appellees.

BREAUX, J. The succession of A. G. Waddill was opened in September, 1887, in which month the administrator qualified. The decedent left a widow and four minor children. The administrator in January, 1889, filed a provisional account, showing for distribution a balance of $2,660.04. On the tableau of debts and the distribution of funds, he placed the claim of the widow and the children of the deceased as creditors for $1,000, as being in necessitous circumstances, and as not possessing that amount in their own right. Jane Waddill, widow and tutrix, intervened, joining the administrator in his petition that the tableau allowing her $1,000 be homologated. R. H. Hamlin, D. G. Tutt Grocery Company, and Chaffe & Powell opposed the account and tableau. The administrator carried the account of D. G. Tutt Grocery Company on the tableau for the sum of $122.60, as ordinary creditors. This firm opposed on the ground that they had a right to $152.12. The court amended the amount by allowing $19.50. Total allowed, $142.10. The only remaining difference as to this creditor is with reference to a fee of protest of $3.02. The administrator carried the claim of Chaffe & Powell on the tableau for the sum of $1,411.33, with privilege on the crop as furnishers of supplies, and $414.73 as an ordinary debt. They opposed the account and tableau, alleging that under their contract they were to impute the payment as they saw proper; that, after exercising that right of imputation, they aver that they remained creditors of the succession for the sum of $1,853.45, being a balance of advances to make, gather, and prepare for market the crop in 1887, on which they claim a privilege and pledge under their contract. The opposing creditors to the account opposed the $1,000 to Jane Waddill, widow, and children, as not being in necessitous circumstances; and they alleged that she had taken possession of succession property exceeding said amount, disposing of part of same, and that she had not rendered an account thereof to the administrator. Judgment was rendered, homologating the account, amending the tableau, as before mentioned in so far as relates to the credit of D. G. Tutt Grocery Company, and dismissing the opposition of Chaffe & Powell. The latter have appealed.

The opponents admit that the administrator's account is in the main correct. The issue relates to the $1,000 allowed to the widow and minors; to the total due Chaffe & Powell, and the privilege they claim; and to a very small amount claimed by the Tutt Grocery Company, to which we have already referred.

The $1,000, widow and minor's claim. The widow and minor children, having proven their necessitous condition at the death of the husband and father, are entitled to this amount of $1,000, less the value of any property received by her. It is contended by the opponents that the value of six mules should be deducted from this amount. They charge that these mules were appropriated by the widow. It is not stated that they were appraised, and their value carried in the inventory as part of the assets of the succession. The administrator's acts are not complained of, and we have no reason to infer that he has not properly discharged his trust. He qualified a short time after the succession had been opened. Prior to qualifying, he was the custodian of the property. It is not stated that the least claim was made by him to these mules. There were still three of the mules remaining when the case was tried. Two had died. The number was five, not six, as claimed. Some time prior to the death of Waddill, these mules were assessed in the name of his mother-in-law. She claimed them, took them in her possession, and on the trial offered testimony to prove that they are hers. While the testimony is not conclusive as to her title, there is no question that she was in possession of the three remaining when the case was tried, and that she took possession of the five as an owner. The succession cannot be credited with the value of property to which title is not proven, and which is not proven to have been appropriated by the widow and tutrix. The widow admits that she kept for the use of herself and children what little furniture there was. Its value was $40, with which she must be charged. It is not proven that the other items claimed by opponents as amounts which should be charged against the widow and tutrix were appropriated by her.

Alleged waiver. The widow and minors' portion under Act 17th March, 1852, is a provision for the destitute, and cannot be waived in favor of a creditor, and made subordinate to his claim, during the settlement of the succession. It must be paid without reference to any waiver.

Imputation of payment. The creditors Chaffe & Powell oppose the debit balance against the succession as shown in the tableau. Their witness states that on the 18th day of February, 1887, A. G. Waddill owed them a balance of $275.97, advances on the crop of 1886. They had in their hands, at the time of the crop of 1886, 10 bales of cotton, which they sold. The sale amounted to $416.79, leaving a balance of $137.82 to be credited on the account of 1887:

The amount of the account is	$1,863 45
Deducting amount for 1886	279 97
	$1,583 48
Balance credit balance, 1886	137 82
Balance	$1,445 66

—due by the succession.

Fee of protest. The note protested had been sent "for collection." It was not transferred. There was no necessity for protest, and the fee is not chargeable. "A promissory note not having been indorsed, there was no need of protest." Tied. Com. Paper, § 321.

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended by charging the widow and tutrix, Jane Waddill, with the sum of $40, to be deducted from the widow's and minors' portion; that the claim of Chaffe & Powell be increased from $1,826 to $1,863.45; of that amount the privilege on the crop of 1887 is increased from $1,411.33 to $1,445.66. After amendment, judgment affirmed, at appellees' costs.

DRAINS—OBSTRUCTION BY RAILROAD EMBANKMENT—POWERS OF POLICE JURIES—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

1. Police juries have the power to regulate the direction, the making, and repairing of the roads, bridges, causeways, dikes, and levees.

2. They also have authority to cause to be opened such ancient natural drains as have been obstructed by the owners of the adjacent lands on points of land on the Mississippi or other water courses divided among several proprietors; also to adopt a system of drainage.

3. The right sought to be vindicated is not included in any of these powers.

4. The police jury has no authority to institute suit to enforce a servitude by a servient estate, or to have embankments leveled, in matters of a private nature, and not included in its powers.

5. Prior laws are not repealed by subsequent ones, unless by positive enactments or clear repugnancy.

6. They should, if possible, be considered and construed together, and their differences reconciled.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Concordia; S. CHARLES YOUNG, Judge.

Suit by the parish of Concordia against the Natchez, Red River & Texas Railroad Company for the purpose of having removed certain obstructions and embankments. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing denied.

Luce & Lemle, for appellant. Elam & Dagg, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. The police jury of the parish of Concordia instituted this suit against the defendant company for the purpose of having removed all obstructions and embankments closing drains alleged as natural; these drains being sloughs, bayous, and low places, alleged as having been closed by defendant's railroad embankment. Plaintiff avers that the drainage of certain plantations, especially of the five plantations designated by name, viz., Concordia, Fletcher, Helena, Panola, and Clearmont, is obstructed and damaged, and that at times the plantations are flooded, and thereby made uncultivable; that the obstructions also impede the flow of water and drainage of other plantations than those named, which are also thereby damaged; that these plantations front on Lake Concordia,—now a part of the Mississippi river,—and drain through the obstructed places south or southwest of defendant's railroad embankment into Crocodile bayou and Red river; that the waters from several streams are obstructed and impeded by this embankment, thereby causing great damage. Petitioners pray that all obstructions and embankments closing the natural drains be removed. The owner of one of these plantations, the Helena, is also one of the parties to the suit, personally and as president of the police jury.

Defendant's exception, which was sustained by the court, in so far as the parish was concerned, and overruled as to the other plaintiff, presented as grounds that the police jury has no interest in the suit, and that in matter of drainage its authority is limited to the power delegated by Act 107 of 1888, and the amendment thereto, (Act 83 of 1890.) The defendant also alleges that plaintiffs have no cause of action. Police juries have the power to regulate the direction, the making, and the repairing of the roads, bridges, causeways, dikes, and levees. They also have authority to cause to be opened such ancient natural drains as have been obstructed by the owners of the adjacent lands in any town, or where a point of land on the Mississippi or other water course shall be divided among several proprietors, and to cause any water course which is not navigable to be filled for the purpose of a highway; and when there are 12 inhabitants of a town, suburb, or other place divided into house lots, or when a point of land on the Mississippi or other water course shall be divided among several proprietors, and it shall be found necessary to dig one or more common draining ditches, the said juries shall have the right to ordain that the said ditches be dug at the expense of the owners of the lots, and that the expenses be borne by a contribution among the owners, to be levied in such manner as the jury shall prescribe, saving to individuals or persons aggrieved the right of petitioning for the making or opening of such natural or artificial drainings when necessary or damaging to them. Police juries are limited to the exercise of the authority delegated to them, and its exercise must be by general ordinance. Jura non in singules personas, sed generaliter constituuntur. Their function should be exercised in parochial interests and others of a general and public character. "Police juries have only express powers, and those incidental to powers so expressly granted." The legislature has limited and defined the powers granted. State v. Miller, 41 La. Ann. 53, 5 South. Rep. 258, and 7 South. Rep. 672. In matter of roads, bridges, causeways, dikes, and levees they have full authority to have drains open when it becomes necessary to the protection of these interests. All drains which, by being closed, are damaging to roads, bridges, causeways, dikes, and levees may be opened. This does not confer the authority and the responsibility of acting when the interests are private, and no community or settlement has the least cause to be concerned. In establishing a general system of drainage, or in the building of dikes for the purpose mentioned, police juries can maintain suits. They also have authority to cause to be opened ancient drains on water courses on lands divided among certain proprietors. This does not give the right in a suit to vindicate rights of servitude in any case which may arise. In Sicard v. Chits, 13 La. 114, a large settlement was interested in reopening a navigable stream, "and that river a branch of the Mississippi river, and the only water communication between that stream and one of the oldest and largest settlements in the state." The use was public, and the right of the police jury to sue was maintained. Upon reference to the transcript of appeal in Avery v. Police Jury, 12 La. Ann. 556, we find that it discloses that more than 50 inhabitants were interested in lands in the vicinity, and that the area of land affected by the drain was large. The plaintiff had enjoined the enforcement of "an ordinance adopted for the purpose of draining a point of land on the Mississippi." It is not shown by plaintiff's petition that the suit seeks to vindicate a public right, or to enforce a system of drains, to be observed in reopening an ancient natural drain on a water course divided among several proprietors. The question is one strictly with reference to the servitude due to the alleged dominant estates, and, being a private matter, it does not devolve upon the police jury to institute suit to vindicate whatever right there may be.

The question of the repeal of the laws relating to drainage by Act 107 of 1888, and the amendment thereto, (Act 83 of 1890,) does not require consideration in this case. By these the police juries were authorized to divide the parishes into drainage districts. They are directed to appoint commissioners, whose duties are defined. The method of the enforcement of the law has been changed in some respect. The prior laws are not entirely repealed. "Prior laws are not repealed by subsequent ones, unless by positive enactment, or a clear repugnancy in their respective provisions." Johnson v. Pilster, 4 Rob. (La.) 77. This action is not maintainable, considered under the law,—the prior or the subsequent. Judgment affirmed, at appellant's cost.

Succession of McKNIGHT. (No. 10,989.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. March 21, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

APPEAL—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT — ACCOUNTING BY ADMINISTRATOR—FORFEITURE OF LANDS FOR TAXES.

1. The administrator of the succession of a deceased administrator filed his final account. It was opposed on the ground that the deceased administrator's succession was liable for the loss of certain real estate belonging to the former succession, which he had allowed, through his negligence, to be sold for taxes. The value of the property was $1,276. Held, that the opposition was a separate cause of action, an unliquidated claim presented against the last succession, which could have been urged in a direct action, and the jurisdiction of the supreme court must be determined by the amount involved, and not by the amount to be distributed in the succession account opposed.

2. There was no amount to be distributed, which was involved in the opposition to the account.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Grant; A. V. Coco, Judge.

Howard McKnight was administrator of the succession of Meredith Calhoun. McKnight died, and his widow, Elizabeth McKnight, administered his succession, and filed a final account of her administration. W. S. Calhoun, son of Meredith Calhoun, opposed her final account on the ground of her husband's indebtedness on account of his administration of Calhoun's succession. Opponent having died, his widow and executrix, Cora E. P. Calhoun, made herself a party to the opposition, and from the judgment she appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Hunter & Hunter, for appellant. R. J. Bowman, for appellee.

McENERY, J. Howard McKnight was the administrator of the succession of Meredith Calhoun. He died, and his widow, Elizabeth McKnight, administered his succession. She filed a final account of her administration. W. S. Calhoun, son of Meredith Calhoun, opposed the final account; the basis of the opposition being the indebtedness of said succession to him on account of the administration of his father's succession by Howard McKnight. He died, and Mrs. Cora E. P. Calhoun, widow and executrix, made herself a party to said opposition. She abandoned all the grounds alleged in the opposition, except one. There was no item on the account objected to, and there was no attempt made to disturb the distribution of the funds as proposed in the final account.

The ground retained and urged in the opposition is that Howard McKnight, administrator of the succession of Meredith Calhoun, through his fault and negligence, allowed certain real estate to be sold in the parish of Rapides for taxes. The real estate thus sold was inventoried at $1,276. There is no sum to be distributed in the succession of McKnight that is involved in this litigation. The opposition is only the statement of a cause of action against the deceased administrator's succession for illegal or wrongful acts while administrator of the succession of Meredith Calhoun. It is a matter which can be urged in a direct action. Succession of Sanchez, 41 La. Ann. 504, 6 South. Rep. 791; Succession of Scott, 41 La. Ann. 668, 6 South. Rep. 792; Succession of Pickett, 41 La. Ann. 882, 6 South. Rep. 655. As it is an unliquidated claim against the succession of McKnight for maladministration of the succession of Meredith Calhoun by the deceased administrator, and presented by way of opposition instead of by direct action for recognition, the test of our jurisdiction is the specific sum demanded. The amount is below the lower limit of our jurisdiction.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

SCHULTE v. NEW ORLEANS C. & L. R. CO.

(No. 10,904.)[1]

STREET RAILROAD—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. A person who is afflicted with deafness, and who wears a protruding apparel, obstructive of the sense of sight, and who ventures, without looking right or left, to cross a street railway track, acts rashly, and is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover damages in case of an injury sustained by a collision with a coming mule and car.

2. The driver had a right to presume the person sound of hearing, and that she would exercise her senses, so as to avoid an accident, by stopping in time to let the mule and car pass freely.

3. The verdict of a jury, in favor of the company, in such a case, will not be interfered with.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Suit by Henry Williams Schulte against the New Orleans City & Lake Railroad Company to recover damages for personal injuries to his wife. From a judgment on a verdict for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing refused.

Moise & Titche and Sambola & Ducros, for appellant. Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellee.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This is a suit in damages for $15,000. The substantial allegation is that on the morning of August 26, 1889, at about 10 o'clock, petitioner's wife, while in the act of crossing Royal street at its intersection with Bartholomew street, in the third district of this city, was suddenly and violently knocked down and injured by a car of said company, which passed over her, injuring her ankle, through the gross carelessness, neglect, fault, and management of the driver thereof, in the employ of the company. The petition proceeds to describe the injury sustained, the suffering endured, the nature of the damages experienced, etc. The answer is a denegation, and charges that plaintiff's wife, through the most reckless inattention, carelessness, and imprudence, contributed to and was the sole cause of the accident. The case was tried before a jury, who returned a verdict for the defendant, upon which, satisfied with the correctness of the finding, the district judge rendered judgment accordingly. The plaintiff appeals.

The evidence shows that plaintiff's wife was hard of hearing,—in point of fact, deaf,—wore a large sunbonnet, at the time mentioned, which covered both sides of her face, coming down over her shoulders. It is evident that she neither saw nor heard the approaching car while she was walking to cross the street, for, had she seen or heard it, she would either have stopped, or, at her peril, hurried through safely. It is not to be supposed that when the driver saw her he imagined she would not stop, and that he acted wantonly. He had a right to believe that she had exercised her senses, and would stop, and so avoid all accidents. The authorities are numerous that upon approaching a street crossing of a railway track it is the duty of a traveler to exercise his senses of sight and hearing, and to look and listen for the approaching train or car, and that his failure to do so is negligence, which, in case of collision, prevents the recovery of damages for injuries sustained. Herlish v. Railroad Co., 10 South. Rep. 628, (lately decided, No. 10,729, not yet officially reported;) Childs v. Railroad Co., 33 La. Ann. 154; Hearn v. Railroad Co., 34 La. Ann. 160; Gallaher v. Railroad Co., 37 La. Ann. 288; White v. Railroad Co., 42 La. Ann. 990, 8 South. Rep. 475; Brown v. Railroad Co., 42 La. Ann. 350, 7 South. Rep. 682; Peets v. Railroad Co., 42 La. Ann. 547, 7 South. Rep. 688. See, also, Whart. Neg. § 384; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 63. Under the facts and the law, the plaintiff cannot recover.

STATE v. DEFFES. (No. 10,876.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

ENCROACHMENT ON PUBLIC MARKETS—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE—RECORD ON APPEAL.

In case there is shown to have been no contestation in the recorder's court in reference to the constitutionality or legality of the city ordinance that is drawn in question, this court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the controversy.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from recorder's court of city of New Orleans; MARCIS S. BRINGIER, Judge.

Prosecution against S. Deffes for the violation of a certain ordinance of the city of New Orleans. From a judgment on conviction, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Branch K. Miller, for appellant. Henry Renshaw, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for the State.

WATKINS, J. The defendant is appellant from a sentence and decree of the recorder, finding him guilty of a violation of certain city ordinances, prohibiting the establishment of any private market within a given distance from any public market of the city. In the lower court the defendant's answer appears to have been oral, inasmuch as no answer or plea in writing is among the original papers which are brought up for our review; and a statement of facts, signed by the recorder, announces that "the issue presented, in case an appeal is taken, is whether the prohibited distance is six squares, as walked, of whatever length, or 2,100 feet." Prior to the submission of the case an order was made, directing certiorari to issue, requiring the recorder to produce and file certain original papers, said to contain an alleged plea of the defendant, denying the legality and constitutionality of the ordinance under which this prosecution is conducted, and which does not appear to form part of the record. To this rule the recorder filed an answer, and therein specifically stated that he has no recollection of any such plea having been made, and, having no such recollection, he caused testimony to be taken on the subject, in order to comply with the order of court; and he avers and represents that said testimony, when taken, failed to establish that any such plea was made. The recorder's return appears to be conclusive on the question, and to establish the fact that no such plea was ever made in this court. This question eliminated from the case, practically it is left without an appealable or jurisdictional issue. In State v. Clesi, 44 La. Ann. ——, 10 South. Rep. 409, we recently said that in case the record discloses that there was raised in the recorder's court no contestation as to the constitutionality or legality of the city ordinance under which the appellant is prosecuted, the appellate jurisdiction of this court does not attach, citing previous decisions. State v. Tsni Ho, 37 La. Ann. 50; State v. Burthe, 39 La. Ann. 341, 1 South. Rep. 656; City of New Orleans v. Hill, 32 La. Ann. 1162; State v. Romano, 37 La. Ann. 98; State v. Lazarus 35 La. Ann. 1190. The only thing left us to do is to affirm the judgment.

HOBGOOD v. SCHULER. (No. 10,900.)

SCHULER v. SUTHERLIN. (No. 10,900.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

MORTGAGES—PAYMENT BY VENDEE—SUBROGATION.

1. A party who advances money to the mortgage creditor of his debtor, in the payment of interest accumulations on the mortgage debt, becomes legally subrogated, pro tanto, to the mortgage creditor's right.

2. A party who purchases property incumbered by mortgage and vendor's lien, and employs the price in the payment of the mortgage debt, becomes legally subrogated to the mortgage creditor's right also.

3. An unauthorized cancellation of a mortgage may be reinstated on proper proceedings, taken contradictorily with the recorder and other mortgage creditors.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of De Soto; W. PIKE HALL, Judge.

Bill by Hobgood & Foster, C. P. Hobgood substituted, against Charles Schuler. The action was consolidated with one by Charles Schuler against George H. Sutherlin. From a decree for defendant, plaintiff appeals, and Schuler asks for an amendment of the judgment. Affirmed.

C. M. Pegues, for plaintiff, appellant. E. W. Sutherlin, for Schuler, appellant.

WATKINS, J. Alleging Charles Schuler's possession as owner of a tract of 320 acres of land, which he had acquired from one James, his judgment debtor, since the registry of his judgment against it as a judicial mortgage on the 28th of February, 1889, the plaintiff proceeds against said property by the hypothecary action in the foreclosure and enforcement of same. The defense set up is that, in 1882, James bought of Mrs. J. V. McKellor a tract of 560 acres of land for the total price of $3,356, of which $400 was paid in cash, and for the remainder he executed his several promissory notes, falling due, respectively, on January 1, 1884, 1885, 1886, and 1887, with interest, the payment of which being secured by a duly-recorded mortgage and vendor's lien upon the property. That for certain advances made for James, in cash, to make advanced payments on this property, and money advanced to enable him to put improvements thereon, Schuler took a title to 240 acres of said land on the 22d of January, 1885, though the consideration therefor is expressed in the act of sale as $1,800 in cash; being insufficient in amount to satisfy the whole of James' indebtedness to him. That on March 17, 1890, by deed recorded same date, he purchased of said James the remaining 320 acres of said original tract of land,—the land which is the subject of this contestation,—ostensibly for $3,200 in cash, as recited in the deed, while in reality the consideration was the balance of the original purchase price that James was due McKellor, "which was then estimated, in principal and interest, including sums previously advanced thereon by him, to be about that amount, but which in fact amounted to the sum of $3,232.56." That he thereafter executed a special mortgage on the entire tract of 560 acres and other lands, to secure a loan of money one Thompson had made to him for the purpose of enabling him to pay off and discharge "the three last-mentioned notes of James, given as part of the purchase price (of the land) to McKellor, as aforesaid; and that respondent (Schuler) thereby became legally subrogated to the said McKellor's rights of vendor's privilege and special mortgage on the said remaining 320 acres of land to secure said last three notes executed by James to McKellor; and that he (Schuler) was thereby entitled to be paid the amount thereof, and sums previously advanced to him thereon, as aforesaid, out of said 320 acres of land, in preference to plaintiffs." As applicable to the foregoing statement, counsel further represent that the McKellor mortgage was, without due authority or his (Schuler's) consent, and also in error of fact, canceled and erased from the mortgage record, wherein it was in due time and seasonably recorded; and, in proper proceedings against the recorder and the plaintiff, he seeks its re-establishment and maintenance, with preference on the proceeds of sale over the mortgage of the plaintiff quoad the tract of 320 acres of land. In the matter of the rule on the recorder, the defendants urge a plea of no cause of action, which being overruled, there was a motion made to strike out Schuler's answer in the hypothecary action on somewhat similar grounds to those taken under the plea of no cause of action; and it was likewise overruled. The answer in the rule proceedings is, substantially, that from the proceeds of Thompson's loan to Schuler the James notes were paid, the McKellor mortgage canceled, and the rights of mortgagee and of mortgagor became united in Schuler as purchaser from James, and were extinguished by confusion; therefore the cancellation was correctly made, and cannot be revoked. On Schuler's motion the two cases were consolidated, and on the trial judgment was rendered recognizing plaintiff's judicial mortgage, and sale ordered of the 320 acres of land; but it further decreed that Schuler was legally subrogated to the rights of vendor's privilege and mortgage of McKellor "for the said three last notes of James to her in controversy, to take rank as of date of recordation on November 3, 1882, and that Schuler be paid the amount of said three notes in principal and interest out of proceeds of sale of said 320 acres of land in preference to Hobgood's judicial mortgage." No allowance is made for counsel fees, as prayed for in the answer of Schuler. From that judgment the plaintiff appealed, and in answer to the appeal Schuler requests an amendment in his favor, awarding him the 5 per cent. stipulated in the McKellor mortgage as counsel fees; praying that it be in other respects affirmed. On this presentation of the case there are two questions for determination: (1) Schuler's subrogation vel non to the McKellor mortgage; and, (2) if subrogated, the extent of his subrogation; for it seems to be plain that, if Schuler be subrogated to McKellor's right of mortgage, the question of cancellation is but of little practical importance, as both the theory of the plaintiff's and that of the defendant's counsel clearly indicate that it was erroneously made; that of the former being that Thompson's agent, with undue haste, acted upon an incompleted abstract of title, which made no disclosure of the Hobgood mortgage, the knowledge of which would have prevented its acceptance; and that of the latter being that, while he was the applicant for a loan of money from Thompson, he had no knowledge of plaintiff's mortgage, or of the abstract on which Thompson's agent acted in making the loan, and not only had no knowledge of the cancellation, but that its cancellation was adverse to his interest as a creditor of James.

1. There is but little dispute in regard to the evidence, and but little difference of opinion as to the law of subrogation. It seems to be conceded that whereas Schuler became a purchaser from James of the 320-acre tract of land affected by the plaintiff's judicial mortgage, and subsequent to the date of its registry, for a price stated to be cash, yet the real and true consideration thereof was the amount of the balance due McKellor on the last three purchase notes of James, capital and interest, and certain other sums previously advanced by Schuler to James, which together aggregated a little more than the amount named in the deed as the purchase price; and it also seems to be conceded that the amount of the said three purchase notes were paid from the proceeds of the Thompson loan, and that upon the faith of that payment the McKellor mortgage was canceled and erased, no other incumbrance on the property mortgaged appearing to interfere with the loan, and there being no part of the sum loaned coming to Schuler after the James notes were paid, and his own mortgage indebtedness upon other portions of his property discharged. We may therefore accept as a fact that Schuler purchased with the intention, and James sold with the understanding and expectation, that the sale would square their accounts, and, resting upon that fact, the principle of law is clear that "subrogation takes place of right * * * for the benefit of the purchaser of any immovable property who employs the price of his purchase in paying the creditors to whom this property was mortgaged." Rev. Civil Code, arts. 2161, 2162. Therefore Schuler, having employed the price he contracted to pay James in the satisfaction of the purchase notes he owed McKellor, became legally subrogated to the McKellor mortgage and vendor's lien on the property, and that lien and mortgage primes and ranks the judicial mortgage of the plaintiff.

2. Being legally subrogated to McKellor's right of mortgage and vendor's lien on the property, plainly implies that Schuler is to take the place of McKellor quoad that lien and mortgage; and McKellor's right was limited by the amount of his demand, as evidenced by James' purchase notes, and the stipulation of the act of sale. By a fiction of law Schuler became legally subrogated to the creditors' rights and securities by employing the price he was to pay the debtor in discharge of his debts, and he thus became entitled to withdraw from the proceeds of sale just the sum the creditor was entitled to recover, and no more. But Schuler lays claim to the additional sum of $923.38 he alleges he had advanced to James from time to time, in cash, wherewith he paid interest accumulations to McKellor on the last three purchase notes, and whereby he is entitled to be paid from the proceeds of sale, because he was legally subrogated to the rights of McKellor under the provisions of the Code, as he, being himself a creditor, paid another creditor, whose claim was preferable to his own by reason of his privilege and mortgage. Rev. Civil Code, arts. 2161, 2162. The position of Schuler is thus concisely stated in his counsel's brief, viz.: "Although the title to the 320 acres recites that the sale was made from James to Schuler for $3,200 cash, in reality the consideration was that the sale was made to reimburse Schuler the $923.38 already paid, and Schuler was to employ the balance of his purchase price in liquidating the balance, $2,308.48, then due on the notes, aggregating $3,232.86, as afterwards calculated, and not $3,200, as approximated at the time. Schuler paid to James nothing of the purchase price, and Ford paid to Schuler nothing of the loan. The whole object of the sale of the 320 acres from James to Schuler was to reimburse to Schuler the $923.38 already paid by Schuler on the notes, and to which extent he was then legally subrogated, and to liquidate the balance—$2,308.48—due thereon. In truth, the sale was made from James to Schuler to enable Schuler to raise money by mortgage on his lands to Thompson, through Ford, agent, for these purposes. The whole loan obtained by Schuler from Ford was retained by Ford, and the whole of Schuler's purchase price from James was directly applied to these purposes in the hands of Ford, as contemplated and intended by all the parties; and Schuler thus employed the whole of "the price of his purchase in paying the creditors to whom this property was mortgaged." There appears to be no question as to the fact of said sum—$923.38—having been paid by Schuler to McKellor on the interest accruing annually on the last three purchase notes of James. Nor is there any question of the fact that Schuler paid the money to McKellor directly, and that he charged the amount thereof to James' account on his books. It is equally a matter beyond question that at the respective dates of these transactions James was indebted to Schuler upon their antecedent transactions not satisfied by the sale of the 240 acres of land first conveyed to him. The contention of the hypothecary creditor substantially is that, by becoming owner of the mortgaged property, and acquiring the debt, the latter became extinguished by confusion, (Rev. Civil Code, art. 3411,) the right of mortgage becoming merged into the higher right of ownership. To our thinking, that article does not apply to the present case; but if the relations of the parties had been different, and Mrs. McKellor, mortgagee, had acquired the ownership of the thing mortgaged, we would have had a case for the extinguishment of the mortgage. But, as Schuler and McKellor were both creditors of the common debtor, James, McKellor having the superior right and mortgage on the debtor's property, the law gave to Schuler the double right to pay McKellor her demands, and to purchase the property mortgaged from the debtor, and employ the price in satisfying McKellor's mortgage, and thereby, in either event, become legally subrogated to McKellor's higher right, as well as security. If there be any incompatibility between the provisions of the two articles of the Code, it is our plain duty to so construe them as to harmonize their construction. But, to our minds, there is no incompatibility between them. In our opinion, a clear case of legal subrogation is made out on the part of Schuler, both in respect to the capital and interest of the last three mortgage notes Mrs. McKellor held against James.

We do not think this a case for the allowance of attorney fees, because it is not a suit against James, the mortgagor, but an hypothecary action against the property which Schuler purchased in alleged satisfaction of his demands, with the debtor's consent, wherein another creditor with mortgage is contesting his right. The judgment pronounced by the judge a quâ is correct, and it is therefore affirmed.

SIMPSON et al. v. PEOPLE'S ICE MANUF'G CO. (No. 10,937.)

CORPORATIONS—ESTOPPEL OF OFFICERS—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

Simpson and Vizard were the officers, the latter president, of a corporation. They owned bonds of the corporation which were issued while they were officers of said corporation. They foreclosed the mortgage on the property of the company securing the bonds, and purchased it. Tax liens and privileges were recorded for taxes due when they were officers. They took a rule to cancel them. Held, that they were not estopped from disputing the existence of the taxes, because they had not, as officers of said corporation, paid them. The corporation was a distinct entity from them as individuals, or as a commercial firm of Simpson & Vizard.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Simpson & Vizard were the holders of certain bonds of the People's Ice Manufacturing Company, secured by mortgage on property of the company. They caused such property to be sold under executory process, and bought it, and took a rule to cancel taxes assessed on such property by the city of New Orleans for the years 1886 to 1891, inclusive. The rule was made absolute as to taxes for the years 1889 and 1890, and the city appeals. Affirmed.

Walter B. Sommerville, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for appellant.

MCENERY, J. Messrs. Simpson & Vizard, a commercial firm composed of John F. Simpson and Anthony Vizard, were the holders of certain bonds issued by the defendant company, and which were secured "by mortgage on certain property belonging to the People's Ice Manufacturing Company, defendant." Mr. Anthony Vizard, one of the plaintiffs, was president of the People's Ice Manufacturing Company. Mr. John F. Simpson, the other plaintiff, was a stockholder of the company. Messrs. Simpson & Vizard caused the property of the company to be seized and sold under executory process, and they (the plaintiffs) bought it. Thereupon plaintiffs filed a rule to cancel city taxes, and the liens and privileges securing same, for the years 1886, 1887, 1888, 1889, 1890, and 1891, on two grounds: (1) Because of prescription; (2) because the property had been engaged during that time in the manufacture of ice, more than five hands being employed in the factory. The rule was made absolute as to the taxes, liens, and privileges for the years 1889 and 1890; the rule was discharged as to the city tax of 1888; and it was made absolute as to the liens and privileges only, for the years 1886 and 1887, reserving to the city the right to collect the taxes for those years from defendant. From this judgment the city prosecutes this appeal. The proposition of the city is that plaintiffs are not entitled to the relief sought, as Anthony Vizard was president of the company, and John F. Simpson was a stockholder in the same, and that it was their duty to see that the taxes were paid, and that they cannot take advantage of their own wrong; that the taxes of 1886 and 1887 were due anterior to the time of signing and issuing the bonds. Simpson & Vizard, as a commercial firm, was a distinct entity from the defendant corporation. Their acts as officers of the company were distinct from their acts as members of the commercial firm of Simpson & Vizard. Their official acts could not estop them, when acting in their individual capacities, or as members of a commercial firm. Judgment affirmed.

DUNCAN v. STATE.

MALICIOUS BURNING OF RAILROAD BRIDGE—INDICTMENT—VENUE—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

1. An indictment charging the willful and malicious burning of a bridge owned by a corporation is sufficient in its description of the owner when it gives the corporate name of the owner, and states, in substance, that the company named is a corporation doing business in this state. In such cases it is not necessary to allege in the indictment that such corporation was "duly organized or incorporated under the laws of any state or territory."

2. In the trial under an indictment charging the willful and malicious burning of a bridge forming part of the roadbed of a railway company named in the indictment as the owner of such bridge, the corporate existence of such alleged owner is sufficiently proven if it be shown that it was a corporation in existence de facto, and de facto in the exercise of corporate functions and franchises, whether it was a corporation de jure or not.

3. In criminal cases, when the accused has put himself upon the country by his plea of not guilty, he has made his election to be tried by jury; and, upon his subsequent demurrer to the evidence, it is the right of the state to hold him to his election, and to have the facts determined by a jury. In such cases it is discretionary with the state attorney whether he will consent to take the facts from the jury by joining in such demurrer. The court in such case cannot compel the state's counsel to join in such demurrer.

4. In criminal trials it is entirely discretionary with the court whether it will entertain a demurrer to the evidence, even though counsel for the prisoner and the state should both consent to it. In such case, whether the court's refusal to entertain such demurrer can be made the subject of review by this court, quære?

5. Where the evidence does not expressly locate the crime as having been committed in the county charged in the indictment, but there are in the evidence references to various localities and landmarks at or near the scene of the crime, known by or probably familiar to the jury, and from which they may have reasonably concluded that the offense was committed in the county alleged, it is sufficient proof of venue.

6. On a trial for the criminal burning of a bridge alleged in the indictment to be the property of a railroad corporation named therein, the proof of the ownership by such corporation is sufficient if it shows that such bridge forms part of the roadbed of the corporation named, and is in the actual use of such corporation in the passage of its trains.

7. Those structures forming parts of railway beds by which they span streams, chasms, ditches, etc., held to be "bridges," the willful and malicious burning of which is prohibited by section 4, p. 358, McClel. Dig.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Columbia county; JOHN F. WHITE, Judge.

Joseph Duncan was convicted of maliciously burning a railroad bridge, and brings error. Affirmed.

A. J. Henry, for plaintiff in error. W. B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

TAYLOR, J. The plaintiff in error, Joseph Duncan, was indicted at the fall term, 1891, of the circuit court of Columbia county, as follows, omitting the formal parts of the indictment: "That Joseph Duncan, late of said county, laborer, on the 17th day of May, A. D. 1891, at and in the county, circuit, and state aforesaid, with force and arms, did then and there unlawfully, wantonly, and maliciously injure by setting fire to and burning the trestle of the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad Company, a corporation doing business in the state of Florida, in such manner as to endanger the passage of the train of said company, and throw the same from the track of said railroad. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further say that the said Joseph Duncan, at the time aforesaid, and in the county and state aforesaid, did then and there unlawfully, willfully, and maliciously set fire to and burn a bridge, the property of the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad Company, a corporation doing business in the state of Florida, contrary," etc. The defendant was tried and convicted on December 2, 1891, and from the judgment and sentence has taken writ of error to this court.

Before the trial the defendant, by his attorney, moved to quash the indictment on the following grounds: "(1) The said indictment, in its first count, does not charge any criminal offense under the laws of the state of Florida. (2) The said indictment, in its second count, does not allege any person, either artificial or natural, as owner of the bridge alleged to have been burned. (3) The indictment is otherwise so vague, indefinite, and insufficient as to mislead the accused, and to embarrass him in the preparation of his defense." The court sustained this motion as to the first count in the indictment, but overruled it as to the second count, and this latter ruling is assigned as the first error.

In urging this assignment here the defendant's counsel abandons the ground upon which his motion was made in the court below, that is, "that the indictment did not allege any person, either artificial or natural, to be the owner of the burned bridge," but, instead thereof, contends here that this count of the indictment is defective because it fails to allege the "due organization and existence of the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad Company under the laws of some nation, state, or territory," that company being the one alleged in the indictment to be the owner of the bridge burned. There is no merit in this contention. The indictment is found under section 4, p. 358, McClel. Dig. The gist of the offense is the willful and malicious burning of such a structure that is useful to another, or, it may be, to the public; the validity of the tenure by which it is owned, or the legal right of the alleged owner to own such a structure, does not enter into or form any feature of the offense. The naming of the owner is material only as a part of the description or identification of the thing burned, as being within the prohibition of the statute. We apprehend that in such cases, even if the alleged owner, the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad Company, was not a corporation de jure, it would be sufficient to show that it was a corporation de facto in the actual exercise of its functions as such, and that the bridge burned was in its actual use and control as part of its roadbed, necessary to the passage of its trains. It would, indeed, be a monstrous proposition that a party should be allowed to burn the bridges from under a railroad in actual operation, periling life and property with indiscriminate recklessness, and then be allowed to go scot free because the company operating such road had omitted to track the law in some particular in proceeding to acquire corporate existence. In such cases is is necessary only to allege in the indictment, in substance, that the company is a corporation, without any allegation as to the legality or regularity or fact, even, of its corporate organization. People v. Jackson, 8 Barb. 637. In Owen v. State, 5 Sneed, 493, where the party was indicted for the fraudulent possession of counterfeit bank notes of the Bank of Tennessee, and where the indictment did not allege either that the bank was a corporation or was duly chartered, it was held that in such cases it was not necessary either to aver or prove the corporate existence of such institution; but, being a public chartered institution of that state, its courts would take judicial knowledge thereof, and that what is judicially known need not be averred or proved. McLaughlin v. Com., 4 Rawle, 464; Fisher v. State, 40 N. J. Law, 169. In Johnson v. State, 65 Ind. 204, it is held that "an indictment for arson, charging the burning of property insured against loss by fire by an insurance company designated by a name apparently indicating it to be a corporation, need not affirmatively aver its corporate existence, nor whether it is a domestic or foreign corporation." State v. Van Hart, 17 N. J. Law, 327; State v. Weller, 20 N. J. Law, 521. There is some conflict in the decisions upon this question, but the greater weight of the authorities, and, as we think, founded upon the better reasoning, is that in such cases it is not necessary to aver in the indictment that the corporation alleged to be the owner "was incorporated," or "was duly incorporated." It is sufficient if the indictment states simply that it is a corporation; and the proof of this allegation, in such cases, we think is sufficient, if it shows that the company named was de facto in existence, and de facto exercising corporate functions and franchises.

After the state had introduced her evidence and rested, the defendant introduced no testimony, but stated orally to the court, through counsel, that he demurred to the evidence of the state, and demanded judgment of the court whether the state's evidence, if true, was sufficient in law to convict him of the crime charged. Upon this the court ruled that the question raised was one of fact for the jury, and not of law for the court, to decide, and declined to entertain the demurrer, and this ruling is assigned as the second error. In urging this assignment it is contended for the defendant that the court should have required the state attorney to join in the defendant's demurrer, and that the defendant was entitled to the judgment of the court as to whether the evidence, if taken as true, was sufficient in law to authorize a conviction. We do not understand the law to be, in criminal cases, that the court was obliged either to entertain the demurrer to the evidence, and thereby take the case from the jury, both as to its facts and the law applicable to them, or to compel the state attorney to join in such demurrer. When the accused put himself upon the country by his plea of not guilty, he has exercised his right, guarantied to him by our constitution, of having the facts of his case passed upon by a jury; and having, by his plea, made his election thus to be tried, it is the right of the state to hold him to his election, and to have the facts determined by a jury, and not by the court, whose function is to determine the law of the case. In such cases it is discretionary with the state attorney whether he will consent to take the case from the jury, and submit it for decision to the court, by joining in such a demurrer. The established rule is that the party demurring to evidence must admit on the record, not only that all the facts proven are true, but that every fact is also true that may fairly and reasonably be inferred from or deduced out of the evidence, or that the evidence reasonably tends towards establishing. If the demurrer will do this, and the state attorney, in his discretion, consents that the facts thus admitted shall be submitted to the court, for its judgment as to whether, under the law, they will authorize a conviction of the crime charged, then the state attorney can exercise his consent by joining in such demurrer; but we do not understand that it is the province of the court to compel the state attorney to give his consent by joining in the demurrer. We think, too, that it is entirely discretionary with the court whether it will entertain a demurrer to evidence in criminal cases, and thereby take upon itself the performance or responsibilities devolving upon the jury, as well as those inherent in itself, even although the counsel for both the prisoner and the state should consent to it; and we doubt very much whether the court's refusal to do so can be made the subject of review in this court, where its refusal is in limine upon a demurrer to evidence, when the same result can be accomplished afterwards by motion for new trial, or in arrest of judgment. Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 187; State v. Soper, 16 Me. 293. In Fowle v. Common Council, 11 Wheat. 320, Judge STORY, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The case made for a demurrer to evidence is, in many respects, like a special verdict. It is to state facts, and not merely testimony which may conduce to prove them. It is to admit whatever the jury may reasonably infer from the evidence, and not merely the circumstances which form a ground of presumption. The principal difference between them is that, upon a demurrer to evidence, a court may infer, in favor of the party joining in demurrer, every fact of which the evidence might justify an inference; whereas, upon a special verdict, nothing is intended beyond the facts found." Young v. Black, 7 Cranch, 565; Com. v. Parr, 5 Watts & S. 345; Higgs v. Shehee, 4 Fla. 382; Doss v. Com., 1 Grat. 557; Brister v. State, 26 Ala. 107.

The third assignment of error is that the court erred in overruling the motion for new trial. The motion for new trial was upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law, the evidence, and the charge of the court. Under this assignment it is contended that there was not sufficient proof of venue. Referring to the evidence sent up in the bill of exceptions, we find that the burned bridge is located by one witness as being "about the 62⅛ milepost from Jacksonville, about 2⅛ miles west from Lake City." In Bryan v. State, 19 Fla. 864, it is held that if the evidence raises a violent presumption that the offense was committed in the county charged it is sufficient. In Andrews v. State, 21 Fla. 598, it is held, in addition to the above, that, if it may be reasonably inferred from the evidence that the crime was committed in the county alleged, it is sufficient. In the case last cited there was no statement affirmatively placing the crime in the county alleged, but there were, in the evidence, references to various localities and landmarks at or near the scene of the crime that, the court says, were known by or probably familiar to the jury, from which, under the liberal rule laid down by the courts, they may have reasonably concluded that the offense was committed in that county. Applying this rule to the facts of the case before us, we think that the proof of venue was amply sufficient. The scene of the crime is located on the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad, 2⅛ miles west of Lake City, the county site of Columbia county. From this the jury could not only reasonably infer that it was in that county, but the statement, with the jury's knowledge of location, amounted almost to positive proof of the fact.

Under the last assignment of error it is also contended that the evidence does not show the ownership of the property alleged to have been burned. In the testimony we find the following, from the state's witness H. L. Taylor: "I am a conductor in the employ of the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad. On May 17, 1891, I was in charge, as conductor, of a passenger train on said road. The train was going east, about the 62⅛ milepost from Jacksonville, about 2⅛ miles west from Lake City. For some cause the train stopped. I went forward, and found that some one had set fire to a bridge under and supporting the railroad track, which bridge was on fire. The fire had been set to a stringer on one side of the railroad track. The stringer was on fire, and would have burned in two." Here we have this witness testifying that he, at the time of this crime, was in the employ of one of our well-known railway corporations, as conductor of one of its passenger trains "on said road." His train coming to a stop he went forward, and found that some one had set fire to a bridge under and supporting the railroad track. He had before mentioned the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad, and was talking only about the road of that company; then he identifies the bridge as being under and supporting the track of that road. This we think clearly proved the bridge to be a part of the roadbed of the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad Company, and that its ownership of the bridge in question was thereby sufficiently shown to leave no room for a reasonable doubt on the subject. And we think, too, from this evidence that it was sufficiently shown that the company named was de facto in existence, and de facto exercising corporate functions in operating trains over its road.

It is further contended that railway viaducts are not "bridges," within the meaning of the statute under which this indictment was found. The well-established rule is that the words of a statute are to be understood according to their ordinary meaning in the sense in which they best harmonize with the subject of the enactment, and the object which the legislature had in view in enacting the law. End. Interp. St. § 73. The object of the statute under consideration was to prohibit incendiarism in all its forms, and to prescribe punishments therefor. In enumerating the divers objects or structures that might become the subject of the crime, the word "bridge" is included. The gravamen of the offense consists in the malicious and willful burning; and we think the object of the statute was to prohibit the burning of any structure to which the term "bridge" could be appropriately applied. Turning to Webster's Dictionary, we find the word "bridge" defined to be: "A structure, usually of wood, stone, brick, or iron, erected over a river or other water course, or over a chasm, railroad, etc., to make a passageway from one bank to the other; anything supported at the ends, which serves to keep some other thing from resting upon the object spanned, which forms a platform or staging over which something passes or is conveyed." This expresses to our minds, very clearly and concisely, the definition of a bridge, in the sense in which the word is ordinarily used and understood, and we think applies with emphasis to those structures forming parts of our railway beds by which they span streams, chasms, ditches, etc. Certainly no bridge can be burned that would be more mischievously disastrous in its consequences than the one intended to support the rapidly passing train freighted with human life. Our only surprise is that a severer punishment is not prescribed for the burning of such structures than for that of the bridge spanning the ordinary wagon way. Enfield Toll Bridge Co. v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co., 17 Conn. 40; State v. Gorham, 37 Me. 451; Bish. St. Crimes, § 301.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

GARVIN et al. v. WATKINS.

(Supreme Court of Florida. March 28, 1892.)

APPEAL IN CHANCERY—DECREE PRO CONFESSO—MARRIED WOMEN—SEPARATE ESTATE—JUDICIAL SALES—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER—REVERSAL OF DECREE—COSTS.

1. An appeal in chancery proceedings can be taken from a final decree rendered upon a decree pro confesso, and upon such appeal the legality of all proceedings prior to the default is open for review, and the appellant can take advantage of any reversible error apparent upon such proceedings.

2. The proceedings in a chancery cause, after a decree pro confesso regularly entered, are ex parte, and the party in default will not be entitled to notice of them; but, while such proceedings are ex parte, the final decree in the cause must be proper, and consequent upon the case made in the bill.

3. The separate statutory property of a married woman can be charged in equity with a demand for work done and material furnished on said property, whether in pursuance of her personal engagement, or on the contract of her husband, who acts as her agent, with her knowledge or approval.

4. A purchase made by a stranger to the record in a chancery proceeding, who has advanced his money at a public sale, under a decree rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, and who has accepted a deed upon confirmation of the sale, cannot be avoided by a subsequent reversal of the decree for error, unless the decree be void.

5. W. filed a bill in chancery against Mrs. G. and husband to subject the separate statutory real estate of the wife to the payment of a demand for work and material furnished at the instance of the wife on her said property, and also for the payment of certain costs incurred in a suit at law. After a decree pro confesso, a final decree was entered ordering the sale of the wife's said property to pay the demand for work and material, and also said costs. The wife's property was sold under this decree, and W., a stranger to the record, bought it at a public sale made by a commissioner. The purchase money was paid, the sale confirmed, and a deed delivered to the purchaser before appeal taken. Held, without deciding whether or not there was error in not sequestering the rents and profits of the wife's separate estate, instead of decreeing a sale of the corpus, that the court had jurisdiction, both of the subject-matter and of the parties, and that the sale of the property under the decree rendered before appeal taken passed the title to the purchaser, and that it could not be affected even if the decree be reversed. Held, further, that the item of costs was not a proper allowance against the wife's property, and the decree should be modified to this extent.

Appeal from circuit court, Orange county; JOHN D. BROOME, Judge.

Bill by S. C. Watkins against Sallie J. Garvin and Wade Garvin, her husband, to subject the separate real estate of the wife to the payment of a demand for work and material furnished at her instance on said real estate, and for the payment of certain costs. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. K. Foster, for appellants. A. M. Thrasher, for appellee.

MABRY, J. The appellee, S. C. Watkins, filed a bill in equity in the Orange county circuit court on the 21st day of July, A. D. 1887, against appellants, Sallie J. Garvin and her husband, Wade Garvin. In this bill it is alleged that the appellee instituted a suit at law in the circuit court of Orange county against appellants to enforce a lien for work done and material furnished, and on the 5th day of April, A. D. 1886, obtained a judgment for $124.60 and costs of suit; that execution was issued on said judgment, and levied on a house and lot in Sanford, Fla., and which was sold under said execution at sheriff's sale to W. L. Thrasher for the sum of $160, and a deed executed to said purchaser conveying to him said house and lot; that afterwards said appellants, Sallie J. Garvin and Wade Garvin, filed a bill in chancery against appellee, Watkins, W. L. Thrasher, the purchaser at said sale, and the sheriff of Orange county, and alleged therein that said Sallie J. Garvin, at the time of the institution of the said suit at law and the filing of said bill, was a married woman, and that said house and lot, to wit, lot 1, block 11, tier B, was the separate statutory property and estate of said Sallie J. Garvin, and not liable or subject for any debt or demand against her husband, and could not be sold under said execution; and the prayer of said bill is that said judgment and execution at law, and all proceedings had under the same, be declared null and void, and that said sale be set aside, and that said W. L. Thrasher be ordered to reconvey said premises to Sallie J. Garvin, and, upon his doing so, that the said sheriff refund to him the purchase money paid by him for said house and lot.

Appellee, Watkins, further alleges in his bill that, by consent of counsel for all parties, the court decreed that the judgment rendered in said suit at law in favor of S. C. Watkins against Wade Garvin and Sallie J. Garvin be annulled and set aside as to Sallie J. Garvin; that the execution issued thereon be quashed, and the said sale made thereunder be vacated and set aside. Further, that said Thrasher reconvey said premises to said Sallie J. Garvin, and said sheriff refund to Thrasher the purchase money he had paid on said purchase; that in said consent decree, however, it is adjudged that the said judgment at law in favor of S. C. Watkins shall stand confirmed as against the said Wade Garvin, and upon his failure to pay said amount and interest thereon and all costs, within 10 days after the record of the decree, that execution issue for said amounts.

It is further alleged by appellee, Watkins, that said Thrasher reconveyed said house and lot to said Sallie J. Garvin, and that said Wade Garvin failed and refused to pay said judgment, interest, and costs; that on the 1st day of February, 1887, execution issued on said judgment against Wade Garvin, and was levied on certain personal property, which was claimed by said Sallie J. Garvin as her separate property, and on a trial in reference thereto her claim was sustained, and the sheriff of Orange county returned said execution, with the indorsement that "search had been made, and no property could be found upon which a levy could be made."

The bill further alleges that the demand sought to be enforced in said suit at law, and on which said judgment was obtained, was for work done and material furnished by appellee for the benefit of the separate statutory property of said Sallie J. Garvin in building her dwelling house in the town of Sanford, Fla., on said lot 1, block 11, tier B, and which has been decreed to be the separate statutory property of said Sallie J. Garvin; and, further, that the contract or agreement under which said work was done and material was furnished was made by said Wade Garvin as agent for his wife, the said Sallie J. Garvin, and with her knowledge, approval, and consent. Further, that said Sallie J. Garvin has a large and valuable separate statutory property, consisting of said dwelling house on which said work was done, and for the construction of which said material was furnished on the said lot, and another house on said lot, from which large rents are received, and also valuable personal property.

The prayer of the bill is for process, and that by decree of the court the appellants be ordered to pay the sum of money due as aforesaid, with interest thereon, and costs, to appellee, on or before a short day to be therein named, and in default thereof that said statutory property of the said Sallie J. Garvin, or so much thereof as may be sufficient to pay said debt, be sold by a master of the court, and the proceeds applied to the payment of appellee's said claim, or that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the said separate statutory property of said Sallie J. Garvin, or so much thereof as may be deemed sufficient, and, out of the rents and profits arising therefrom, to pay the said demand of appellee, and all costs, including about $20 incurred by appellee in and about the levy of the execution and the trial of the claim interposed by said Sallie J. Garvin; and that appellee have such other and further relief in the premises as equity may require and shall seem meet.

Upon the filing of the foregoing bill, subpœna was regularly issued, returnable on rule day in August, A. D. 1887, and the same was served on both defendants, Wade Garvin and Sallie J. Garvin. An appearance was entered for said defendants on rule day in August, A. D. 1887; and, in default of plea, answer, or demurrer, a decree pro confesso was entered against said defendants on the 5th,—the same being rule day of September, A. D. 1887. At a subsequent date, on application of the solicitor for appellee, an examiner was appointed and testimony taken, ex parte, for the complainant below, appellee here. On the report of the testimony taken by the examiner, a final decree was rendered on the 24th day of January, 1888, as follows, viz.: "This day this cause came on to be heard on the bill and testimony, and upon consideration thereof it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the complainant, S. C. Watkins, do have and recover of and from the respondents, Sallie J. Garvin and Wade Garvin, the sum of one hundred and twenty-four and 60-100 dollars, with interest thereon from the 5th day of April, 1886, and thirty-two and 24-100 dollars for costs expended by complainant, and the costs of this proceeding, including a fee of fifteen dollars for the examiner for taking the testimony in this cause. And it appearing to the court that said sum of one hundred and twenty-four and 60-100 dollars is due for labor done and material furnished for the benefit of the separate property of the defendant Sallie J. Garvin, in default of the payment of said sums of money on or before the 25th day of February, 1888, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the following described property, the separate statutory property of Sallie J. Garvin, be sold, and the proceeds of said sale applied to the payment of said sums of money, to wit, lot one, block eleven, tier B, on the corner of Pine avenue and Ninth street, in the town of Sanford, in Orange county, Fla., and that Andrew Denham be, and he is hereby, appointed a special master to advertise and sell said land, and the house thereon, according to law, and make report to this court of his actings and doings in the premises." In pursuance of this decree the said master advertised and sold at public outcry the real estate therein mentioned, to wit, lot 1, block 11, tier B, on the corner of Pine avenue and Ninth street, in the town of Sanford, Fla., on the first Monday in April, A. D. 1888, to R. H. Whitner, for the sum of $220; and upon the report thereof to the court this sale was confirmed on the 5th day of April, A. D. 1888. On a subsequent day, to wit, the 14th day of May, A. D. 1888, R. H. Whitner, said purchaser, filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court aforesaid his petition for a writ of assistance, based upon the refusal of the said Sallie J. Garvin to surrender to him the possession of said property. The court, upon consideration of this petition, after due notice, directed that a writ of assistance do issue to the sheriff of Orange county, commanding him to remove the said Sallie J. Garvin from the said premises, and to place the said petitioner, R. H. Whitner, in possession of the same, on or before the 20th day of May, A. D. 1888; and thereupon, on the 19th day of May, A. D. 1888, the said defendants, Wade Garvin and Sallie J. Garvin, entered an appeal from the final decree rendered on the 24th day of January, A. D. 1888, and the decree of April 5, 1888, confirming the report of sale, to this court.

In the petition of appeal filed here it is alleged that the court erred in granting the various decrees in said cause, both the interlocutory decree appointing an examiner, the final decree, the decree affirming sale, and in granting the writ of assistance.

As appears from the foregoing statement, after appearance, and upon a failure to plead, answer, or demur, appellee's bill of complaint was taken as confessed on the 5th day of September, A. D. 1887, and, no motion having been made to set aside the default within 20 days from that date, the decree became absolute under the rule, and the further proceedings in the cause, up to and including the final decree, were ex parte. Under our decisions it is settled that an appeal can be taken from a final decree rendered upon a decree pro confesso made absolute under the rule. Hart v. Stribling, 21 Fla. 136, and authorities cited. Upon such appeal the legality of all the proceedings prior to the default is opened for review, and the appellants can take advantage of any reversible error apparent upon those proceedings. If such error prior to the default be discovered, the subsequent decrees and proceedings may be set aside; but, if no such error be found, the proceedings after default are ex parte, and the defendant in default will not be entitled to any notice of them. But while the proceedings subsequent to a decree pro confesso are ex parte, and the defendant is not entitled to notice of them, and has no right to object to their regularity, yet the final decree in the cause must be proper and consequent from the case made in the bill. Betton v. Williams, 4 Fla. 11; Freeman v. Timanus, 12 Fla. 393; State v. Railroad Co., 16 Fla. 708; Marks v. Baker, 20 Fla. 920; Hart v. Stribling, supra. The proceeding here is in chancery to subject the separate statutory property of a married woman to the payment of a demand for work and labor performed in the improvement of said property at her instance and procurement. The testimony taken ex parte after the entry of the decree pro confesso shows that the sum of $124.60, for which the judgment at law was rendered, was for work and material furnished by appellee in building a dwelling house for Sallie J. Garvin on her separate property, described in the bill, with her knowledge and at her instance. In the former opinion in this cause, filed prior to the granting of the rehearing,[1] it was held that there was no error in the proceedings prior to the default; and that appellee was entitled, under the case made in his bill and sustained by the testimony taken ex parte, to a decree for the amount due for work and material furnished in building said house, and costs in this proceeding up to the appeal. It was further held that the chancellor committed an error in allowing, as a proper charge against the married woman's property, the sum of $32.24, costs in the suit at law; but as her separate property had been sold at a public sale by virtue of the decree of the chancellor to pay the said amount due for work and material and said costs, and had been purchased by a stranger to the record, and the sale confirmed before any appeal taken, a reversal of the decree on appeal would not affect said sale. Counsel for appellants asked for a rehearing on the ground that the court overlooked in its opinion the fact that the contract alleged as imposing the liability in this case was entered into under the rights of married women under the constitution of 1868, and the decree should have sequestered the rents and profits, and not ordered a sale of the married woman's property; and also that the judgment against the husband was obtained by suit commenced under the constitution of 1868, and the releasing the wife by consent from the effects of that judgment must be taken with all its force under that constitution, and no greater rights or remedies accrued to appellee by the adoption of the constitution of 1885.

The court did not overlook the fact that the indebtedness sought to be enforced in this suit arose while the constitution of 1868 was in force. The rehearing was granted in order that a fuller discussion might be had by counsel on the power of the court to order a sale of the corpus of the estate, instead of sequestering the rents and profits thereof. It is contended for appellants on the rehearing that the wife's separate property cannot be sold, under the constitution of 1868, to pay her husband's debt. This is true, unless she charges her separate property within an express lien, in the manner provided by statute for the payment of such debt. Our judgment does not proceed upon the theory that the wife's property was sold to pay her husband's debt. The demand, so far as for work and material furnished is concerned, is a proper charge against her own property, arising out of a contract of herself in reference to it. The fact that the contract was made in the name of her husband, who acted for her, does not change the liability. It is alleged that the contract was made for her, at her request, and the proof sustains this charge. Nor does a different result flow from setting the judgment at law aside as to the wife. This judgment was a nullity as to her, and it does not appear that it was set aside under any agreement that appellee would look alone to the husband. In the case referred to in the former opinion of Smith v. Poythress, 2 Fla. 92, the husband purchased supplies and improvements for the wife's separate property, and executed notes in his name for the amount due. Judgment was obtained against him on the notes, and execution returned, "No property found on which to make a levy." After this a bill in equity was filed to subject the wife's separate real estate to pay the amount for which judgment had been obtained, and it was sustained. We have no hesitancy in holding, in the light of our decisions, that, under the allegations of appellee's bill and the testimony before us, he is entitled to a decree for $124.60, and interest thereon from the 5th day of April, A. D. 1886, at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and that the same is a charge on the separate property described in the bill of Sallie J. Garvin. Smith v. Poythress, supra; Merritt v. Jenkins, 17 Fla. 593; Blumer v. Pollak, 18 Fla. 707; Thrasher v. Doig, Id. 809; Harwood v. Root, 20 Fla. 940; Schnabel v. Betts, 23 Fla. 178, 1 South. Rep. 692; O'Neil v. Percival, 25 Fla. 118, 5 South. Rep. 809. We think the item of $32.24, costs in the law proceeding, should not have been allowed by the court as a charge against the wife's property, and that the decree pro confesso will not prevent her from taking advantage of this error on appeal. The appellee was entitled to such final decree as his bill justified. He can only charge the wife's property with such demands as the law allows her to impose upon it, and this cost item was not contracted on the credit of her property or for its benefit, and, as appears from the bill itself, is not a proper charge against it. The decree of the court was for the sale of the property, and not for the sequestration of its rents and profits. The wife's property was sold under this decree before any appeal was taken, and a stranger to the record bought it. The purchase money was paid, the sale confirmed, and the purchaser received a deed. The appeal was then entered from the final decree ordering the sale, and also the decree confirming the sale, and the purchaser, by agreement, is a party to this appeal. The questions thus presented extend beyond the propriety or the proper exercise of discretion on the part of the court in decreeing a sale of the property, instead of ordering a sequestration of its rents and profits. The question in reference to the purchase involves the power and jurisdiction of the court to order the sale, for we think the authorities sustain the rule that a purchase made by a stranger to the record, who has advanced his money at a public sale under a decree rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, and who has accepted a deed, cannot be avoided even by a subsequent reversal of the decree for error, unless it be void. The rule at law is well established that the title of a purchaser at execution sale, under process issued from a court of general jurisdiction, is not affected by a subsequent reversal of the judgment from which the execution emanated. This was decided in Ponder v. Moseley, 2 Fla. 207, and abundant authority sustains it. In Jessup v. Bank, 15 Wis. 604, it was held that where a sale was allowed to take place upon a decree, without any steps taken to stay proceedings, the title of a stranger who purchases and advances his money will not be divested by a subsequent reversal of the decree. It is said in this case that some authorities make a distinction between cases where the purchase is by a stranger and those where a party to the record buys, holding that a subsequent reversal will not avoid the former, but will the latter. A similar distinction also seems to be made between cases where the sale rests wholly on the decree, such as private commissioners' sales and those where the purchase is made at a public judicial sale under a decree. The former will be avoided by reversal, while the latter will not. Debell v. Foxworthy's Heirs, 9 B. Mon. 228; Clark's Heirs v. Farrow, 10 B. Mon. 446. Here we have a sale made by a master in chancery at public outcry, under a decree, and a completed purchase by a stranger to the record before any appeal taken. This purchase cannot be avoided by any mere errors or irregularities in the decree not extending to the power of the court to render it. Ror. Jud. Sales, § 138; Leslie v. Richardson, 60 Ala. 563; Phillips v. Benson, 82 Ala. 500, 2 South. Rep. 93; Hammond v. Winchester, 82 Ala. 470, 2 South. Rep. 892; Gray v. Brignardello, 1 Wall. 627. Did the court have jurisdiction to render the decree for the sale of the wife's property? The bill shows that the separate property of Sallie J. Garvin was at the time yielding a valuable rental, and that she owned personal property. If the case was before us relieved from the effects of the sale under the decree, we do not intimate that it would not be reversed for error. Our inquiry, however, now is to ascertain if the court had the power to order the sale of the property. Counsel refer to the case of Harwood v. Root, 20 Fla. 940, as authority for his position that the married woman's property cannot be sold, but its rents and profits must be sequestered. In that case the demand sought to be charged on the wife's property was for the purchase money of personal property sold to the wife on the credit of her estate. The language used in the opinion is: "The rule prevailing in a court of equity, however, in a case such as this, is to sequester the rents and profits of the property, rather than to sell the corpus or body of the estate. This is the rule which would prevail in equity as to an estate with limitations like those contained in our statute, and we cannot conclude otherwise than that it should prevail here." The authority referred to on this point is the case of Coal Co. v. Dyett, 7 Paige, 9. In that case the property was vested in a trustee for the benefit of the wife for life, with remainder to her children, and it was held that she could not, without the assent of the trustee, contract any debt which would be a charge upon the remainder to the children, even for expenditures which are beneficial to the whole estate. It was further held in the same case that the separate estate of a feme covert is in equity chargeable with her debts contracted upon the credit of that estate, to the same extent that the estate of a feme sole is chargeable with her debts by the common law. The decision in Harwood v. Root, supra, was rendered on demurrer to the bill before any decree had been entered for a sale of the wife's property, and the point we are now considering was not presented to the court. In O'Neil v. Percival, 25 Fla. 118, 5 South. Rep. 809, where the demand brought forward as a charge on the wife's separate property was for material furnished in the construction of improvements thereon, similar in this respect to the case now before us, it was said by the court: "Without meaning to admit that the corpus of the estate of a married woman cannot be sold for the payment of a debt of this character, we think that in this case the rents and profits of the property should be subjected to its payment." In Kelly on Contracts of Married Women (page 280) it is said: "In those states which hold that lands are chattels for the payment of debts, and subject to execution, and in those states which confer upon her, by statute, the general power to hold property and contract as if sui juris, there can be no doubt but that the corpus can be taken; but in those states where these do not exist, and the statute merely invests her with the legal title, instead of permitting the property to pass to the husband under the common law, the decisions are not harmonious." On the one hand, it is asserted that the corpus of her real estate is not liable for her debts; on the other hand, it is maintained that the corpus is liable when she holds the estate to her separate use, as she does under the statute, for the reason that, if she is allowed to contract indebtedness with respect to her separate property, it should be held liable to the extent of her interest, whether that be the corpus or the income, unless otherwise provided by statute. This author says (page 231) that between these two positions the latter is the best. It is settled by our decisions that the wife, possessed of separate statutory property, can contract indebtedness for improvements on the same, or charge it with a demand, where the debt is created on the credit of her estate. In Whitesides v. Cannon, 23 Mo. 457, the decision was that the separate real estate of the wife could be sold to pay a debt contracted by her on the credit of her separate estate. Phillips v. Graves, 20 Ohio St. 371, holds that a married woman possessed of a separate estate may charge it with her debts to the extent that the same were incurred for the benefit of it, or for her own benefit, when credit was given on the faith of her separate property. In this case it was said that the order in which the court will enforce the payment of such charges against the wife's separate property is—First, by appropriating the personal property; second, by sequestering the rents and profits of the realty; and, third, by a sale of the realty, when the same is necessary. A sale of the wife's separate property was allowed in the case of Yale v. Dederer, 21 Barb. 286. This case seems to have been thoroughly considered, and has received the approval of our predecessors. Blumer v. Pollak, supra; Staley v. Hamilton, 19 Fla. 275. See, also, Withers v. Sparrow, 66 N. C. 129.

As before remarked, we are only concerned now about the jurisdiction of the court to render a decree for the sale of the wife's property, and not so much to ascertain if there were reversible error in doing so. Our conclusion is that the court had jurisdiction both of the subject-matter and the parties, and that the sale of the property under the decree rendered, before any appeal taken, passed the title to the purchaser, and that it cannot be affected now, even if we were to reverse the decree.

The item of cost was improper, and we will modify the decree to this extent. It is therefore ordered that the decree of the chancellor for $124.60, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from the 5th day of April, A. D. 1886, and the costs of this proceeding up to the appeal, be affirmed, and it is further ordered that appellee pay the costs of this appeal, and appellants pay the costs of the rehearing.

HAWKINS v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—ACCUSED AS WITNESS—EXAMINATION BY JUROR—REVIEW ON APPEAL—FORGERY.

1. Where the court passively permits a juror to question the prisoner while making his statutory statement of the matters of his defense, and permits the prisoner, while making such statement, at the request of a juror, to make figures to be compared by the jury with the forgery for which the trial is being had, and no objection or exception to such proceeding is interposed, taken, or noted until after verdict of conviction, the objection comes too late in a motion for new trial, and cannot be reviewed by this court upon writ of error; otherwise, if exception had been taken and noted in time.

2. Section 29, p. 519, McClel. Dig., permits to the party accused, in all criminal prosecutions, the right of making a statement to the jury under oath of the matter of his or her defense. This does not constitute the prisoner a witness, nor subject him to the rules applicable to witnesses, nor render him liable to cross-examination; and, while making such statement, the court should, sua sponte, prevent any interference with the prisoner, either by questions or suggestions from the jury, the state attorney, the prisoner's counsel, or from anyone else. Should such interference be permitted, over the objection of the accused, it would be reversible error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Suwannee county; JOHN F. WHITE, Judge.

Tyler Hawkins was convicted of forgery, and brings error. Affirmed.

J. C. Gallaher, for plaintiff in error. William B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

TAYLOR, J. The plaintiff in error, Tyler Hawkins, was indicted at the spring term, 1887, of the circuit court for Suwannee county, for forgery. He was tried and convicted in February, 1891, but the judgment was reversed upon writ of error to this court in July, 1891, (Hawkins v. State, 28 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 652,) and the cause remanded for new trial. He was again tried on the 10th of November, 1891, and was again convicted, and from this judgment and sentence the cause is again brought here by writ of error.

The only assignment of error from this last trial, and the only one insisted upon here, is that the court erred in permitting the defendant to be interrogated by a juror as to whether he could write while he was making his statement; and permitting the defendant, at the request of the juror, to write the set of figures that constituted the gist of the alleged forgery, and then permitting these figures to be used by the jury in comparison with the forged instrument. No objection was made, and no exception was taken, to this proceeding at the time it was going on, nor at any time during the trial, but the objection thereto was made for the first time after the verdict, in a motion for new trial. It was too late then to make or get any benefit from such an objection or exception, and, no exception being taken thereto during the trial, under the well-established rule, it cannot be assigned for error here. Had the defendant by his counsel objected to the proceeding at the time, and the court had then permitted what was done over such objection, we should have had no hesitancy in reversing the judgment for so patent and fatal an error. Our statute (section 29, p. 519, McClel. Dig.) permits to the party accused, in all criminal prosecutions, the right of making a statement to the jury under oath of the matter of his or her defense. In construing this statute this court, in Miller v. State, 15 Fla. 583, very properly held that the making of such a statement under oath did not constitute the prisoner a witness, nor subject him to the rules applicable to witnesses, nor make him liable to cross-examination; but that it is simply a presentation verbally, in his own language and manner, of the matters pertaining to his defense. In Bond v. State, 21 Fla. 738, it is further held that by this statute the prisoner is given an opportunity of stating whatever he may desire, bearing upon his case. He may omit what he pleases, may tell what he deems beneficial, and, should he withhold anything, it cannot be drawn from him by cross-examination, no matter what its character or effect may be. He cannot be made to testify against himself, as is allowed in some states where he voluntarily offers himself as a witness. With this construction of the statute we still fully agree. When this defendant, while making his statement, was interrogated by a juror as to whether he could write, the court sua sponte should have promptly stopped it, and should have seen to it that the prisoner was not interfered with while making his statement, either by questions or suggestions from the jury, the state's counsel, or his own counsel, or by any one else. Under the circumstances of this case the prisoner, by this proceeding, was very improperly and unfairly placed between a judicial Scylla and Charybdis. When questioned by the juror as to whether he could write, if he had declined to answer, or if his counsel had objected thereto, it would have tended strongly to prejudice him with the jury; while, on the other hand, in being required to write, by exhibiting his own formation of figures to the jury, he was erroneously led to furnish proof that might have been against, instead of in favor of, himself,—a contingency that is not contemplated by our statute. As the original forged instrument and the figures made by the prisoner at the trial are not before us, we have no means, by comparing them, to ascertain whether there is such similitude between them as to have made the figures of the defendant at the trial detrimental or favorable to him, or whether harm was done to him by the proceedings or not; but as we think there is an abundance of evidence, independently of this, to warrant a conviction, and as there was no objection made or exception taken to the interference with the defendant while making his statement, the judgment of the court below is affirmed. But again we repeat, had an exception upon the point been properly taken and noted, our decision would have been for reversal.

FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—LEGAL OWNER NOT A PARTY—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER—TAX TITLE.

1. A foreclosure proceeding resulting in a final decree and a sale of the mortgaged property, without the holder of the legal title being before the court, will have no effect to transfer his title to the purchaser at said sale.

2. A mortgagee, either before or after default in payment, has no title by virtue of his mortgage to the mortgaged real estate. His interest is simply a specific lien for the security of the debt mentioned in the mortgage, and he can acquire the legal title as against the mortgagor, or his grantees, only by outbidding every other person at the foreclosure sale.

3. A conveyance by the mortgagee of the mortgaged premises before foreclosure, or an attempted foreclosure, unless such conveyance contain a grant of the mortgage debt, or unless its terms are sufficient to carry this interest, and it was intended by the parties to have this effect, will be inoperative for this purpose.

4. Where the mortgagee, or a stranger to the record, purchases the mortgaged premises at a void sale under foreclosure proceedings, and then conveys by warranty deed said premises to a third party, he becomes subrogated in equity to the rights of the mortgagee in said mortgaged premises, as well as the mortgage debt thereon, to the extent of his purchase, and may demand a valid foreclosure of said mortgage for his protection. His right to be subrogated to the extent of his purchase, in such a case, to the mortgage security, does not depend upon a contractual assignment of the mortgage debt, but it comes about by operation of law.

5. A mortgagor or his grantees of the mortgaged premises cannot set up against the mortgagee or his assignee a tax title acquired at a sale for nonpayment of taxes which it was the duty of the mortgagor, or those holding under him, to pay.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Duval county; JAMES M. BAKER, Judge.

Bill by Henry D. Sayre and others against Manuel C. Jordan to foreclose a mortgage. From a decree for complainants, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by MABRY, J.:

The appellees, Henry D. Sayre, Phillip Halle, and his wife, Minnie Halle, on the 21st day of May, A. D. 1887, filed in the circuit court for Duval county, Fla., their amended bill against Loudwick Warrock, his wife, Adalina D. Warrock, and Manuel C. Jordan, to foreclose a mortgage. The bill was filed on behalf of the wife, Minnie Halle, and it alleges substantially that—

(1) On the 27th day of March, A. D. 1873, Loudwick Warrock, being indebted to one C. B. Benedict, executed to him a promissory note for $2,000, due 12 months from date, and to secure the payment of the same said Warrock and his wife executed and delivered to Benedict a mortgage on the east part of lot number six, (6,) in square seventy-one, (71,) according to Hart's map, said parcel of land being 80 feet east and west, and 105 feet in length from north to south, and fronting on Beaver street, in the city of Jacksonville, Duval county, Fla., and which mortgage was recorded in the register of mortgages for Duval county, in Book C of Mortgages, on page 211.

(2) That on the 18th day of June, A. D. 1874, said Benedict assigned and delivered said note and mortgage to complainant Henry D. Sayre, and that by the terms of said mortgage said Warrock and wife conveyed said parcel of land upon the condition that, should said Loudwick Warrock pay to said Benedict, his heirs or assigns, the money mentioned in said note, with the interest thereon, the said mortgage should be void; and also there is in the mortgage an express covenant to pay said money, and the expenses of collecting the same.

(3) That a certified copy of said mortgage and assignment is annexed to the bill, and prayed to be taken as a part of it.

(4) That on the 20th day of March, 1876, said Warrock and wife executed a warranty deed conveying said parcel of land to one A. Joseph Myers, and that said Myers afterwards, by deed of quitclaim, on the 16th day of August, 1884, released his interest in said lot to defendant, Manuel C. Jordan, who thereby claims to have become the owner in fee of the same.

(5) That on the 25th day of September, 1879, said Sayre attempted to enforce the lien of said mortgage by foreclosure proceedings in the circuit court for Duval county against said Loudwick Warrock and wife, and such proceedings were therein had that on the 1st day of December, 1879, a paper purporting to be a final decree was signed by the judge of said court, adjudging that the sum of $4,655.55 was due said complainant Sayre on said note, and that said parcel of land mentioned in said mortgage be sold by a master of the court to pay the same, as will appear by a reference to the record of said proceedings now remaining in said court, to which complainants beg leave to refer as may be deemed necessary.

(6) That under said decree a master, on the 5th day of January, 1880, made a formal sale of said property, and complainant Henry D. Sayre became the purchaser at the sum of $1,000, and said master executed and delivered to him a usual master's deed purporting to convey to him said parcel of land.

(7) That in said proceedings to foreclose said mortgage only Warrock and his wife were made parties defendant, although the legal title to said lot of land had been conveyed by said Warrock and wife to said Myers before the commencement of said proceedings, and was in him at the time, and no subpœna or notice of the same was served on him, and he was in no manner made a party thereto; that complainants are advised that the said title in said Myers was not affected by said proceedings, and did not pass to said Sayre by the said master's sale, and that said proceedings were utterly without effect to satisfy the said note and mortgage, and the same remains in force and effect as though no such proceedings had been had.

(8) That on or about the 25th day of September, 1883, said Henry D. Sayre executed and delivered to said Manuel C. Jordan a deed of conveyance with warranty of title, purporting to convey to said Jordan in fee the west 50 feet of said 80 feet of said lot six, (6,) in square number seventy-one, (71,) and that the consideration paid by said Jordan for said conveyance was $1,200, and that said Sayre conveyed by said deed to said Jordan whatever title Sayre had in said 50 feet, and discharged the same from the lien of said mortgage, and thereby reduced the amount due upon said note and mortgage to the extent of the sum so paid by said Jordan.

(9) That on the 10th day of June, 1884, said Sayre transferred by deed of conveyance, in consideration of $500, to said Minnie Halle, all right, title, and interest, and all claim and demand whatever in law and in equity in and to the east 30 feet of the east 80 feet of said lot six, (6,) in square seventy-one, (71,) and complainants allege that the only interest said Sayre had in said east 30 feet was the mortgage lien, and they insist that the said deed of Sayre to Minnie Halle was, and must be deemed and decreed to be, an assignment by said Sayre to her of the said note and mortgage, and the money due thereon, after deducting the amount paid by said Jordan to Sayre.

(10) That neither said Warrock nor any other person for him, has paid to the past or present holder of said note and mortgage the money therein mentioned, but the same remains due and unpaid, except the sum paid as aforesaid by the said Jordan to Sayre.

The prayer of the bill is that said defendants be required to answer the bill, and that the east 30 feet of the mortgaged lot be sold to satisfy the amount due thereon, to be ascertained according to the rules and practice of the court, and that said amount may be paid to complainants for the use of said Minnie Halle, and for such other and further relief as the nature of the case may require.

After service of subpœna on said defendants, a decree pro confesso was entered as to Loudwick Warrock and Adalina Warrock, and Manuel C. Jordan interposed a demurrer, assigning various grounds. This demurrer was overruled by the chancellor, and on appeal to this court (Jordan v. Sayre, 24 Fla. 1, 3 South. Rep. 329) the decree overruling the demurrer was sustained. On the return of the mandate to the lower court the defendant, Jordan, filed an answer.

The allegations of the answer in reference to the 4th, 8th, 9th, and 10th paragraphs only of the bill need to be considered in the determination of the questions here presented.

The 1st, 2d, 3d, and 6th paragraphs of the bill are admitted to be true. In reference to the fifth it is admitted that Sayre was, on the 25th day of September, A. D. 1879, the holder and owner of the note and mortgage executed by Warrock and wife, but it is alleged that the original record of the proceedings mentioned in said paragraph is the best evidence thereof, and, as respondent is informed and believes, is the only legal evidence of the same, and that the legal effect thereof can be determined only on a production and examination of the record.

As to the seventh paragraph, it is alleged the legal effect of the proceedings therein mentioned can only be determined by the production and examination thereof; but the legal effect of said proceedings, as respondent is advised and believes, as alleged in said paragraph, is denied.

As to the eighth paragraph of the bill, respondent says that on the 25th day of September, A. D. 1883, said Sayre executed and delivered to respondent the original deed appended to the answer as part thereof, by which the west 50 feet of said lot 6 was conveyed to him in consideration of $1,200, then paid by respondent to said Sayre; that it is not true as matter of fact, or as respondent is advised, informed, and believes, as matter of law, the effect of said deed was merely to convey to respondent whatever title said Sayre had in said parcel of land, and to discharge the same from the lien of said mortgage, and thereby to reduce the amount due upon said note and mortgage to the extent of said consideration.

As to paragraph 9, the answer says that respondent has no knowledge of the execution of the conveyance, or the consideration paid therefor, as alleged, from said Sayre to said Minnie Halle, nor has respondent any knowledge of the contents of said alleged conveyance; but respondent avers, on information and belief, that said Sayre had no interest whatever in said lot alleged to have been conveyed to said Minnie, other than such as acquired (if he acquired any) by virtue of the said master's deed to Sayre; that, as matter of fact, said Sayre, by said deed to Minnie Halle, did not sell or convey said note and mortgage, or any part of the same.

Respondent further avers on information and belief that said Sayre did not by said conveyance intend to convey, and that said Minnie Halle did not intend to purchase or receive, said note or mortgage, or any part of the same; and respondents insist that said deed from said Sayre to Minnie Halle was not in fact, and cannot and should not be considered or decreed to be, an assignment to her of the said note and mortgage and the money due thereon, or any part thereof, as to the said east 30 feet of said lot, as claimed in said paragraph.

Further answering paragraph 9, respondent alleges that if it be true, as set up in said paragraph, that the effect of the simple deed from Sayre to Minnie Halle proprio vigore was to assign to said Minnie said note and mortgage, because the lien of the same was, as alleged, the only interest Sayre had in said lot at the time he executed said deed, the warranty deed, executed on the 25th day of September, 1883, by said Sayre to respondent, when Sayre had the whole note and mortgage, undiminished by the payment of a transfer of any part thereof, and had no other interest in said west 50 feet so conveyed to respondent than said mortgage lien, must proprio vigore have assigned to respondent said note and mortgage; and so it is, respondent avers, that it is not true said Sayre at the time of the alleged execution of the deed to Minnie Halle had a mortgage lien upon the lot so sought to be conveyed to her.

Further answering paragraph 9, respondent says that neither said Warrock nor said Myers consented to, nor were they or either of them consulted about or privy to the negotiations or price paid for the said purchase by Minnie Halle and respondent; and so respondent avers that at the time said conveyance was made to Minnie Halle the said Sayre had no debt or other claim against said Warrock capable of being ascertained or enforced against said east 30 feet.

As to the tenth paragraph, respondent says he does not know, and has no information, as to whether said Warrock has paid to the past or present holder, if there be a present legal holder of said note, the sum therein mentioned, but he says it is not true that said note and mortgage remain unpaid, except the sum paid by respondent to Sayre, and that no ascertained sum or sums capable of being ascertained now remains due upon said note and mortgage, if there be any sum due thereon.

As to the fourth paragraph, it is alleged that said Warrock, on the 20th day of March, 1876, being then in possession of the entire portion of said lot, conveyed it by full warranty deed to A. Joseph Myers, and that thereafter Myers conveyed the same by deed to respondent, the originals of said deeds being attached as part of the answer.

Further, respondent says it is not true that he claims title to said lot solely through the deed executed to him by said Myers; that he purchased in good faith from Sayre the west 50 feet of said lot, taking from him a deed thereto with full covenants of warranty, and subsequently respondent discovered that said entire east half of said lot had been sold on the 28th day of July, A. D. 1879, to the state of Florida, for taxes duly assessed thereon for the year 1879, and that the title thereto was in the said state of Florida; and thereupon respondent purchased the same from the state, for which purchase a deed was executed and recorded, as is shown by certified copy appended as part of the answer. Respondent avers that by virtue of said deed he acquired a title paramount to said mortgage, and that he took possession of said lot of 80 feet under said deed, and has continuously held possession of the same.

On the 2d day of April, A. D. 1888, complainants below filed the general replication to said answer, and on the 25th day of May, A. D. 1888, they set the cause down for hearing on bill, amended bill, answer, and exhibits thereto, the record of proceedings in the foreclosure suit of Henry D. Sayre vs. Loudwick Warrock, and the deed from Sayre to Minnie Halle. Service of notice of setting the cause down for hearing was accepted by solicitors for respondent, and on the day the cause was set down a hearing was had, and the chancellor decreed in favor of complainants that the property described in the bill is subject to the mortgage sought to be enforced for the balance of said debt. A reference was made to a master to ascertain and report what is due complainants for balance of the principal and interest on the note and mortgage after deducting the sum of $1,200 paid by respondent, costs and attorney's fee, as provided in the mortgage.

Jordan appeals, and assigns here that the court erred in rendering said decree, and in not dismissing the bill.

A. W. Cockrell & Son, for appellant. Walker & L'Engle, for appellees.

MABRY, J., (after stating the facts.) The former proceedings on the part of Sayre to foreclose the mortgage executed by Warrock and wife to Benedict, and assigned to Sayre, were futile, and the sale thereunder did not pass any title to him. Jordan v. Sayre, 24 Fla. 1, 3 South. Rep. 329.

Sayre first executed and delivered to Manuel C. Jordan, appellant, a warranty deed for the west 50 feet of the east 80 feet of lot 6, in square 71, according to Hart's map, in the city of Jacksonville, Duval county, Fla., being the lot described in the Warrock mortgage, and then executed and delivered to Minnie Halle, one of the appellees, a warranty deed to the remaining 30 feet of said 80-foot lot. At the time of the conveyance to Jordan the situation of Sayre with respect to the entire 80-foot lot was that of mortgagee by virtue of the assignment from Benedict. After the execution of the deed to Mrs. Halle, Jordan obtained a conveyance from Myers, who had purchased from Warrock, for the entire 80-foot lot, and thereby became the holder of the legal title, at the same time being in possession of a prior warranty deed from Sayre, the mortgagee, for the west 50 feet of said lot. Under this condition of affairs, Sayre and the Halles, husband and wife, file a bill to foreclose the Warrock mortgage for the use of Mrs. Halle, to whom Sayre had executed a warranty deed on the east 30 feet of said lot, and asking that the sum of $1,200—the purchase money paid by Jordan for the other portion—be credited on the mortgage debt. It is alleged in the bill that the only interest Sayre had in the said 30 feet of said lot at the time he executed the deed to Mrs. Halle was the mortgage lien, and complainants insist that the deed from Sayre to Mrs. Halle was, and must be deemed and decreed to be, an assignment to her of said note and mortgage, and the lien thereof on said 30 feet, after deducting the amount paid by Jordan to Sayre.

The consideration of two questions will be sufficient to determine the matters now before us. The first one is, what is the effect of the deeds executed by Sayre to Jordan and Mrs. Halle, under the circumstances presented here, on the present foreclosure proceedings? and, second, what efficacy must be given to the alleged tax title acquired by Jordan?

When the case was here before on appeal (Jordan v. Sayre, supra) it was said: "It is true that an assignment simply of the mortgage, or of the mortgagee's interest in the land, without the debt, is held to be a nullity. In the case at bar, however, we have before us as complainants both the assignor and the assignee, and upon the record the assignment of both the balance of the debt and the lien as to the east 30 feet is admitted; and the terms of the deed as set forth in the bill are sufficient to carry the mortgage interest as to the land involved in this suit, and should be held to do so." Counsel for appellant contend that this decision was made on a demurrer to the bill, but, as it is averred in the answer that as matter of fact Sayre did not sell or convey to Mrs. Halle, by his deed to her, said note and mortgage, and that he did not intend by said deed to convey, and Mrs. Halle did not intend to purchase or receive, said note and mortgage, and that said conveyance was not in fact, and cannot and should not be deemed as, an assignment to her of said note and mortgage, an issue is presented which must be determined in favor of appellant on a failure of proof to sustain the allegations of the bill. It appears that counsel for complainants in the court below set the cause down for hearing before the expiration of the time fixed for taking testimony, on bill, answer, exhibits, the record of the former proceedings of Sayre against Warrock and wife, and the deed from Sayre to Mrs. Halle, and both parties went to hearing on this submission. Looking to the entire record, including the answer of appellant, is any valid objection to the foreclosure proceedings shown? Complainant Sayre executed to Mrs. Halle a warranty deed to the land, which he did not own, though he may have mistakenly supposed he did, but on which rested the lien of the mortgage which had been assigned to him, together with the mortgage debt. Sayre unites with Mrs. Halle in a bill to foreclose said mortgage for her benefit on the part of the lot which she had attempted to buy from him, and for which she held his warranty deed. They allege that the only interest Sayre had in the lot at the time of his said conveyance was the mortgage lien, and that the deed to Mrs. Halle was and must be decreed an assignment of said mortgage debt, except $1,200, paid by appellant to Sayre. Appellant says, in opposition to their right to maintain the suit, that they did not intend the deed to Mrs. Halle to be a conveyance of the mortgage debt. Does this, in the face of what is admitted in the record, constitute any defense? With us the mortgagee, either before or after default, has no title by virtue of his mortgage to the mortgaged real estate. His interest is simply a lien for the security of the debt mentioned in the mortgage, and he can acquire the title, as against the mortgagor or his grantee, only by outbidding every other person at the foreclosure sale. At the time of the execution of the deed to Jordan by Sayre he had no title to convey, and his interest in the land was a lien of a mortgage to secure the payment of a note which he held against Warrock; and the same is true of Sayre's situation in reference to the east 30 feet of the lot, and the attempted sale to Mrs. Halle, unless his previous deed to appellant produced a different result. It is furthermore true, under the existing conditions with us in respect to the rights of mortgagor and mortgagee, that a conveyance by the latter of the mortgaged property before foreclosure, or an attempted foreclosure, unless such conveyance contain a grant of the mortgage debt, or unless its terms are sufficient to carry this interest, and it was intended by the parties to have this effect, will be inoperative for this purpose. The mere conveyance by the mortgagee of the mortgaged premises alone will not per se operate as an assignment of the debt secured by the mortgage. Hill v. Edwards, 11 Minn. 22, (Gil. 5;) Everest v. Ferris, 16 Minn. 26, (Gil. 14;) Purdy v. Huntington, 42 N. Y. 334; Smith v. Smith, 15 N. H. 55. On the other hand, it has been held by many cases, and seems to be sustained by the decided weight of authority, that where a void sale has been made of the entire mortgaged premises under proceedings to foreclose a mortgage, a third party purchasing at said sale succeeds to the title and rights of the mortgagee in said property, and may enforce them as the mortgagee could have done, had no sale taken place. And it appears that, where the mortgagee becomes the purchaser of the entire mortgaged premises at a void foreclosure sale, and then sells and attempts to convey such premises, his deed operates as an assignment of the mortgage debt, as well as the mortgage securing the same to the grantee in the deed. Johnson v. Sandhoff, 30 Minn. 197, 14 N. W. Rep. 889; Cooke v. Cooper, 18 Or. 142, 22 Pac. Rep. 945; Stark v. Brown, 12 Wis. 572; Brobst v. Brock, 10 Wall. 519; Hoffman v. Harrington, 33 Mich. 392; Jackson v. Bowen, 7 Cow. 13; Robinson v. Ryan, 25 N. Y. 320; Winslow v. Clark, 47 N. Y. 261. This doctrine seems to rest upon certain equitable considerations between the mortgagee and the purchaser. In Stark v. Brown, supra, in speaking of the right of the mortgagee to assign his debt, it is said: "If he sees fit to invoke the agency of the law, not only to accomplish that assignment, but to divest all adverse rights, and transfer them to the purchaser, if by any reason he fails to accomplish the latter object, should that also defeat the former? It seems to us not. * * * Where the mortgagee has assented to the sale in that manner, and taken the purchaser's money, this conclusion would seem to rest safely on the doctrine of equitable estoppel, whatever irregularities there might be in point of form." In Frische v. Kramer's Lessee, 16 Ohio, 125, it was held that the purchaser at judicial sale of the mortgaged premises becomes invested with the interest of the mortgagee in the land, and, so far as the land is concerned, is subrogated to all the rights of the mortgagee. In Smith v. Hitchcock, 130 Mass. 570, it was decided that the conveyance by the mortgagee of a part of the mortgaged premises operated as an equitable assignment of the mortgage to secure the purchaser in the amount he had paid for the land. In one of the opinions delivered in Wilson v. Troup, 2 Cow. 195, it was said, in reference to the effect of a conveyance of a part of the mortgaged premises by the mortgagee, "it produces a suspension of the exercise of the power as to the part conveyed in hostility to the right of the grantee; that is, the grantor shall not defeat his own grant. But the operation of a suspension of the power, whether it applies to the whole or a portion of the estate, is merely to postpone the vesting of the estate or interest created by or acquired under the power in possession. It does not suspend or affect the right to execute the power, and perfect the title to the estate." In this case the mortgagee had conveyed by warranty deeds parts of the mortgaged premises to persons who had not acquired the equity of redemption in the parts so purchased, and it was decided that the mortgagee could sell the entire estate, but, should he acquire title to the portions which he had conveyed, it would inure to the benefit of such purchasers.

It was clearly the duty of Sayre, under the covenants in his deed to Mrs. Halle, to perfect the title to the part of the lot which she had purchased, and it was legitimate for him, conceding that he had an interest in the mortgage debt, with her co-operation, to foreclose and buy in the legal title with that debt if he could. His warranties in the deed would estop him, of course, from asserting any interest in the land in hostility to her, and, should he acquire the legal title, it would at once pass to her. According to the authorities above cited, Mrs. Halle would, in equity, be entitled to be subrogated, to the extent at least of the lot described in her deed and the amount paid for the same, to the rights of Sayre in the debt and mortgage securing the same on said lot. Her rights under her warranty deed, accruing by operation of law, would be the same, to the extent of her purchase, as her grantor had, and it is clear that all he had was a right to foreclose his mortgage on said lot. To this extent it is clear Mrs. Halle would have an equitable right to have the mortgage foreclosed for her benefit. It would manifestly be no defense to a bill, filed by Sayre and herself to foreclose the mortgage on the lot, to allege that the deed from the former to the latter was not intended by them to operate as an assignment of the mortgage debt, when in equity, as we have seen, she becomes subrogated to the mortgage security to the extent of her purchase. She might not necessarily, by operation of law, under her purchase, acquire the entire interest in the mortgage debt, as it may be large enough to protect her rights in the lot and leave a balance over. Her right, however, to be substituted, to the extent of her purchase, to the mortgage security, does not depend upon a contractual assignment of the mortgage debt, but it comes about by operation of law. The answer of appellant, in so far as the allegations in reference to the assignment of the mortgage debt extend, shows no defense against the right to foreclose the mortgage. If we were to concede that the parties did not, as a matter of fact, intend the deed to Mrs. Halle to operate as an assignment of the mortgage debt, it does not deprive the transaction of its legal effect in equity of subrogating her to the rights of the mortgage security to the extent of her purchase. She can only avail herself of her rights in this respect by a foreclosure, and, as equity gives her this remedy, she is in the proper forum. Nor does Sayre in any way obstruct her in this remedy. He joins in the suit and asks that the court decree a foreclosure in her favor, and that his conveyance to her be decreed as an assignment of the balance of the mortgage debt. Within the authority of Wilson v. Troup, supra, Sayre, who is before the court as complainant, can maintain the foreclosure suit. There is no objection to him as being an improper party here. Mrs. Halle is the only person, so far as this record shows, who has any right to object to the foreclosure of the mortgage on the part of the lot involved in this suit. Though she may not have acquired any legal title to the part of the lot by her deed from Sayre, yet, as between them, she has acquired rights which he is bound to respect, and interests which it is his duty to protect. They are both before the court as complainants, asking that the mortgage be foreclosed for the benefit of Mrs. Halle, and under the terms of Sayre's deed to her, to the extent of the property therein attempted to be conveyed at least, they maintain an equitable status in the court to foreclose the mortgage.

Much of the discussion of the counsel for appellant is based on the theory that appellant by his deed from Sayre acquired a large part, if not all, of the mortgage debt from the latter. It will be remembered that appellant first purchased from Sayre 50 feet of the lot described in the mortgage. There is here no invasion of this 50 feet. Appellant's warranty deed will protect this part against unfriendly action on the part of Sayre, or any one claiming subsequently under him. If it appeared that the title in the portion of the lot described in the deed from Sayre to appellant was outstanding, and it was necessary for his protection that the mortgage security should be foreclosed on this portion of the lot also, he would have a right, upon proper allegations, to a decree to this effect. His rights, however, would attach to the mortgage security only to the extent of his purchase. His subrogation, under such circumstances, would spring from, and be measured by, the warranty deed to him from Sayre. It would arise from the fact that Sayre, the holder of a mortgage lien on the lot, had sold it to him for $1,200 in cash; and the latter, in equity, would be entitled, under the circumstances, to have the mortgage security enforced on the land, to secure him in his purchase. But no such case is presented for appellant. He has already acquired, by conveyance from Myers, who purchased from Warrock, the original mortgagor, the legal title to the portion of the lot described in the deed from Sayre.

As to the 30 feet now sought to be subjected to the lien of the mortgage, appellant occupies the position of mortgagor, having derived title from him, with knowledge of the mortgage.

It is not claimed in the answer that Sayre intended to, or did in fact by his deed to appellant, assign any portion of the mortgage debt. It is true the answer says that if the deed to Mrs. Halle proprio vigore assigned to her the debt and mortgage, then the former deed to appellant must likewise be deemed to have transferred to him said debt and mortgage, or, as it is argued, the major part of it. But we do not hold that the deed to Mrs. Halle operates, proprio vigore, to assign the debt and mortgage to her. We hold that the purchase by Mrs. Halle from Sayre operates as a subrogation to his rights in the mortgage security to the extent of protecting her in the portion of the lot described in her deed. This protection can only be had, as shown here, by a foreclosure of the mortgage. It nowhere appears that it is necessary for the protection of appellant in his purchase from Sayre that any portion of the mortgage debt be decreed to exist for his benefit; on the contrary, it appears that no part of the mortgage security is necessary to secure him in the 50 feet described in his deed from Sayre; and, as it is not shown that appellant has any interest in the debt and mortgage, it becomes unnecessary for us to devote any discussion to the case as presenting this aspect. While the warranty deed from Sayre to appellant protects him in the portion described therein, it does not affect the residue of the debt, nor the lien of the mortgage as to the remainder of the land. As to this, he is in the place of the mortgagor, and the abortive foreclosure proceedings are no bar to another action to enforce the lien of the mortgage. Aside from the tax title, the other allegations in the answer call for no discussion. The hearing was had upon the record of the proceedings in the foreclosure suit, and what is alleged in the answer in reference thereto constitutes no defense.

It is contended, in the second place, that after appellant obtained his deed from Sayre he discovered that the entire lot had been sold to the state of Florida for the nonpayment of taxes assessed thereon for the year 1878, and that he obtained from the state a tax deed, which is paramount to the mortgage. A certified copy of the tax deed is attached to the answer as a part thereof, and is executed by the clerk of the circuit court of Duval county on the 19th day of August, 1884. It is contended by appellees that appellant could not, by reason of his relation to the property and the parties here, acquire a tax title as against their interest, and that the acquisition of the same amounted to a redemption of the property from said tax sale. Appellant's deed from Myers bears date the 16th day of August, 1884, and the tax deed is dated August 19, 1884. By the purchase from Myers appellant became invested with the title of the mortgagor. In Jones, Mortg. § 680, it is laid down as a rule that "a mortgagor cannot, by acquiring a tax title upon the land, defeat the lien of the mortgagee. It is his duty to pay the taxes, and he is not allowed to acquire a title through his own default. The same obligation rests upon one who has purchased the land of the mortgagor. * * * The mortgagor, or any holder of the equity standing in his place as a purchaser or a second mortgagee, cannot set up such title against the prior mortgagee." Burroughs, in his work on Taxation, § 123, p. 353, announces the same view. If a person is in possession of land claiming the same as his own, it is his duty to pay the taxes, and, under such circumstances, he cannot acquire an outstanding title by neglecting to pay the taxes, and allowing the land to be sold for the same, and purchasing the same. Some decisions go to the extent of holding that, if he be a trespasser in possession claiming the land, he cannot neglect to pay taxes, and then acquire a title by purchasing the same at tax sale. Douglas v. Dangerfield, 10 Ohio, 152; Bassett v. Welch, 22 Wis. 175; Barrett v. Amerein, 36 Cal. 322. In Spratt v. Price, 18 Fla. 289, it is said that the terms, duty and obligation to pay taxes, are used, first, in reference to the government imposing the tax, and, second, in reference to the relation existing between individuals. The legislature fixes the duty to the state, and the relation, legal or equitable, between individuals gives rise to the obligation between parties. Here it was held that a mortgagee not in possession could acquire a valid tax title at a second sale, based upon an assessment against the mortgagor in possession, as against a stranger who had purchased at a former tax sale. The question here presented involves the right of a purchaser from a mortgagor to acquire a tax deed as against a mortgagee or his assignee. In Avery v. Judd, 21 Wis. 262, it was decided that one in possession of mortgaged land under a deed from the mortgagor, subject to the mortgage, cannot take, as against the mortgagee, a tax title for taxes which the mortgagor or those holding under him were bound to pay. In this case the mortgage was executed and recorded in 1853, and through mesne conveyance from the mortgagor Judd came to be the owner of the equity of redemption in 1859. The mortgaged premises were sold to the county at tax sale in 1858, for the taxes of 1857, and a tax deed was issued to Judd in 1862, as assignee of the tax-sale certificate. When Judd purchased the mortgage premises through mesne conveyances from the mortgagor in 1859, they had been previously sold to the county for the taxes of 1857. In speaking of the relation of the parties in this case, DIXON, C. J., said: "It is a relation of trust, arising from the nature of the contract as a security, and the situation of the parties with respect to the property upon which the security is given. The mortgagor, and those in possession under him, subject to the payment of the mortgage, hold the estate clothed with a fiduciary duty. The estate, to the extent of his interest, belongs to the mortgagee; and the mortgagor and his grantees are intrusted with the care of it; and, being so intrusted, they are bound in equity and conscience to do no act, and to suffer none to be done, which shall destroy the mortgagee's title, or impair his security. * * * Judd, as the holder of the estate by conveyance from the mortgagor subject to the mortgage, was precluded from acquiring title by tax deed as against the mortgagee. He stood in the place of the mortgagor, whose duty it was to have paid the taxes. This was the duty of the mortgagor in possession, not only by virtue of that relation, but more particularly because of the covenant which he had made to pay all taxes. The same duty devolved upon Judd upon conveyance of the premises to him subject to the payment of the mortgage." This view finds support in the following authorities: Lacey v. Davis, 4 Mich. 140; Bank v. Bacharach, 46 Conn. 513; Stears v. Hollenbeck, 38 Iowa, 550; Cooley, Tax'n, 500; 1 Blackw. Tax Titles, § 591; Black, Tax Titles, § 138.

The tax title set up as a defense here covers the entire lot, and, as appears from the record, at the time Jordan obtained it he owned, freed by his warranty deed from the mortgage lien, the west 50 feet of the lot. The tax title is an entirety, and covers property then owned by appellant, as well as that part now involved. In 1 Blackw. Tax Titles, § 592, it is said that one who owns any portion of the equity of redemption from a mortgage cannot buy a tax deed that will be valid against the mortgagee. In Bank v. Bacharach, supra, it is declared "that any party who sustains such a relation to the property that he has a right to redeem, and, if redeeming, may be required to refund to the mortgagee the taxes paid by him, cannot be a purchaser of the property if sold for taxes." Furthermore, the copy of the tax deed attached to the answer shows that the lot was sold in 1879 for the nonpayment of taxes levied and assessed thereon for the year 1878, and that the assessment was to L. Warrock. The deeds exhibited as parts of the answer show that Warrock had previously sold the property, and that A. Joseph Myers was at the time of the assessment the owner of the property. On the record here there is apparently an erroneous and void assessment.

Upon a consideration of the entire record, our judgment is that the decree of the chancellor should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

RANEY, C. J., (concurring.) It is fully adjudicated by the authorities cited in the main opinion that, where the owner of the mortgage interest purchases at a foreclosure sale under a decree in which he is complainant, but to which the owner of the legal title of the land is not a party, and obtains a deed purporting to convey the land to him, and afterwards he executes a deed with covenants of warranty, conveying the land to another, his deed operates as an assignment of the mortgage claim to the last supposed purchaser; and authorities cited even show that he is a necessary party to a bill brought by the owner of the legal title to redeem the mortgage. Where, as here, the assignment of the mortgage interest—the debt and the lien on the land—is asserted on the record by both the grantor and the grantee, and the terms of the deed are sufficient to carry such interest, the mere holder of the legal title cannot, in my judgment, question the mere intent to assign the mortgage interest. Upon these pleadings Jordan is, as to the 30 feet in question, no more than a mere holder of the legal title. The intent to assign is a matter of immateriality to Jordan, in so far as he is shown to be concerned, in the face of the deed and the admission referred to. Had Sayre continued to hold the mortgage, he could have foreclosed it as to the 30 feet, even as against Jordan under the circumstances of this case, excluding the assignment to Mrs. Halle. Jordan shows no interest which is in any wise affected by the transfer, nor any fact altering the law of the case, (Wilson v. Fridenberg, 21 Fla. 386,) as settled by the decision made when it was here before, (Jordan v. Sayre, 24 Fla. 1, 3 South. Rep. 329.) This decision adjudged that, upon the case as then made, the deed operated as an assignment to Mrs. Halle of the mortgage interest remaining in Sayre. The only parties who, upon the face of this record, can ever claim any interest in the remainder of the mortgage interest sought to be foreclosed are before the court, and they, as against Jordan, are forever concluded by the decree from asserting that the transfer has not been made. Jordan not only does not show any interest of his which can suffer from the assignment, but he does not pretend that there is any one not before the court who has any interest in the controversy.

There is no controversy in the record between Sayre and Mrs. Halle as to the extent to which the mortgage claim held by Mrs. Halle, at the time the deed was executed, was assigned to her; nor, as shown by the main opinion, is there any such controversy properly made between Jordan and complainants. Upon this question, and as to what right Sayre might have to enforce of himself the mortgage for the benefit of Mrs. Halle, and as to the exact principle upon which the deed can be said always to operate in cases of this kind, I express no opinion.

While I concur fully in the conclusion that the decree appealed from should be affirmed, and am of the opinion that the real effect of the deed, under the circumstances of its execution, and of the case as it is made by the pleadings, was to assign the mortgage interest of Mrs. Halle, and that, as is indicated by the main opinion, there is nothing in the answer, outside of the effect of the tax deed, to merit any attention but the question of intent, I do not think that Jordan can, under the case made by the pleadings, question this intent; and this view is, in my judgment, the one properly controlling the decision of the issue thus attempted to be raised by the answer.

CORPORATIONS — LIABILITY OF SUBSCRIBERS TO STOCK—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS—GARNISHMENT.

1. A subscription for stock in a corporation, though payable in property at a fictitious valuation, and not enforceable against the subscriber by the corporation in its own interest, because in violation of Const. art. 14, § 6, and Code, § 1662, prohibiting the issue of stock except for money or property at a reasonable value, is not void as against a creditor of the corporation, and cannot be set up as a defense by the subscriber in garnishment proceedings by such creditor.

2. An unpaid subscription to stock of a corporation is an asset of the corporation, and accessible by garnishment proceedings against the subscriber by its creditors.

Appeal from city court of Montgomery; THOMAS M. ARRINGTON, Judge.

Davis Bros., having recovered a judgment against the Montgomery Furnace & Chemical Company, instituted garnishment proceedings against W. F. Joseph, as a subscriber to the stock of said corporation. From a judgment against him the garnishee appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Falkner, for appellant. Tompkins & Troy, for appellees.

COLEMAN, J. The facts presented in the present record differ but little from those considered when the case was here on a former appeal. 8 South. Rep. 496. Davis Bros. recovered judgment against the Montgomery Furnace & Chemical Company. Upon the return of execution indorsed "No property found," the plaintiffs caused W. F. Joseph to be summoned as garnishee. The record states that the garnishee "denies that he is indebted to the said defendant." This was the sole issue upon the contest of his answer. That the garnishee subscribed for $1,000 of the bonds of the "Montgomery Charcoal, Iron, Furnace & Chemical Company," as shown in Exhibit 1, offered in evidence by plaintiffs, and that this subscription has not been paid, is admitted by the garnishee. His contention is that he never subscribed to the "Montgomery Furnace & Chemical Company," the judgment debtor. The agreement of subscription evidenced by Exhibit 1 refers to the "Montgomery Land and Improvement Company," and to the "Standard Charcoal, Iron, and Chemical Company at Nashville,"—the former to donate 30 acres of land, and the latter a "license covering the Pierce patents,"—for which stock was to be issued. Exhibits 2 and 3, introduced in evidence by plaintiffs, when taken in connection with the evidence of Woolfolk, the secretary and treasurer of the Montgomery Furnace & Chemical Company, show very conclusively that the "Montgomery Charcoal, Iron, Furnace, and Chemical Company," to which the garnishee did subscribe, was organized and chartered as the "Montgomery Furnace & Chemical Company." The evidence shows there was no material departure in the character or purpose of the corporation as organized and chartered from that which was contemplated as shown in Exhibit 1. In fact, the only difference seems to be in the abbreviation of the name. In addition to this, the garnishee paid three several calls to the secretary and treasurer of the Montgomery Furnace & Chemical Company, accepting receipts for the payment given in the name of this corporation. Knox v. Land Co., 86 Ala. 184, 5 South. Rep. 578. Exhibits 1, 2, 3, in connection with the evidence of Woolfolk, were competent to show the identity of the proposed corporation to which garnishee subscribed with that organized and chartered. Knox v. Land Co., 86 Ala. 184, 5 South. Rep. 578; Cook, Stocks, §§ 184, 503; 8 South. Rep. 496, supra. This court, following the weight of authority as declared in other tribunals, and which seems to us to be based upon sound principles, has recently decided that a subscription for stock, payable in property at a fictitious valuation, and which could not be enforced against the subscriber by the corporation in its own interest because violative of article 14, § 6, of the constitution, and section 1662 of the Code,[1] is not void as against a creditor, and cannot be set up as a legal defense against a creditor of the corporation. Elyton Land Co. v. Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Co., 92 Ala. 497, 9 South. Rep. 129; Parsons v. Joseph, 92 Ala. 404, 8 South. Rep. 788. That the unpaid subscription for bonds were assets of the company liable to its debts, and accessible to the process of garnishment, was decided on the former appeal. See, also, Curry v. Woodward, 53 Ala. 372; Cook, Stocks, § 201. We find no error in the record, and the judgment must be affirmed.

SIBLEY v. ALBA.

SUIT FOR PARTITION — DEFENSES — ADVERSE POSSESSION BY COTENANT—RES JUDICATA.

1. Where plaintiff in partition claims through a cotenant of defendant, owning an undivided half of the land, the fact that plaintiff acquired his title by a champertous agreement is no defense, since such fact cannot affect defendant.

2. The possession of a tenant in common is not adverse to that of his cotenant, where there is no ouster, or act equivalent thereto.

3. Where plaintiff claimed title as a purchaser at a foreclosure sale under a mortgage executed by defendant's original cotenant to one B., and by the latter assigned to plaintiff, a plea by defendant that the debt was fully paid by the original cotenant to B. is bad, since the decree of foreclosure is, as to third persons, conclusive that the debt was unpaid.

Cross appeals from chancery court, Mobile county; W. H. TAYLOE, Chancellor.

Suit for partition by Origen Sibley against Peter F. Alba. The ground of the fourth plea was that E. S. Barnes should be made a party. Decree holding the third plea good, and the first, second, and fourth insufficient. Both parties appeal. Reversed.

Harmis Taylor, for plaintiff. Richard P. Deshon, for defendant.

STONE, C. J. This case was submitted to the chancellor on the sufficiency of four several pleas. The first, second, and fourth were held insufficient, while the third was pronounced a good defense to the bill. There are cross assignments of error, and the sufficiency of each of thy pleas is thus presented for our decision. Sibley's title, as alleged, arose as follows: In October, 1869, one Duvall executed to Brown a mortgage on an undivided half interest in certain lots of land in Mobile county, to secure a debt of $2,500, due in one and two years. That mortgage was duly recorded. In November, 1888, Brown having died, his executors conveyed and transferred the mortgage and all it secured to Sibley. This mortgage was foreclosed by suit in chancery, instituted by Sibley in 1889, and at the sale under the decree he became the purchaser, and received a conveyance. In October, 1890, he instituted this suit.

Partition is the object of the present suit. The bill sets forth Sibley's claim and chain of title, as briefly sketched above. It avers that the other undivided half interest in the lots belongs to Alba, the defendant. Only the two, Sibley and Alba, are made parties to this suit. In the bill and transcript before us, the reference to the foreclosure suit does not disclose who were defendants, other than Barnes, the administrator of Duvall. It speaks of that suit as "the case entitled 'Origen Sibley v. E. S. Barnes, Administrator, et al.'" We are nowhere informed who were the other parties defendant. We suppose they were the heirs at law of Duvall, the mortgagor; for unless they were before the court their title could not be divested. We will, therefore, treat this case as if they were before the court. It is proper that we should state that no intimation has been given, either in the pleadings or argument, which questions the presence of all necessary parties in the foreclosure suit. It is not shown in the record, or averred in the pleadings, whether or not Duvall and Alba were original tenants in common of the lots sought to be partitioned, or whether Alba claims to have acquired his interest at a later time. Neither is it denied that Duvall, when he executed the mortgage to Brown, owned an undivided half interest in the lots, nor is it claimed or averred that Alba has ever acquired that half interest by purchase or descent. The only right he relies on for maintaining his possession is that he "went into adverse possession of said undivided one half interest in, the lands claimed by complainant in this suit, and was claiming said interest adversely to all the world during the remainder of said year 1877, and during the time that has since transpired, and is now holding the same adversely." The bill charges that Alba and Sibley each own an undivided half interest in the lots, the latter by virtue of his purchase at the foreclosure sale; and the foregoing extract from plea No. 2 is the only statement of fact interposed by defendant that can be construed into a denial of the averment that Duvall and Alba were tenants in common. Under this state of the pleading we feel forced to treat this case as if Duvall and Alba were originally coequal tenants in common.

The first plea interposed sets up the alleged champertous agreement between Sibley and Barnes, which led the former to purchase and become the owner of the Duvall claim and mortgage. That agreement might raise very grave inquiries in any dispute that may spring up between Sibley and Barnes. It cannot in the least affect Alba, a mere stranger to the negotiation and to its consequences. The result of the authorities bearing on this question is correctly summarized in 3 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 86, in the following language: "When an action is brought directly upon a champertous contract, champerty is a good defense, and may be set up by way of answer; and if the true character of the contract appears upon the face of the pleading, such pleading may be successfully demurred to. The better opinion would appear to be that the defense of champerty can only be set up when the champertous contract itself is sought to be enforced." See the many authorities cited, note 3. The chancellor did not err in disallowing this plea.

Plea No. 2. We have copied above the averment found in this plea in reference to Alba's adverse holding. It is wholly insufficient to constitute his possession adverse against a tenant in common. "The seisin and possession of one tenant in common is the seisin and possession of the other or others, and an uninterrupted, exclusive possession by one is not usually deemed adverse, unless accompanied by circumstances indicating an expulsion or ouster of the other." Brady v. Huff, 75 Ala. 80; Abercrombie v. Baldwin, 15 Ala. 363. "The possession of a tenant in common is not adverse to that of his cotenant, unless there is an actual ouster, or refusal to let the cotenant occupy." Burrus v. Meadors, 90 Ala. 140, 7 South. Rep. 469; Newbold v. Smart, 67 Ala. 326; Stevenson v. Anderson, 87 Ala. 228, 6 South. Rep. 285. "The possession of one tenant in common, though exclusive, being consistent with the right of his cotenant, does not amount to a disseisin of the cotenant; and an ouster, or some act which the law deems equivalent to an ouster, is necessary to constitute a disseisin of his cotenant by a tenant in common." 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 232; Duncan v. Williams, 89 Ala. 341, 7 South. Rep. 416. The averments of the plea fail to show a holding by Alba adverse to the rights of his cotenant, Brown.

But if this averment were sufficient, that would not oust the jurisdiction. The chancellor would suspend proceedings until the question of disputed ownership could be settled on an issue to be made up and submitted to a jury. McMath v. De Bardelaben, 75 Ala. 68.

Another view: If, when the sale was made under the foreclosure proceedings, any person other than Sibley had purchased, it would scarcely be contended, under the facts shown in the pleadings in this case, that such purchaser could not maintain a suit for partition. Can the fact that Sibley purchased make a difference? The rule against recovery on a title acquired while the property was held adversely does not apply when the property was purchased at judicial sale. Humes v. Bernstein, 72 Ala. 546.

The third plea sets up, in defense of this suit for partition, that the alleged mortgage debt from Duvall to Brown had been paid long before Sibley asserted claim to it, or procured a foreclosure of the mortgage, which culminated in his purchase of the undivided half interest. In the foreclosure suit the heirs of Duvall were necessary parties. We suppose they were parties, and, as we have before stated, we will treat this case as if they were parties. The record before us shows that Barnes, the administrator, was a party to that suit. Plea No. 1 charges champerty, collusion, and fraud between Sibley and Barnes, by which they acquired the ownership of the alleged mortgage debt, and procured the decree of foreclosure and sale under it. If the mortgage debt had been paid, and if, by collusion and fraud between Barnes and Sibley, the decree of foreclosure and the sale were brought about, then a great wrong was inflicted on Duvall's heirs; and unless, by failure to move at the proper time, they have forfeited their right to have the questions retried and the wrongs redressed, the courts and their process are open to them, and they can obtain ample redress and relief from Sibley and Barnes. This, on the cardinal principle that fraud, if properly assailed, vitiates all transactions, no matter what form they may be made to assume. Standing, however, as the record does, and assuming that the heirs of Duvall were parties to the foreclosure suit, that record is conclusive evidence that the mortgage debt was unpaid, alike against Duvall's estate, and against all other persons who cannot connect themselves with his title. If, however, Alba has succeeded to Duval's title or rights, not by mere adverse holding, but by purchase or conveyance, or by a subsisting, unpaid, and unbarred moneyed demand, this may open the door to him to show that the debt from Duvall to Brown had been paid before the decree in foreclosure was rendered. Mead v. York, 57 Amer. Dec. 467, and note. The third plea presents no bar to this suit, and the decretal order of the chancellor holding that plea sufficient must be reversed. Let the appellee pay the costs of the appeal. Reversed and rendered.

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—ALLOWANCE FOR SUPPORT AND EDUCATION—ACCOUNTING BY TRUSTEE.

1. A will provided that the executor should support testator's widow, and support and educate his children. The widow and children filed a bill praying that the trustee be required to increase their allowance, and upon reference to a master he reported that a larger gross allowance was necessary. The widow thereupon withdrew as a party, and filed an application, dissenting from the will, and choosing to take her distributive share. Held, that as the widow was a necessary party, and was not properly joined, after her withdrawal, by her subsequent petition, the court properly dismissed the same and denied the motion of the children for a reference to ascertain the amount necessary for their support and education; and the prior report, including in it the amount necessary for the support of the wife, being insufficient as to the needs of the children only, they were properly denied relief.

2. Where a will provided that, "if agreeable to the parties concerned," "my mother, father, and sister shall continue to reside with my family," and "my trustee shall contribute towards their support as I do at this time," such support was not conditioned upon their residence with the widow and family; and contribution to their support "in the same manner in which the testator had done in his lifetime" was proper as to amount.

Appeal from chancery court, Mobile county; W. H. TAYLOE, Chancellor.

Bill by Rebecca E. Ward and the three minor children of Rebecca E. Ward and Benjamin Ward, deceased, against Alfred G. Ward and others, praying to have the further execution of the trust and management of the estate of Benjamin Ward, deceased, removed from the probate court of Mobile county into the chancery court. The bill also prayed the construction of the will of Benjamin Ward, deceased, and that the executor and trustee thereunder be required to account for his management of said trust, and that he be required to make better provision for the widow and three children. The three items of the will which are more particularly involved in this cause are as follows: "Second. I desire him [the executor] to furnish my beloved wife with means sufficient to maintain her in a comfortable manner, suitable to her station in life. Third. I desire him to see to the support and education of such children as I may leave surviving me. Fourth. I desire, if agreeable to the parties concerned, that my mother, father, and sister shall continue to reside with my family, and that my trustee shall contribute towards their support, out of my estate, as I do at this time." The court ordered a reference to the master to examine into the affairs of the estate, and the condition in life of the complainants at that time, and their condition before the death of Benjamin Ward; and to report what amount, under the provisions of the will, and the condition of the estate, would be a proper monthly allowance for their maintenance and education. The master reported that $250 per month would be a proper and reasonable allowance to the complainants for their proper maintenance and education. The chancellor refused to act upon this report until the final hearing of the cause on its merits. Mrs. Rebecca E. Ward thereupon withdrew from the litigation as a party complainant, and filed an application for her distributive portion of the said estate, dissenting from the will, and choosing to take the portion allowed by law, rather than to take under the will. The three complainants subsequently moved the court to refer the matter to the master, for the purpose of ascertaining and reporting to the court the amount which should be allowed said three complainants for their support, maintenance, and education. The cause was submitted for decree upon the petition of Mrs. Rebecca E. Ward and said motion of the children, and upon pleadings and proof. The chancellor overruled and denied the petition of Mrs. Rebecca E. Ward, and also denied and overruled the motion of the children, and decreed that the defendant A. G. Ward see to the support and education of the complainants, and contribute to the support of the father, mother, and sister of the said Benjamin Ward, in the same manner in which the testator had done in his lifetime, and that the said Alfred G. Ward file with the register his account and voucher for partial settlement, and that the register make a report of said settlement. All other questions were reserved for consideration when they should arise in the progress of the suit. Mrs. Rebecca E. Ward and the three complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Overall & Bestor, for appellants. Clarke & Webb, for appellees.

MCCLELLAN, J. We do not understand from this record that the chancery court declined to assume jurisdiction and control over the trusts created by the will of Benjamin Ward for the support of his wife and children, to the end of determining what provision would be reasonable and proper in that behalf, and compelling the trustee to make such provision. On the contrary, we find that the lower court virtually asserted its right and power to determine what allowance should be made by the trustee for the maintenance of the testator's widow and children, and for the education of the children, and, of consequence, its authority to compel such allowance to be made, though counsel argue the question whether this matter should be left entirely to the trustee's discretion, as if they understood the position of the chancellor differently; and there can, in our opinion, be no doubt the right and power thus asserted reside in the chancery court, and should be exercised by it whenever it is clearly made to appear that the trustee is not adequately providing for the well-being of the cestuis que trustent according to the terms and spirit of the trust instrument. McDonald v. McDonald, 92 Ala. 537, 9 South. Rep. 195, and authorities there cited. What the court really decided in this connection, however, was that a case had not been made by the evidence which required or authorized the exercise of this jurisdiction, it not being made to appear that the trustee had failed or was omitting to make proper allowance for the support and education of the cestuis que trustent. When the cause came on for hearing, the widow was no longer a party to it; she had had herself eliminated from the bill as a party complainant, she was not a defendant, and she was asking no action of the court looking to an increase of the allowance for support theretofore made to her by the trustee. Before this withdrawal on her part a reference had been had in response to the prayer of the bill as originally exhibited, to determine what would be a reasonable allowance for her and her three children, and the master had reported that $250 per month should be allowed, instead of the $150 per month which the trustee was then paying on that account. The evidence taken on this reference, and the report made, however, had relation to an allowance in gross for the children and for the widow. No evidence was adduced and no report made as to what should be allowed for the support and education of the children, who were the sole complainants in the bill at the hearing, and who only were demanding an increase of the provision made by the trustee for them. The court did not pass on the master's report while Mrs. Ward remained a party complainant to the cause. Whether, had she maintained her original attitude, the additional allowance to her and the children reported by the master should have been decreed, is a mere abstraction on this appeal,—an inquiry not presented for our consideration. There was nothing in the report or in the evidence supporting it which could afford a basis for determining what provision was proper for the children alone. This depended upon testimony which they had the onus of adducing. As was said by the chancellor, they are not entitled under the will to any fixed allowance, (Elierbe v. Ellerbe, 40 Amer. Dec. 623;) and having failed to show what amount they were entitled to, or that the sum allowed by the trustee was indequate, the refusal of the chancery court to increase that allowance, or indeed to make any decree fixing their allowance, was inevitable.

Nor was there error in the construction given to the fourth clause of Benjamin Ward's will, which is as follows: "I desire, if agreeable to the parties concerned, that my mother, father, and sister shall continue to reside with my family, and that my trustee shall contribute towards their support, out of my estate, as I do at this time." It cannot be that the testator, solicitous for the maintenance of his father, mother, and sister, and who had contributed largely to their support during his life, intended to make their future well-being to depend upon their continuing to reside in the same house with his widow, and to make such continued residence dependent upon the fact of its being agreeable to her, who was a stranger to their blood, and whose interests would be conserved by defeating his laudable purpose in respect to them. We concur with the chancellor that the support of the testator's father, mother, and sister provided for in this clause of the will was not conditional upon their continued residence with the widow and her family; and with him, also, on the showing of the answer that the provision made for them by the trustee was such as was being made for them by the testator at the time of executing the will, and hence within its expressed limitations.

At the time of filing her petition dissenting from the will and claiming a distributive share in her husband's estate, Mrs. Ward was not a party to the cause pending in the chancery court; she was as much a stranger thereto as if she had previously had no connection therewith. Yet she was a necessary party to that cause. There could be no settlement of the trusts of the will or the administration of the estate without her rights being before the court, and represented by her as a party litigant in the widest sense of the term. Whether she dissents from the will or takes under it, her rights as a party to the cause are coextensive with those of any other of the necessary parties in the sense of shaping the litigation, being heard upon any action taken, and any decree to be rendered in it. Her claim is not of a specific sum to be paid out of a fund in court, as in the case of a receivership which has become indebted to a person having no interest in the controversy between the complainants and defendants to the cause, and which may be preferred by a mere petition, since it involves no element either of prosecution or defense in the case presented by the bill and answer,—Thornton v. Railway Co., (Ala.) 10 South. Rep. 442,—but if she comes into the cause at all it is for all the purposes of prosecution or defense, as the case may be; and she cannot make herself a party for such purposes by a petition. She can only get into this cause, strictly speaking, by the action of the present complainants through an amendment of their bill; or, failing that, she may effectuate whatever rights she may be entitled to by an original bill in its nature suppletory to the present litigation. The chancellor properly dismissed her petition. Cowles v. Andrews, 39 Ala. 130; Renfro v. Geotter, 78 Ala. 314; Ex parte Printup, 87 Ala. 148, 6 South. Rep. 418.

Affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. MORGAN.

ASSUMPSIT—DETECTIVE WORK—EVIDENCE.

1. Where a detective contracts to work for defendant railroad company in ferreting out theft from defendant's cars, evidence that the persons arrested by the detective were convicted of stealing from the cars of another company, and that the latter company delivered to defendant a box containing shoes similar to two pairs claimed to have been stolen from defendant's cars, and that a shortage was found in the box when delivered, is insufficient to warrant a finding for the detective in assumpsit.

2. A letter, written by defendant's superintendent to the detective, stating that proof that the car breakers stole defendant's goods would have to be furnished before defendant would pay any bill, was not at variance with his testimony that by the contract compensation was contingent upon the arrest and conviction of thieves who had stolen from defendant's cars.

3. It was competent for the detective to testify as to what property was identified by the employe to whom he was referred by defendant's agents.

Appeal from circuit court, Jefferson county; JAMES B. HEAD, Judge.

Assumpsit by W. B. Morgan against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to recover for his services, as a detective, in ferreting out thefts which were alleged to have been committed from the Louisville & Nashville Railroad cars. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Upon the introduction of the plaintiff as a witness in his own behalf, and after testifying that he had arrested three parties for theft from the cars, and had in his possession goods which had been stolen, and that he had gone to one of the employes of the defendant to have the goods identified, the plaintiff's attorney then propounded this question to him: "State what goods, if any, he identified,"—meaning the employe of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. The defendant objected to this question, and excepted to the court's overruling his objection. It was shown by the plaintiff that the said employe of the defendant identified two pairs of shoes, and that the parties he had arrested were convicted in the criminal court. The employe of the defendant who identified the two pairs of shoes testified that they bore the same mark of some other shoes which were found in a car of the Georgia Pacific Railroad Company, which had been turned over to them when the said car was opened, and that an "exception" against the Georgia Pacific had been made for the shortage of said shoes. The defendant introduced in evidence the record of the criminal court, which showed that the parties whom the plaintiff had arrested were convicted in that court for burglary from the Georgia Pacific cars, and for stealing property which belonged to the Georgia Pacific Railroad Company. The plaintiff then introduced in rebuttal a letter written him by W. M. Newbold, superintendent of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, as follows: "Yours of the 16th received. I cannot find any proof of any of the car breakers you mention having broken into our cars, or stolen our goods. Please furnish me with this proof, which I will have to have before paying any bill."

Hewitt, Walker & Porter, for appellant.

COLEMAN, J. This is an action in assumpsit under a contract of employment for personal services. The parties differ as to some of the material stipulations, but agree in an important statement as to the inducement which led to the formation of the contract. The plaintiff, Morgan, testifies as follows: "I went to Mr. Newbold, superintendent of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and told him I had caught on to some stealing from the Louisville & Nashville cars, and he said, if I would go to work on the case, he would pay me what it was worth." Mr. Newbold testified "that in September or August last the plaintiff came to me and stated that he had caught on to some stealing from the Louisville & Nashville Railroad cars, and asked me what I would be willing to do about it. I told him [he says] if he caught any one stealing from our cars, and restored the property to us, and it was identified, and if he caught the thieves, and got them convicted, I would pay him what was reasonable." The material difference as to the terms of the contract as stated by the contracting parties consists in the plaintiff's claim to compensation for services rendered, without reference to the result of the services to be performed, while the defendant insists that the compensation depended upon the recovery and restoration of the property and the conviction of the thieves by the plaintiff. Whether the one or the other gives the true version of the contract in this respect, it is evident that both understood the contract of employment was entered into with reference to a larceny from the Louisville & Nashville Railroad cars. This is manifest, not only from the statement of both witnesses, but, as confirmatory of this view, the plaintiff called upon the defendant's agent to identify the recovered property. There is nothing in the record which would authorize the conclusion that Newbold, the superintendent of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, would have employed the plaintiff to work on a case of larceny from the cars of the Georgia Pacific Railroad Company. We have examined the record very carefully, and we find no satisfactory evidence to show that the goods recovered were stolen from the cars of the defendant. It is clear that the parties arrested by plaintiff were tried and convicted of burglary of the cars of the Georgia Pacific Railroad Company. It is not pretended that any of the goods recovered were taken from the cars of the defendant, except two pairs of shoes, and the proof shows, without serious contention, that the box of shoes delivered by the Georgia Pacific Railroad Company to the defendant, in which were shoes of a similar brand to those stolen, was checked "short" when delivered to the defendant, and an exception for the shortage was made against the Georgia Pacific Railroad Company at the time of the delivery of the box of shoes. If this evidence be true, and we find nothing in the record which conflicts with it, or which would justify us in discrediting it, the plaintiff has failed to lift the burden which the law imposes upon every suitor to prove his case.

We do not see how the letter of Newbold of September 17, 1890, in any way, in its legal effect, is at variance with the contract as testified to by him.

We think the grounds of objection to the question, "State what goods, if any, he identified," not tenable, and there was no error in overruling the objection. The plaintiff applied to the superintendent for a proper person to identify the property, who referred him to another. This person took the plaintiff to Mr. Weaver, who was at work at the freight depot, as the proper person to make the identification of the property, and Weaver's own testimony shows he was the proper person. A part of the evidence of the plaintiff as to what Weaver said was mere hearsay, and if it had been objected to at the proper time no doubt would have been excluded, or it might have been introduced upon a proper predicate as contradictory or impeaching evidence. We do not think the evidence as it is stated in the record authorized a judgment for the plaintiff.

Reversed and remanded.

LADD v. SMITH.

TRUSTEES—ACTION ON BOND—FAILURE TO ACCOUNT FOR MONEYS ALREADY RECEIVED—PLEADING—DEMURRER—EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS WAIVED.

1. Since, under Code 1886, p. 791, in suits on bonds with conditions, it is only necessary to allege the date and execution of the bond; to set out the condition concisely; to allege that the condition of the bond has been broken by the defendants; to state concisely the breach or breaches complained of; and to conclude with the averment that the plaintiff has thereby suffered damage,—in an action against a surety on a bond alleged to have been given by "L., as trustee under the will of C., in the chancery court of M. county," it was sufficient to aver that he had broken a condition thereof by failure to pay over moneys to said court in obedience to its orders, without showing the authority of said court to make such orders, when L., by his bond as executor, was required to account to the probate court.

2. In an action against a surety on two bonds given by L., as executor and trustee, respectively, a demurrer addressed to the sufficiency of the averments of the complaint as to the executor's bond, only, was properly overruled.

3. Defendant could not have been prejudiced by an adverse ruling on such demurrer, when the executor's bond was not offered in evidence, and there was no recovery thereon.

4. Where a trustee's bond was conditioned that he should "account and pay over all moneys received by him as trustee, and as ordered by" the court, liability attached upon his failure to pay over and account for moneys received before its execution.

5. Objections to evidence are waived unless made when it is introduced.

6. Where, in an action against a surety on a trustee's bond, the uncontroverted evidence showed a breach of the bond, and that plaintiff had suffered damage in a sum greater than the amount of the bond, the court properly directed a verdict for the entire penalty.

Appeal from circuit court, Mobile county; WILLIAM E. CLARKE, Judge.

Action by Daniel E. Smith, trustee, etc., against John M. Ladd, surety on certain bonds executed by Edwin C. Lyles, as executor and trustee of the estate of Frank Conlan, deceased. The latter died, having made a will, which was duly admitted to probate. Edwin C. Lyles, one of the three executors appointed in said will, qualified as such, and undertook to administer the said estate, the other named executors refusing to qualify, or resigning. Lyles afterwards filed a bill in the chancery court, and had the administration of said estate removed into that court. By a decree of that court on February 4th, the said E. C. Lyles was required to execute a bond, as trustee, in the sum of $5,000. Lyles continued to administer the estate until he sold the real estate and converted the property into money, after which time he left the state. Mrs. Conlan, widow of deceased, having dissented from the will of her husband, and having had her dower and such portion of the personal estate as she was entitled to given her, steps were taken on behalf of the minor children to have an account of said Lyles, as trustee, stated, and to have the trustee removed. Subsequently Daniel E. Smith, plaintiff in this suit, was appointed trustee to succeed Lyles. After the register made his report, as ordered by the chancellor, a final decree was rendered, fixing the amount due by said Lyles at the sum of $5,889.15. This decree also contained the following order: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the present trustee, Daniel E. Smith, have and recover from the said Edwin C. Lyles the sum of five thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine dollars and fifteen cents, for which let execution issue. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that, upon the return of an execution against Edwin C. Lyles of no property found, then said Daniel E. Smith, as trustee in this court of the will of Frank Conlan, deceased, shall bring suit against William Turner and J. M. Ladd, or either of them, the sureties of said Edwin C. Lyles on his bond given as trustee." Execution was issued against said Lyles in conformity with the said decree, but the sheriff, being unable to find any property of said trustee, made a return of the execution "No property found." Thereupon the said D. E. Smith, as trustee, brought the present action. The complaint is in the following language: "The plaintiff, as trustee of the estate of Frank Conlan, claims of the defendant five thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine 12-100 dollars for the breach of the condition of two bonds made by said defendant as surety on the bond of Edwin C. Lyles, executor and trustee under the will of Frank Conlan; one bond made by Edwin C. Lyles, as principal, with John M. Ladd and others as his sureties, on the 9th day of December, 1876, with condition that said Lyles shall faithfully execute and perform all the duties imposed upon him as executor of the last will and testament of Frank Conlan, deceased; the other bond made on the 8th day of February, 1886, by Edwin C. Lyles, as trustee under the will of Frank Conlan in the chancery court of Mobile county, with John M. Ladd and others as sureties on said bond, with condition that said Edwin C. Lyles shall faithfuly execute and perform all the duties of the trust imposed upon him, and obey the orders of the chancery court in respect to said trust, and account and pay over all moneys received by him as trustee, and as ordered by that court. The plaintiff says that the conditions of these bonds have been broken by the defendant, in this: That said Edwin C. Lyles failed to pay over all moneys received by him, and as ordered by the chancery court; that, by a decree of the said chancery court, made on the 18th day of June, 1890, said Edwin C. Lyles was decreed to be indebted to plaintiff, as trustee of the estate of Frank Conlan, deceased, in the sum of five thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine 15-100 dollars, which he has failed and refused to pay. Execution of said decree has been issued out of the said chancery court for Mobile county, and been placed in the hands of the sheriff of Mobile county, against said Edwin C. Lyles, and has been returned into said chancery court with the sheriff's return of 'No property found.' Said decree, with interest thereon, still remains unpaid, to the damage of the plaintiff, as above stated." The defendant demurred to the complaint on the grounds—First, that it shows that one of the bonds sued on was given by said Lyles, as executor of the estate to said

Conlan, to the judge of probate of Mobile county, and there is no allegation that there was any decree in the probate court against Lyles, as executor, which would authorize the suit against the defendant and the sureties on his bond as such executor; second, that there was nothing in the complaint showing what authority the chancery court had to order Lyles, as executor, to pay over the moneys, when, by his bond as executor, he was required to account to the probate court; third, that as the only indebtedness shown by the complaint is through Lyles, as trustee, there is no proper allegation of any breach of his bond as executor; fourth, that it does not appear in the complaint that there has been any breach by Lyles of his bond as executor. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Overall & Bestor, for appellant. Thos. H. Smith, for appellee.

WALKER, J. As to the bond of Edwin C. Lyles, as trustee, upon which the defendant is sued as surety, the complaint is in substantial compliance with the Code form for complaints on bonds with conditions. Code 1886, p. 791.[1] "In suits on bonds with conditions, ordinarily it is only necessary to allege the date and execution of the bond by the defendants; to set out the condition in hæc verba, or in substance; to allege that the condition of the bond has been broken by the defendants; to state concisely the breach or breaches complained of; and to conclude with the averment that the plaintiff has thereby suffered damage." Dothard v. Sheid, 69 Ala. 185. As to the bond above mentioned the complaint fully comes up to the requirements just stated. There is no merit in the second ground of demurrer, which is the only one addressed to the averments of the complaint so far as this bond is concerned. As to the other three grounds of demurrer it is enough to say that they do not answer the whole complaint. They go only to the sufficiency of the complaint as to the bond given by Lyles as executor. A demurrer to an entire complaint which is not an answer in law to the whole of it is properly overruled. Kennon v. Telegraph Co., 92 Ala. 399, 9 South. Rep. 200. Furthermore, the defendant could not have been injured by the ruling on the demurrer, so far as it touched only the claim on the executor's bond, as that bond was not offered in evidence, and there was no recovery thereon. The bond given by Lyles, as trustee, recited the decree of the chancery court in obedience to which it was given. This bond was executed and approved on the 8th day of February, 1886, and the condition thereof was in the following words: "Now, therefore, if the said Edwin C. Lyles shall faithfully execute and perform all the duties of the trust imposed upon him, and obey the orders of this court in respect to said trust, and account and pay over all moneys received by him as trustee, and as ordered by this court, then these premises are to cease, determine, and be void; otherwise to be and remain in full force and effect." On July 10, 1889, a decree was rendered in the cause in which the bond was given charging Lyles, as trustee, "with the sum of five thousand five hundred and thirteen 74-100 dollars, from and on the 4th day of May, 1889." On December 5, 1889, Lyles was removed as trustee, and on January 15, 1890, Daniel E. Smith, the plaintiff in this suit, was appointed trustee to succeed him. On June 18, 1890, a decree was rendered against Lyles in favor of his successor in the trust for the sum of $5,889.15, and execution was ordered to issue thereon. An execution on this decree has been returned "No property found." The record evidence disclosing the facts here summarized was admitted without objection on the part of the defendant, and was wholly uncontroverted. The failure of Lyles to satisfy the decree rendered against him was a breach of the condition of the bond, as it was a failure on his part to obey an order of the chancery court in respect to the trust, and to pay over, under an order of the court, money received by him as trustee. These defaults were clearly covered by the bond, and occurred after it was given, and while it was in force. There is nothing in the terms of the instrument to confine the responsibility of the sureties to defaults of the principal in reference to orders or decrees for the payment of money received by him after the date of the bond. Such orders or decrees, whether in reference to money received by the trustee before or after the execution of the bond, are clearly within its terms. No objection was made to the introduction in evidence of either of the decrees because of the failure to prove the register's report upon which it was predicated. Conceding that there would have been merit in such an objection, it was waived by the failure to suggest it. The uncontroverted evidence clearly showed a breach of the condition of the bond of Lyles, as trustee, and that the damage amounted to more than the sum in which the defendant was bound as surety. The general affirmative charge to find for the plaintiff for the whole amount of the penalty of the bond was properly given. Affirmed.

[1] Following is the form given by Code 1886, p. 791, for the complaint in an action on a bond with condition, omitting title of cause: "The plaintiff claims of the defendant —— dollars for the breach of the condition of a bond, (or agreement, as the case may be,) made by the defendant on the —— day of ——, payable to the plaintiff, in the sum of —— dollars, with condition, (here state the condition concisely.) And the plaintiff says the condition of the said bond (or agreement) has been broken by the defendant, in this, (here state concisely the breaches complained of, first, second, third, etc.,) to the damage of the plaintiff, as above stated. TYGH et al. v. DOLAN.

PROBATE PRACTICE—ALLOTMENT TO WIDOW IN LIEU OF HOMESTEAD—JURISDICTION.

1. Where after commissioners appointed by the probate court, on application of the widow to allot to her lands in lieu of homestead exemption, have made the allotment and reported to the court, and persons interested in the estate afterwards file exceptions thereto, a plea to the jurisdiction of the probate court, on the ground that the chancery court has assumed jurisdiction of the administration, need only state that a bill invoking the jurisdiction of the chancery court has been filed therein, and that the court has assumed the exercise of such jurisdiction; whether or not the bill is sufficient to that end being a question which will arise on the trial of the plea.

2. Where a bill has been filed in the chancery court invoking its jurisdiction in the administration of an estate, and a cross bill is filed asking affirmative relief, cross complainants, on afterwards seeking relief as to the estate in the probate court, are not in a position to deny the general jurisdiction of the chancery court, and to claim that the probate court has jurisdiction.

3. Where a bill is filed in the chancery court invoking its jurisdiction in the administration of an estate for any purpose, that court has jurisdiction for all purposes, and though the bill does not specifically ask the court to take control of that part of the administration having reference to the setting apart of lands in lieu of homestead to the widow, it acquires such jurisdiction, and the probate court has no jurisdiction thereafter to hear exceptions to a report of commissioners appointed by it setting apart such lands.

Appeal from probate court, Mobile county; PRICE WILLIAMS, Judge.

Mary Dolan filed an application in the probate court wherein she represented that her husband, Thomas Dolan, died without leaving a homestead exempt to her, and that he left other property, out of which she claimed the right to have property assigned to her in lieu of homestead exemption, and prayed the court to appoint commissioners as provided by law. Thereafter commissioners were appointed, and set apart certain property to her as exempt, in lieu of homestead. Within the time prescribed by law, Mary Tygh and others objected to said allotment, and filed exceptions to the report of the commissioners, and the same were set for hearing before the judge of the probate court. Afterwards the widow filed a plea to the jurisdiction, for the reason that jurisdiction had been assumed by the chancery court of the settlement of the estate of Thomas Dolan, deceased, including the hearing of said exceptions. A motion to strike the plea from the file was overruled, as was also a demurrer to the plea. Issue was joined on the replication to the plea, and the court, after hearing the evidence, sustained the plea, and refused to hear the exceptions. Mary Tygh and others appeal. Affirmed.

W. E. Richardson and Thos. H. Smith, for appellants. H. Taylor, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. It cannot be doubted that the plea to the jurisdiction of the probate court was sufficient to present the issue whether the chancery court had taken jurisdiction of the administration of Thomas Dolan's estate. All that is necessary to such a plea, we apprehend, is that it should state the facts that a bill invoking the jurisdiction of the chancery court has been filed therein, and that court has assumed the exercise of such jurisdiction. Whether the bill to that end is sufficient is a question which properly arises on the trial of the plea. It cannot be necessary that such plea should set out the bill in extenso; and to hold the plea here insufficient would logically lead to such requirement There was no error in the rulings of the lower court on the motion and demurrers, which were addressed to the sufficiency of the plea.

The only other action of the probate court which this record presents for review is its judgment sustaining the plea on the evidence. And the only argument made against the correctness of that action really admits that the chancery court had acquired control of the administration generally, and thereby ended the jurisdiction, in a general sense, of the probate court. Indeed, the appellants, having themselves not only submitted to, but affirmatively invoked, the interposition of equity by a cross bill, were in no position to deny the general jurisdiction of the chancery court. But the contention is that the bill does not specifically pray the chancery court to take control of that part of the administration having reference to the setting apart of lands in lieu of homestead to the widow, and hence that as to that matter the jurisdiction of the probate court remained intact. If it were conceded that the bill made no reference to this particular part of the administration, the conclusion sought to be drawn from that fact cannot be sustained. It needs no argument and no citation of authority to show that the setting apart of homestead, or lands in lieu of homestead, is as much a part of the administration of an estate—as much in the way of settling the affairs of the decedent and disposing of property left by him as the law prescribes—as any other act the personal representative and the courts may do in the administration. And when an administration is removed into the chancery court for any purpose or in any part, it is there in whole and for all purposes. There can be no splitting up of an administration any more than of any other cause of action; it is one proceeding throughout, in a sense, and the court having paramount jurisdiction of it must proceed to a final and complete settlement.

But aside from the consideration that the argument for appellants is addressed solely to the proposition that a part of the administration—that part which they desired the probate court to act upon—was not removed into the chancery court, and looking to the bill to determine whether that court really had jurisdiction at the time the probate court so held, the conclusion must be that the ruling assigned as error was proper. The bill makes a case in respect of the widow's dower right of which the probate court has no jurisdiction. It alleges that dower cannot be assigned by metes and bounds, and thus makes a case for exclusive equity jurisdiction. Wood v. Morgan, 56 Ala. 397. There is no error in the record, and the judgment of the probate court is affirmed.

WARREN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. ——, 1892.)

CARRYING CONCEALED WEAPONS—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

One who carries a pistol concealed in a satchel supported and carried by a strap over his shoulder is guilty, under an act making it unlawful to carry a weapon "concealed about the person," and the fact that the satchel is locked, and cannot be opened without the key, which he has in his pocket, is immaterial.

Appeal from city court of Mobile; O. J. SEMMES, Judge.

Jack Warren was convicted of carrying a weapon concealed about his person, and appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MCCLELLAN, J. This appeal is from a judgment of conviction of the offense of carrying a weapon concealed about the person. The evidence was, without conflict, to the effect that the defendant carried a pistol concealed in a small hand satchel, which was supported and carried by means of a strap which passed over his shoulder. Manifestly, the weapon was being carried about the person, in the sense of moving with the person, and this is the test by which that question is determined; and being confessedly concealed, the offense was complete. Diffey v. State, 86 Ala. 66, 5 South. Rep. 576; Ladd v. State, 92 Ala. 58, 9 South. Rep. 401. It is of no consequence whether a pistol, so carried, is of easy and ready access to the person carrying it. The statute denounces the act of carrying a weapon concealed about the person, irrespective of any consideration as to the ability of the person to readily avail himself of and use it. The fact, therefore, that defendant's satchel was locked, and could not be opened without the key, which he had in his pocket, is of no importance in this case. The action of the court in giving the general affirmative charge for the state, which is the only matter presented for review, was free from error, and the judgment is affirmed.

MOBILE & BIRMINGHAM RY. CO. v. WORTHINGTON.

CONTRACTS — ACTION FOR BREACH — EVIDENCE — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. Since Act Feb. 22, 1887, (Sess. Acts, 126,) providing that the court in term time may fix the time within which bills of exceptions may be signed, also provides that "the judge in vacation may, for good cause, extend the time fixed in term time," and is silent as to the manner of showing or authenticating the judge's order of extension, a purported copy of the judge's order of extension, embodied by the clerk in the transcript, will be regarded as prima facie correct.

2. In an action against a railroad company for breach of a contract with plaintiff by which he was to erect certain trestles for defendant, where plaintiff alleges that, after doing part of the work, he was prevented by defendant from doing the balance, and was put "to great expense and trouble in the maintenance of necessary teams," and where the bill of particulars gives notice of items of corn, etc., for which compensation is claimed, defendant cannot object to evidence on the part of plaintiff that teams were necessary in order to do the work required by the contract on the ground that there is no such specification in the bill of particulars, since the pleadings and bill give it sufficient notice of the claim to prevent surprise.

3. In an action against a railroad company for breach of a contract with plaintiff by which he was to erect certain trestles for defendant, defendant denied any contract with plaintiff, claiming that it had contracted for the entire work with one P., and that the work plaintiff did was done under P.'s contract, or by permission of P. The evidence as to whether there was an independent contract with plaintiff was conflicting. Held, that a letter written by P. to plaintiff in regard to his settlement with defendant was not admissible on behalf of plaintiff against defendant.

4. In such case evidence of what P. told defendant, while settling with it, in relation to his contract with plaintiff, and the extent of his authority to represent him, was admissible as original testimony as part of the res gestæ.

5. In such case testimony of defendant's engineer, with whom plaintiff claimed to have made the contract, that plaintiff "never gave any bond or security to the company, because they were only demanded where contracts were made, and no contract was ever made with him," was admissible as tending to show whether there was a concluded contract with plaintiff, and its exclusion was error.

6. It was error, in such case, to strike out the testimony of defendant's engineer, with whom plaintiff claimed to have made the contract, that the contract was given by P to plaintiff at witness' special request, and because of his previous negotiations with plaintiff; that the amount of work done for P. by plaintiff was the identical amount of work that plaintiff would have done for the company had the company contracted directly with him, instead of with P., and that plaintiff's extra claim was, from an engineering standpoint, preposterous.

7. In such case it was error to exclude testimony that, while plaintiff was working on the trestle, P. gave him instructions, and that plaintiff made no objections, since it would tend to prove defendant's contention that plaintiff was a subcontractor under P., and not an independent contractor with defendant, as claimed by him.

8. In such case the publication for bids for the work was competent evidence for either party,—for plaintiff, because it gave no notice that contracts, to be binding, had first to be submitted to and approved by defendant's president, and for defendant, because it notified bidders that security would be required,—it appearing that plaintiff did not give security for the performance of his alleged contract.

9. The fact that a publication for bids to do work for a railroad company gave notice to bidders that they would be required to give security for the performance of contracts is not conclusive against the existence of a contract claimed to have been made with the company by one who did not give such security, since the jury may find that security was waived by the company.

Appeal from city court of Mobile; O. J. SEMMES, Judge.

Action by Charles M. Worthington against the Mobile & Birmingham Railway Company, for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

This suit was commenced on July 27, 1888, by the appellee, Charles M. Worthington, against the appellant, the Mobile & Birmingham Railway Company, to recover $18,144.52, as damages for the breach of an alleged contract, which was, in substance, as follows: That, in consideration of the plaintiff's agreeing to do the work mentioned, the railway company would allow him to do the work of constructing trestles over Lewis' and Bassett's creeks and the Bigbee river, on the line of the railroad which the defendant was then preparing to construct between Mobile and Jackson, Ala., and points beyond, which works the railway company guaranteed would average 3,000 feet, board measure, to the "bent;" the railway company to furnish all material and lumber necessary for the construction of the trestles, and to cut the piles, and to level them up to the road level for the superstructure; also, that the defendant would furnish said foundations and lumber and material necessary in time to enable the plaintiff to commence work on November 15, 1886; and would pay plaintiff $9 per thousand feet, board measure, for said work, and a reasonable sum for all other such work as would be performed by plaintiff at the request of defendant. The plaintiff then averred in his complaint that he has been ready and willing to comply with the contract on his part, but that the defendant has failed to comply in several particulars, as follows: First, it has failed and refused to furnish plaintiff the larger portion of said work which it had contracted to so furnish, and refused to permit him to perform the same; second, it has failed to furnish the lumber and material at the time it had contracted to furnish the same, thereby postponing the plaintiff, and putting him to great expense and trouble in the maintenance of necessary teams, and maintenance and compensation to his laborers; third, that it has failed and refused to pay the plaintiff the $9 per thousand feet for the work specified in the contract, and the reasonable compensation for such work as was done by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant, and which was not specified in said contract; fourth, that it wholly failed and refused to furnish to the plaintiff the necessary timber and material to enable him to perfect the larger portion of the work specified in said contract; fifth, that it otherwise hindered, delayed, and prevented plaintiff in the performance of said work, to the great damage of plaintiff. The plaintiff also claims a like sum under the common counts,—upon account stated, for work and labor done, for money paid by plaintiff for the defendant, and upon open account. The defendant filed two pleas in abatement, setting up in abatement to the whole cause the fact that Thomas P. Miller & Co. had obtained a large judgment against the plaintiff in the chancery court of Mobile, and had had issued thereon garnishment, which had been served upon the defendant prior to the bringing of this suit. The plaintiff demurred to each of these pleas, but, this court not considering the rulings of the lower court upon these pleas and the demurrers thereto, it is not deemed necessary to set them out in full in this statement of facts.

The testimony set out in the bill of exceptions is very prolix, but it is not considered necessary, under the decision of this court, to state all of the exceptions to the rulings on the testimony, or to copy any of the charges given and refused. The claim of the plaintiff, as shown by the evidence introduced in his behalf, may be summarized as follows: That he had made a verbal contract with the railway company for the construction of 2,321 "bents" of trestle work, which would contain a guarantied average of 3,000 feet, board measure; that he was to be paid therefor at the rate of $9 per thousand feet, or an aggregate of $62,667; that this contract as made with one Patton, the chief engineer of the road, and that, after entering into the contract, the plaintiff was ready and willing to do the work, and that the railway company, in violation of the said contract, made another contract with one J. W. Putnam to build these trestles, and had changed the character of the trestles; that he, the plaintiff, did, in fact, build a great deal of the superstructure on the trestles, Putnam having built the pile foundations, and was paid by Putnam at the rate of $9 per thousand feet, board measure, as far as the same was allowed to Putnam in the estimates of the engineers. The plaintiff claims damages for the failure of the company to execute its contract with him, and claims a profit of $4 per thousand feet, board measure, upon the amount of framing which he was to have done on the frame trestle work as originally contemplated in said contract, deducting the number of feet of framing on superstructure upon the trestle work for which he actually received pay. He also claims for loss of time, and extra expenses for delays, and for doing additional work as directed by defendant. In detailing the statement of Patton out of which plaintiff seeks to show his contract, he stated that the agreement was to be in writing, but it never had been reduced to writing. It is also shown that there was no discussion, statement, or agreement as to the details of the work; nor was there any bond entered into to secure the faithful performance on the part of plaintiff. The railway company, for its defense, denies that it ever made any contract with Worthington, or ever intended or contemplated making such a contract as is alleged in his complaint, and as shown by the testimony; that Patton, the chief engineer, had several conversations with Worthington, who had desired a contract upon the road, and in which the said Patton said that he thought the company would be able to give him some work when they got in a position to know what they wanted; that Worthington was known then to be largely insolvent, and irresponsible as a contractor for so large an undertaking; that after the company had determined what was needed it made a contract with one J. W. Patton for the trestle work, and that Patton, in order to assist Worthington, arranged the contract with Putnam so that he should let Worthington have the framing of the superstructure of the trestles over Lewis' and Basset's creeks, and for this Putnam paid Worthington the sum of $9 per thousand feet; that this agreement between Patton and Putnam was made known to Worthington, and he readily acquiesced therein; and for all of the work done by Worthington for Putnam the company, in its monthly estimates, allowed the same to Putnam; and that Putnam overpaid Worthington for such work. As to delays on account of defendant not complying with its alleged contract with plaintiff, the company disavows any contract with Worthington in reference to the building of the trestles in question, and the company further contends that it paid Putnam for this work that Worthington had done for Putnam, and Putnam had paid Worthington for more work than he had done, to the amount of several hundred dollars. The claim of the defendant is that Worthington, in his testimony, fails to show that there was any complete contract in the premises, and that he does not show an undertaking on the part of Patton, the chief engineer, to give him the contract, and that he does not show he bound himself to faithfully perform said contract, by the giving of a bond as was required, and he fails to show that the contract which he alleges was in contemplation and under negotiation was ever executed. The letter of March 22, 1888, which was introduced in evidence against the objection and exception of the defendant, was in the following language: "I succeeded in getting to a settlement with the R. R. people finally. They cut down more than I wished to stand, but I thought it better than a suit. In the items which I drew from your account, they paid me $3,290, which I place to your credit. They paid me on account of the work, and I will send you a statement upon what accounts they paid. They paid it without regard to you, ignoring you, except as a subcontractor. I am sorry that I could not get something more out of them. The item for taking out the timber to construct the new work should have been made out differently, and charged per thousand for the whole amount,—say $5.00 per M or such sum as you think it worth. I tried to get them to allow that price per M on 250,000, b. m. It leaves your claim for changing contract and giving you more expensive work to do as it stood before." There was a verdict and judgment thereon in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $9,807.97. The defendant brings this appeal, and assigns as error the various rulings of the lower court.

Gaylord B. Clark, Francis B. Clark, and J. M. Falkner, for appellant. Gregory L. & H. T. Smith, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. The motion to strike the bill of exceptions from the transcript must be overruled. The act of February 22, 1887, (Sess. Acts, p. 126,) which provides that the court in term time may fix the time within which bills of exceptions may be signed, contains the further clause that "the judge in vacation may, for good cause, extend the time fixed in term time;" but in no case to allow more than six months beyond the adjournment of the term at which the case is tried. The statute is silent as to the manner of showing or authenticating the judge's order of extension. Whenever, as in this case, the clerk embodies in the transcript what purports to be a copy of the judge's order of extension, we think it our duty to regard and treat it, at least, as prima facie correct.

The main purpose of this suit by Worthington was to recover damages of the railroad company for the breach of an alleged contract. Worthington claims to have been a bridge builder, and that he made a contract with Patton, the chief engineer of the road, to construct three trestles at or near certain named streams, to be crossed by the railroad track. The complaint contains a special count setting forth the alleged terms of the letting; avers that, although plaintiff "has at all times been ready and willing to comply with all the provisions of said contract on his part, and has so complied so far as he has been permitted so to do by the defendant, the defendant had failed to comply with the following provisions thereof." The complaint then assigns five several breaches, and among them the following: That "it has wholly failed and refused to furnish to the plaintiff the larger portion of said work, * * * and refused to permit him to perform the same. * * * It wholly failed to furnish the said timber and material, at the time that it had contracted to so furnish the same, and thereby postponed and delayed the plaintiff, and put him to great expense and trouble in the maintenance of necessary teams, and the maintenance and compensation of laborers. * * * It wholly failed and refused to furnish to the plaintiff the necessary timber and material to enable him to perform the larger portion of the work specified in the contract." The plaintiff also claimed that he had been permitted to do, and had done, some of the work contracted to be done, and had done other work outside of the contract which had been received; and the complaint contains common counts for the purpose of recovering for such work done.

The defendant demanded a bill of particulars under the statute, and one was furnished. Testimony was offered to prove that teams were necessary to do the work set forth in the complaint; and it was objected to as not specified in the bill of particulars. The objection was overruled, the testimony received, and this raises the first question we need consider. It is assigned, as part of one of the breaches of the special contract alleged to have been made, that defendant had put plaintiff "to great expense and trouble in the maintenance of necessary teams." There was some proof that teams were a necessary power in raising large timbers in the construction of trestles of the height here required. True, there was no testimony tending to show that 17 yokes of oxen were needed, but the record presents no ruling on that question. The bill of particulars gave notice of items of corn, oats, and bran consumed, for which compensation was claimed. These were suitable food for teams. The question propounded for and to plaintiff, as a witness in his own behalf, was as follows: "Explain whether or not it was necessary or proper to have teams up there to do anything on the work." Objected to, because not specified in bill of particulars, objection overruled, answered affirmatively, and exception reserved. We think there was nothing in this exception. Defendant had sufficient notice of this claim to prevent it from being surprised. Code 1886, § 2670; Robinson v. Allison, 36 Ala. 525; Fountain's Adm'r v. Ware, 56 Ala. 558.

Plaintiff offered in evidence a letter written by Putnam to himself, bearing date March 22, 1888. Defendant objected, and the objection was overruled, the court remarking that it was permitted to be put in evidence, "as it might tend to show whether or not Worthington knew that Putnam was making any settlement with the railroad company." Defendant then objected to each sentence of the letter separately, this objection was overruled, and separate exceptions reserved. The letter was read in evidence. Reserved as this exception was, it is probably our duty to treat it as a general exception to the whole letter. Maybury v. Leach, 58 Ala. 339. The most important issue of fact in this case, as developed in the pleadings and testimony, was whether Worthington had an independent contract with the railroad company to build the trestles, or whether he did what work he is shown to have done under Putnam's contract, or by permission of Putnam. Worthington testified that he made and concluded an independent contract with Patton, the chief engineer, to construct the three trestles. The special count in the complaint is framed on that basis, and claims damages for not being permitted to do the work. Patton denied making such contract with Worthington, and claimed that the only contract he concluded was with Putnam. In making settlements with Putnam he and his successors recognized him as contractor, and refused to recognize Worthington as a contractor, save as an employe under Putnam. On the issue of original contract vel non with Worthington, his testimony and that of the engineer were in direct conflict. It is claimed by the parties to these opposing versions that they were severally more or less corroborated by other testimony. This was purely a question for the jury. In settling with the railroad officials for work done under his contract, Putnam testified that he was not authorized to agree on a binding settlement of Worthington's claim, but was authorized to receive any amount the authorities would pay him for work done by the latter. Some moneys on this account were paid to, and received by, Putnam, and he testified that he subsequently accounted to Worthington for such collections. The witnesses were not agreed as to the nature of Putnam's settlement, whether it was entirely on his own account, as contractor to build the trestles, or in part as the representative of Worthington under the latter's independent contract. Extra work, not embraced in any original contract, had been done by Worthington, and there was no dispute about Worthington's right to be paid for that. The point we are now considering has nothing to do with the claim for such extra work. Presented before the court and jury as the issue of fact above stated appears to have been by the testimony, it may be that Putnam's letter to Worthington of March 22, 1888, would have been competent evidence for the defendant, if offered by it. It was not competent evidence for the plaintiff, and should have been excluded.

What Putnam testified he told the railroad officials while settling with them, in relation to his contract with Worthington, and the extent of his authority to represent him, was part of the res gestæ, —was original testimony, and rightly received, without any special predicate being laid for its introduction.

Patton, the engineer, on being asked whether a bond had been given by Worthington, answered: "Worthington never gave any bond or security to the company, because they were only demanded where contracts were made, and no contract was ever made with him." His testimony had been taken by deposition. This answer, on motion of plaintiff, was excluded from the jury, and defendant excepted. In this we think the city court erred. Whether he had given a bond or not was a circumstance the jury should know and consider, in determining whether there had been a concluded contract or mere negotiation looking to the formation of a contract. The balance of the answer had been previously deposed to by Patton, and it was no error to repeat it. Nor was it improper to state, as fact, that the company required bonds from contractors only.

The witness Patton gave two answers, each of which, on a separate motion of plaintiff, was stricken out, and exceptions severally reserved. The answers were as follows: The first answer: "This contract was given to Worthington by Putnam, at my special instance, and because of my previous negotiations with Worthington. The amount of work done for Putnam by Worthington on the trestles is the identical amount of work that he would have done for the company, had the company contracted directly with him instead of with Putnam for the framing, as he did all the framing that was to be done on the trestles." Second answer: "But, at all events, the entire claim is erroneous, if it pertains to the construction of the Bigbee river, Bassett's, and Lewis' creek trestles, or any part of them, as the entire work of those trestles was done under contract with Putnam, as far as the railroad company was concerned; and even Putnam himself would have no claim to these items. The claim is, from an engineering standpoint, preposterous." Patton was the chief engineer at the time the contract was let out. If Worthington was an original contractor, he made his contract with Patton, and no one else. He, Patton, testified that he negotiated with Worthington about the work; price per M feet was concurred in, but that no contract was consummated. (As to what constitutes a binding contract, see Rutledge v. Townsend, 38 Ala. 706.) He testified, further, that, when he let the contract to Putnam, he requested him to give to Worthington the construction of these trestles. In the first answer above he simply reiterated the manner in which he had said Worthington obtained the job on the trestles, and he then added that Worthington had done all the work on the trestles which he would have done if he had himself become the contractor with the company. There was certainly nothing illegal in this. It was all, in form, a statement of fact, although, to some extent, a collective statement. This is permissible, and, to avoid prolixity, frequently desirable. Pollock v. Gantt, 69 Ala. 373; Elliott v. Stocks, 67 Ala. 290. The second answer was but a repetition of the statement that the railroad's contract was with Putnam, not Worthington, with the superadded statement, as an engineer and expert, that a particular item, for which a separate charge was made, was improper, whether the work was done by Putnam or Worthington. The city court erred in each of these rulings. As we have said, an important issue in this case was whether Worthington was an independent contractor, or a subcontractor under Putnam. The witness Slaughter had, for a time, had some agency or supervision in connection with the erection of the trestles. In answer to a proper question he testified: "I certainly recollect he [Putnam] was giving him [Worthington] instructions." He was then asked this question "Did Mr. Worthington make any, and if so, what, objections in your presence to Putnam giving him instructions or directions about the manner of doing pile work at Lewis' creek, and about the manner of his doing the superstructure on that pile work,—the framing of the trestles?" On objection from plaintiff the witness was not allowed to answer this question, and defendant excepted. This was error. If Worthington submitted to direction and control at the hands of Putnam, it was, at least, a circumstance to be weighed by the jury in determining whether he was working under an independent contractor under Putnam.

The publication for bids was competent testimony for either party,—for the plaintiff, in that it gave no notice that contracts, to be binding, must first be submitted to and approved by the president of the railroad; for the defendant, in that it notified the bidders who were induced by it to make bids that "sufficient security to insure the prompt and proper execution of the work will be required." The answer to this question ought to have been received.

We consider it unnecessary to notice any other exceptions to rulings on testimony. The court affirmatively charged the jury, at the instance of plaintiff, "that a verbal contract is as valid and binding as a written contract." There were also two charges requested by defendant and refused, to the effect that there was not sufficient evidence in this case to authorize the jury to find a contract was made with Worthington to build the trestles. It was certainly one of the terms of the advertised letting that the contractor should give "sufficient security to insure the prompt and proper execution of the work." If, at the time of the interview between Patton and Worthington, that or any other term of the contract was left open for future agreement or action, then no contract was completely made and agreed on, and could not be, until Worthington executed the required security, or tendered its execution. Even if the negotiation had progressed so far that the terms were all agreed on, and Worthington was promised the job on his giving the required security, this would preclude him from maintaining an action for a breach of the contract, unless, within a reasonable time, he executed, or offered to execute, said security. This provision of the offer was inserted for the benefit of the railroad, and it was competent for that party to waive it. We cannot affirm, as matter of law, that it was not waived. We therefore hold that the plaintiff's failure to prove that the security was given or tendered was, at most, a circumstance to be weighed by the jury, in determining whether a concluded contract was agreed on with Worthington. Whenever, under the terms of the law, or of the agreement made, a writing is necessary to complete the contract, or to make it binding, it would be error to charge the jury that "a verbal contract is as valid and binding as a written one." But inasmuch as security could have been waived in this case, the only criticism the charge is subject to is that it did not take in all the bearings of the question. It may have presented a proper case for an explanatory charge, but the giving of it was not a reversible error. There is nothing in any of the charges given or refused which calls for a reversal. For the erroneous rulings on the admission of evidence, pointed out above, the judgment of the city court must be reversed. Reversed and remanded.

PER CURIAM. The bill of exceptions in this transcript is unnecessarily long. Let the judgment show that the appellee is taxed with only half the cost of copying the bill of exceptions in the transcript. The other half must be paid by the appellant.

JOSEPH v. HENDERSON.

WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—TRESPASS—ACTION ON THE CASE—PLEADING—POSSESSION OF ATTACHED PROPERTY.

1. A count, in a complaint for wrongful attachment, alleging that "plaintiff claims of defendant $5,000 damages for wrongfully taking the following goods and chattels, the property of plaintiff, viz., a stock of general merchandise formerly owned by A., consisting of dry goods, groceries, hardware," etc., in a certain town and building, is a good count in trespass, under the Code of Alabama.

2. The owner of goods wrongfully attached cannot maintain trespass therefor, where, at the time they were attached, they were not in his actual possession, but were in the possession of the sheriff, under prior attachments by other of his creditors.

3. The owner of goods wrongfully attached may maintain an action on the case for damages, though at the time of the attachment the goods were in the possession of the sheriff under prior attachments by other of his creditors.

4. Under Code, § 2956, providing that, in case of an attachment issued by a justice of the peace for an amount exceeding his jurisdiction, and not more than the amount of the penalty of the constable's bond, the justice may direct that it be executed by the constable, who shall return the same to the court to which it is returnable; and section 2958, providing for the sale of property levied on by order of the court, and that the proceeds of the sale shall be retained by the sheriff; and section 2959, authorizing the sheriff to sell property under certain conditions without an order of court,—property levied on by a constable, and delivered to the sheriff, is in the latter's possession as sheriff, and not as mere bailee of the constable, though the statute does not expressly direct the constable to turn the property over to the sheriff.

Appeal from circuit court, Randolph county; JAMES R. DOWDELL, Judge.

Action by Samuel Henderson against M. Joseph to recover damages for the alleged wrongful levy of an attachment upon a certain stock of goods. As originally filed, the complaint contained but one count, which was as follows: "The plaintiff claims of the defendant five thousand dollars damages for wrongfully taking the following goods and chattels, the property of the plaintiff, viz., a stock of general merchandise formerly owned by A. J. Langley & Bro., consisting of dry goods, groceries, hardware," etc., "in the town of Roanoke, and in the Dane Manly building." The complaint was afterwards amended by adding the two following counts: "(2) The plaintiff claims of the defendant the further sum of five thousand dollars, for this: that heretofore, to wit, on the —— day of ——, 1889, the defendant wrongfully caused an attachment sued out by himself against A. J. Langley & Bro. to be levied on a certain stock of goods in Roanoke, Ala., said stock being general merchandise, which was the property of the plaintiff; and plaintiff avers that said goods were at the time of said levy in the possession of the sheriff of said county under a prior attachment sued out by other parties, which had been levied on said goods. Plaintiff avers that, by reason of said wrongful levy of said defendant, said goods were lost to this plaintiff by the sale of said goods by the sheriff under defendant's attachment; wherefore he sues." "(3) The plaintiff further claims of the defendant five thousand dollars damages for the conversion by him on the —— day of ——, 1889, of the following chattels: Certain goods, wares, and merchandise which were in Roanoke, Ala., in a building known as the 'Manly Building,' the property of the plaintiff." Defendant demurred to the complaint as amended, on the grounds that there was a misjoinder of counts, in that the first and second counts were in trespass and case, and the third in trover, and that the counts did not sufficiently describe the property levied on; and that, under the facts stated in the second count, plaintiff was not entitled to recover the goods claimed to have been levied on at the instance of defendant; because it is alleged in said count that the goods were not in the possession of the plaintiff, but were in the custody of the law under a prior attachment, which had been levied on them. The first-mentioned grounds were sustained by the court, and the others were overruled. The plaintiff amended his complaint by striking out the third count thereof. It appeared from the pleadings that plaintiff was the assignee of A. J. Langley & Bro., who had made an assignment of their stock of goods to him for the benefit of their creditors; that at the time of the levy of the attachment at the suit of defendant the goods were not in the possession of plaintiff, but were in the hands of the sheriff, having been previously levied upon under writs of attachment issued at the suits of three several creditors of the firm of A. J. Langley & Bro.; and that while so in the possession of the sheriff, under the prior writs of attachment, the attachment, at the instance of defendant, was levied upon them, subject to the three prior attachments. From the rulings of the court on the demurrers, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. & E. M. Oliver, for appellant. N. D. Denson, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. The record brings up for review only the rulings of the trial court upon the pleadings. The complaint was amended by striking out the count in trover, leaving only the first and second counts of the complaint. The first count is in trespass, and in the usual form, as prescribed by the Code. All assignments as cause for demurrer to this count, or to the complaint as a whole, were properly overruled. There is some contention as to whether the second count is in case or trespass. Trespass and case may be joined under section 2673 of the Code. The averments of the second count show that the plaintiff was not in possession of the property, and did not have the right to the immediate possession when the levy complained of was made, but, whether in case or trespass, the demurrer to the second count raises the question as to its sufficiency to show a cause of action. A creditor who causes an attachment to be wrongfully levied upon property is equally guilty of a trespass as the officer who makes the levy. The second count does not negative the fact that the prior attachment sued out against A. J. Langley & Bro., and which was levied upon the stock of goods, the subject of controversy, was wrongfully sued out, or wrongfully levied upon the goods. Applying the rule that the pleadings must be construed strictly against the pleader, we are of opinion that this count shows that, the sheriff being rightfully in possession of the stock of goods by virtue of the prior levy at the suit of other creditors, the defendant sued out at his own instance an attachment against Langley & Bro., and wrongfully caused the same to be levied upon the goods in question, and had the goods sold under his attachment, to the damage of the plaintiff. The goods being in gremio legis, and plaintiff not being in actual possession, and not having the immediate right of possession according to the averments of his second count, he could not maintain trespass. Davis v. Young, 20 Ala. 151; Nelson v. Bondurant, 26 Ala. 341; Harmon v. McRae, 91 Ala. 409, 8 South. Rep. 548.

Will case lie against one who causes an attachment to be wrongfully levied upon goods which are in gremio legis? The ownership of the defendant debtor of his chattels is not divested by the levy of an attachment; the levy only creates a lien upon the property in favor of the plaintiff. Code, § 2957. The lien is dependent upon the judgment to be recovered, and when recovered it relates back to the levy.

Scarborough v. Malone, 67 Ala. 572; Cordaman v. Malone, 63 Ala. 556. Any loss or damage sustained by the owner, the result of neglect or misconduct on the part of the sheriff, or the wrongful act of any other person while the goods are rightfully in the possession and under the control of such sheriff as an officer of the court, may be recovered by the owner by an action on the case. Property claimed by a vendee of a defendant debtor, in some instances, may be rightfully levied upon at the suit of one creditor, and not subject to attachment at the suit of another person. When property of a defendant debtor is in the possession of the sheriff by virtue of a levy of attachment or execution, and subsequent writs of attachment or execution are received by him against the same defendant, returnable to the same court, and to which the property is liable, a second levy by the sheriff, and indorsement thereof on the writ subject to the prior levy, does not disturb or in any manner interfere with the custodia legis under the first levy. If the sheriff should undertake to displace or subordinate the prior lien secured by the first levy, he might render himself liable to the creditors holding the prior lien. 67 Ala. supra; 63 Ala. supra. This principle, however, is wholly unlike those in which, to prevent a conflict in the jurisdiction of different courts, it is held that property in gremio legis of one court cannot be seized under process of another court, or where replevy or other bonds have been executed by the defendant in the suit, or by a stranger, by which the actual custody of the property is taken from the officer, and placed in the possession of the obligors, and held upon condition that the property be returned, etc. In cases of the latter character, the property cannot be levied upon by attachment or executions against the original debtor or the claimant. The reasons are fully stated in the authorities cited. Rives v. Wilborne, 6 Ala. 38; Pond v. Griffie, 1 Ala. 678; Cordaman v. Malone, 63 Ala. 558; Kemp v. Porter, 7 Ala. 138; Dollins v. Lindsey, 89 Ala. 219, 7 South. Rep. 284; Harmon v. McRae, (Ala.) 8 South. Rep. 550. We are of opinion that the second count, when construed as an entirety, presents a complaint in case. True, the first clause would indicate an intention on the part of the pleader to count in trespass, but the further averments show that the injury complained of, and which damaged him, was the wrongful levy and sale of the property caused by the defendant under his attachment, while the property was rightfully in the possession of the sheriff under prior attachment. As we have seen, to recover damages sustained under such circumstances, case will lie.

Section 2956 provides, in cases of attachment issued by justices of the peace for an amount exceeding the jurisdiction of the justice, and not more than the amount of the penalty of the constable's bond, that the justice may, by indorsement on the process, "direct that it be executed by the constable of the precinct, who shall return the same to the court to which it is returnable." Section 2958 provides for the sale of the property levied upon by order of the court, and "the proceeds of the sale be retained by the sheriff," etc., and under section 2959 the sheriff is authorized to sell property under certain conditions without an order of court. We are of opinion that the property levied upon by the constable was properly delivered by him to the sheriff, and that when so delivered it was in his possession as sheriff, and not as a mere bailee to the constable. The statute does not expressly direct the constable to turn the property over in such cases to the sheriff, but a fair construction of the several statutes, and of the duties imposed upon the sheriff, and of the fact that the writ should be directed to the sheriff, lead to the conclusion that the authority of the constable in such cases ends when he delivers the property to the sheriff, and makes his return to the proper court. It is unnecessary to adjudicate in detail all the questions raised by the assignment of errors. We at first thought, and so stated, that the case ought to be reversed; but, after careful examination of the facts as stated in the pleadings, we are satisfied that the trial court held to the same conclusion reached by this court, and that his rulings are free from error.

SMITH v. DICK.

ASSUMPSIT—PLEADING—APPEAL—OBJECTIONS TO VERDICT.

1. Under Code, p. 792, which provides that, in an action on an account, the complaint shall allege that the claim is "for merchandise, goods, and chattels sold by the plaintiff to the defendant," a complaint was sufficient which alleged that plaintiff claimed "of defendant the sum of one hundred dollars for a mule that plaintiff sold to defendant."

2. A plea to such count, alleging that plaintiff gave defendant certain mules to sell, the profits arising therefrom to be divided between the parties, and that there had been no accounting between them, is insufficient on demurrer.

3. The objection that the amount of the judgment and verdict was more than the amount claimed in the complaint cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

Appeal from circuit court, Lee county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge.

Action by C. W. Dick against A. J. Smith on an account. From a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought by the appellee, C. W. Dick, against the appellant, A. J. Smith, and counted upon the common counts in the following language: "The plaintiff claims of the defendant the sum of one hundred dollars due on account stated before the commencement of this suit, on, to wit, the ——— day of February, 1888. The plaintiff claims of the defendant the sum of one hundred dollars for a mule that plaintiff sold to defendant." The suit was commenced in the magistrate's court, and was appealed to the circuit court by defendant. The defendant demurred to the first count of the complaint upon the ground that it did not aver the day upon which the account therein alleged was stated. The defendant also demurred to the second count of said complaint, on the grounds that it fails to show in what manner the defendant is liable in the sum claimed for the mule; second, that said count fails to aver that plaintiff sold the mule named therein for the sum claimed; third, that said count does not show that defendant was liable in the sum claimed for the mule mentioned in the count. The plaintiff was granted leave to amend his first count in the complaint, and the demurrers to the second count of the complaint were overruled. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and by special plea set up the defense that, by an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant, a certain number of mules were placed in the defendant's care for sale, with the understanding that, after the plaintiff paid back the purchase price of the mules, and the defendant was paid the expenses incurred in keeping them, the plaintiff and the defendant were to divide the net profits among themselves; and the defendant averred in the special pleas that there had not been any settlement of the profits between plaintiff and the defendant. The judgment entry recites that the plaintiff's demurrer to defendant's plea No. 4 was sustained, but the record does not contain the demurrer referred to. The judgment also recites that upon the jury finding for the plaintiff, and assessing his damages at $124, the court proceeded to render judgment for that amount against the defendant and the sureties on his appeal bond from the justice's court to the circuit court.

J. M. Chilton and S. O. Houstin, for appellant. T. L. Kennedy, for appellee.

WALKER, J. 1. The second count of the complaint follows substantially one of the Code forms for the common counts, the claim being for "one hundred dollars for a mule that plaintiff sold to the defendant." In one of the Code forms the language is, "for merchandise, goods, and chattels sold by the plaintiff to the defendant," etc. Code 1886, p. 792. "The declaration or statement in case of appeal from a justice of the peace is not subject to the technical rules of pleading. If it shows, in general terms, a debt due or contract to be performed, and a breach, it is sufficient." 1 Brick. Dig. p. 114, § 77; Telegraph Co. v. Meyer, 61 Ala. 158. Certainly, the second count of the complaint in this case conformed to this requirement, and the demurrer thereto was properly overruled.

2. The demurrer to the fourth plea is not copied into the record. When the grounds of the demurrer do not appear on the presumption in favor of the ruling of the primary court, its action in sustaining the demurrer will be affirmed, if there be any sufficient cause of demurrer. Sessions v. Boykin, 78 Ala. 328. The fourth plea was not an appropriate answer to the whole complaint. It was not so framed as to apply to the cause of action stated in the second count.

3. It is assigned as error that the judgment was for more than the amount claimed in the complaint, with interest thereon. The judgment was for the amount found by the verdict. The objection now urged was not made in the lower court. It cannot be made on appeal for the first time. The remedy in such case is by motion for a new trial in the court below, where the error may be cured by a release of the excess, or such other order made as the justice of the case may require. As the complaint contains a substantial cause of action, the judgment cannot be set aside for a matter not previously objected to. Code, § 2835; Ritch v. Thornton, 65 Ala. 310; Government Street R. v. Hanlon, 53 Ala. 70.

ATKINSON et al. v. JAMES.

ATTACHMENT—ISSUANCE BY CLERK—LANDLORD'S LIEN ON CROPS.

1. Code, §§ 2929, 2931, provide that any civil action may be commenced by attachment, and authorize a clerk of the circuit court to issue such attachment for the collection of "any moneyed demand," the amount of which can be certainly ascertained. But in actions to recover "damages for a breach of a contract, when the damages are not certain or liquidated," or when "the action sounds in damages merely," only the judge or chancellor can issue the attachment. Held, in an action to recover damages for the removal of four bales of cotton on which plaintiff held a landlord's lien for rent and advances, that the clerk had authority to issue an attachment.

2. Code, § 3056, provides that a landlord has a lien which is paramount to all other liens on the crops grown on rented lands for rent for the current year and for advances. Held, where W. was a tenant of plaintiff, and was indebted to him for rent and advances, and defendants knew of such tenancy, that they were charged with constructive notice of such indebtedness, and W.'s mortgage to defendants on such cotton for additional advances would not give them any right as against plaintiff.

3. The fact that the cotton was delivered to defendants in Georgia could avail them nothing.

Appeal from circuit court, Chambers county; JAMES R. DOWDELL, Judge.

Action on the case by Lee L. James against Atkinson & Turner to recover damages for the removal of four bales of cotton. From a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A demurrer was sustained to the defendants' plea in abatement. The testimony, as shown by the bill of exceptions, was that the plaintiff, James, rented a farm to one Frank Washington in the year 1890. On February 18, 1890, the defendants took a mortgage on the crop of said Washington, and in the fall of the year the defendants, who were residents of West Point, Ga., received from the said Washington four bales of cotton grown on the land, and applied it to the payment of said Washington's account, which was secured by the mortgage, as above stated. It was also shown that the defendant had notice that the said Washington was a tenant of the plaintiff, and that the cotton sold them by Washington was raised on the rented premises. The court, at the request of the plaintiff, gave the general affirmative charge in his behalf, to which the defendants duly excepted. Defendants also reserved an exception to the court's refusal to give the general affirmative charge in their favor.

M. D. Denson, for appellants. Wm. J. Sanford and Wm. H. Thomas, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. This is an action in case to recover damages against appellants for having purchased and removed four bales of cotton upon which the plaintiff held a landlord's lien for rent and advances. The suit was begun by attachment, issued by the clerk of the circuit court. The defendant pleaded in abatement that the clerk had no authority to issue the attachment. Under our statute, any civil action, whether arising ex contractu or in tort, under proper conditions, may be commenced by attachment. Code, § 2929. A clerk of the city or circuit court is authorized to issue the attachment "to enforce the collection of a debt, whether due or not," and for the collection of "any moneyed demand the amount of which can be certainly ascertained." When the action is to recover "damages for a breach of contract when the damages are not certain or liquidated," or when "the action sounds in damages merely," only a judge of the circuit court, probate judge, or chancellor has authority to issue the attachment. Code, §§ 2929, 2931. The term "moneyed demand" ordinarily is of comprehensive meaning, and may arise out of contract or breach of duty. Whether its collection be enforced by actions ex contractu or ex delicto does not alter its character as a moneyed demand for which an attachment will lie. The statute limits the authority of the clerk to issue attachments for a moneyed demand to cases in "which the amount can be certainly ascertained." The term "moneyed demand," as used in section 2789 of the Code,—which provides that, "if suit be brought on any moneyed demand for a less amount than that of which the court has jurisdiction, the suit must be dismissed," etc.,—was construed by this court many years ago in King v. Parmer, 34 Ala. 416, to apply only to actions ex contractu. In construing that section, the court stated the context controlled the meaning of the phrase, and in the opinion confined the definition given to the term to the section as there "employed." In the same case Chief Justice A. J. WALKER, arguendo, held that "moneyed demand," as used in section 2503, Code 1852, which is the same as section 2929 of the present Code, included trover, an action in tort. This decision was reaffirmed in Mills v. Long, 58 Ala. 458, and as there construed the act has been readopted into the present Code. Section 2934 of the Code provides that before an attachment shall issue to enforce the collection of a demand "for a breach of contract, when the damages are not certain or liquidated," or "when the action sounds in damages merely," an additional "affidavit in writing must be made of the special facts and circumstances," so as to enable the officer "to determine the amount for which a levy must be made," etc. In such cases the clerk has no authority to issue an attachment. Attachment may be issued in trover by the clerk, the recovery in such cases being clearly ascertainable from the value of material things. So in actions on the case, if in the particular action the character of the demand is such that the recoverable damages are fixed by a legal standard, such as are ascertainable from the value of material things, the clerk may issue the attachment. This is clearly the meaning of the statute, for it is provided in the third and fourth subdivisions of section 2929 "that, when the damages are not certain or liquidated," or when the "action sounds in damages merely," the clerk cannot issue the attachment, while it is expressly provided that to enforce legal moneyed demands, in all other cases, whether ex contractu or ex delicto, he may issue the attachment. The inquiry arises, does the law fix a legal standard for the admeasurement of damages "certainly ascertainable," when the action is in case to recover damages for the destruction of a landlord's lien upon property for rent and advances, which in the present case was four bales of cotton? The lien does not confer on the landlord a right of property or the right of possession, but simply a right to charge it with the payment of rent and advances. As was said in Westmoreland v. Foster, 60 Ala. 455, "it is simply a right to have so much money carried out of the proceeds. Trespass, detinue, or trover cannot be maintained on such a right." Hussey v. Peebles, 53 Ala. 435. The payment of the landlord's debt and interest extinguished both debt and lien. The property upon which the lien is given is a material thing, and its value ascertainable with legal certainty. No damages are recoverable over and above the value of the property upon which the lien existed, and this is limited by the amount of the debt for which the lien is given. The recovery, though the action is in case, is the same as where assumpsit is brought for money had and received, against one who has converted the crop into money with knowledge of the lien. Thompson v. Merriman, 15 Ala. 166; Westmoreland v. Foster, supra; Coffey v. Hunt, 75 Ala. 240. We are of opinion that the court ruled properly in sustaining the demurrer to the plea in abatement.

The facts show that defendants were nonresidents, merchants doing business at West Point, Ga., just across the state line, and only two or three miles from the land upon which the cotton grew. It is not controverted that Frank Washington, from whom the cotton was purchased, was indebted to plaintiff for rent and advances for the year 1890. It further appears that to obtain additional advances, on the 18th of February, 1890, Frank Washington executed a mortgage to defendants on his crop of cotton to be grown that year on lands in Chambers county, Ala. The evidence sufficiently shows that the defendants knew when they took the mortgage and made the advances to Frank Washington that he was a tenant of James, and that the crops mortgaged were to be grown on lands rented from James. In the fall of the year Frank Washington carried four bales of cotton, raised on the rented land, to West Point, in Georgia, and sold the same to defendants, the proceeds to be applied to the payment, and which were so applied, of the mortgage debt. It appears that the cotton was carried off and sold without the knowledge or consent of the landlord. Defendants admit that they knew that Frank Washington was a tenant of James, but deny that they had any notice or knowledge of the fact that Frank Washington had obtained advances from or was indebted to his landlord for advances. They claim to be innocent purchasers of the cotton after it was removed into the state of Georgia, for a valuable consideration, and without notice of the landlord's lien for advances.

A short and simple denial of notice of plaintiff's lien for rent and advances may be a mere conclusion, and, when the proven and admitted facts exclude the conclusion, the denial amounts to nothing as evidence. The only real question presented by the record is whether a person who, when he purchases a crop from one known to be a tenant, and knows that the crop was grown on rented land, is charged with constructive notice that the tenant owes his landlord for rent or advances or both, which is secured by the statutory lien, if in fact such an indebtedness exist. The statute of this state, as now framed, declares and defines the landlord's lien for rent and advances, and, as interpreted by the decision of this court, clearly establishes that a purchaser of a crop grown on rented land under such circumstances would be chargeable, at least, with constructive notice. It is true that some of the decisions referred to were made with reference to the lien for rent only, and before the statute had created the liens, as now framed, for advances. The statute now declares, (Code, § 3056:) "A landlord has a lien which is paramount to, and has preference over, all other liens on the crop grown on rented lands for rent for the current year, and for advances made in money, or other thing of value, * * * for the sustenance or well-being of the tenant or his family," etc. Whatever right a landlord may assert against one who deprives him of his lien for rent may be asserted and enforced against one who in the same manner interferes with his lien for advances. The common-law methods of distress for rent have been abolished in this state by statute, and the landlord may enforce his lien upon the property whenever found, although removed off the premises, except as against innocent purchasers. These conclusions are supported by the following authorities and others therein cited: Manasses v. Dent, 8 South. Rep. 108, 89 Ala. 565; Lomax v. Le Grand, 60 Ala. 537; Wilkinson v. Ketler, 69 Ala. 441, 442; Hussey v. Peebles, 53 Ala. 436; Boggs v. Price, 64 Ala. 519; Ex parte Barnes, 84 Ala. 540, 4 South. Rep. 769. The fact that the cotton was delivered to defendants in Georgia can avail them nothing. Having knowledge that the cotton was grown on rented land, they are charged with knowledge,—constructive notice of plaintiff's lien for rent and advances at the time of their purchase from his tenant. The price was credited upon a mortgage purporting to have been made in Alabama. It was recorded in Alabama, and the cotton was delivered and received according to the provisions of the mortgage contract. It would be a strange principle of law which would hold these defendants liable if the cotton had been purchased by them in Alabama, and removed by them into Georgia, and yet exempt them from liability by virtue of an arrangement made with the tenant by which the tenant delivered the cotton across the border of the state. We are not called upon to adjudicate what the rights of the parties would be if the present suit had been instituted in the state of Georgia. Plaintiff's rights are secured to him by a statute of Alabama. The property attached lies in Alabama, and the court had jurisdiction both of the person and property of the defendants. In such cases the rights and remedy are amply furnished by the law and courts of this state.

WADSWORTH v. GOREE.

APPEAL—TIME OF TAKING—INJUNCTION—TITLE TO LAND—EQUITY JURISDICTION.

1. Under Code, §§ 3611, 3612, 3619, declaring that an appeal may be taken from an order overruling a demurrer to a bill at any time within 30 days, and that if not taken error may be assigned on such ruling on an appeal within a year from the rendition of the final decree, a party who does not appeal within the 30 days, but who does appeal within the year after the final decree, is entitled to assign error not only on such decree, but on the order overruling the demurrer.

2. A bill which alleges that complainant, the owner of a sawmill, had acquired the legal title to land which was heavily timbered, and in the vicinity of the said mill, for the purpose of obtaining logs for his mill; that he had brought ejectment against defendant, who was cutting and removing the timber, but that, owing to the crowded state of the docket, the case would not be tried until the next term, and that by that time, if the defendant was not restrained, all the timber suitable for sawmill purposes would be taken,—makes a case for an injunction, since, although complainant might recover in an action at law for cutting and removing the timber, he could not recover for the loss to him of the use of the mill, or for the loss of the profit to be derived from converting the timber into lumber.

3. Where an action at law to recover land is brought by a person claiming the legal title against another also claiming the legal title, and before the case comes to trial a suit in equity is instituted to restrain waste, the title can be tried only in the action at law.

Appeal from chancery court, Elmore county; S. K. MCSPADDEN, Chancellor.

Bill by James L. Goree against W. W. Wadsworth to enjoin the defendant from cutting timber on lands alleged to be the property of the complainant. From a decree granting the relief asked, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Watts & Son, for appellant. Tompkins & Troy and W. P. Goddis, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. In Wadsworth's answer is embodied a demurrer to the bill for want of equity. That demurrer was set down for hearing, and a decretal order was rendered September 11, 1889, overruling the demurrer, and declaring the bill contained equity. No appeal was taken from that interlocutory order. On September 10, 1890, the chancellor rendered a final decree, granting relief to complainant, Goree, and perpetuating the injunction against Wadsworth. Wadsworth took the present appeal to this court December 8, 1890, more than 12 months after the decretal order was rendered overruling the demurrer to the bill. Appellant assigns as error, not only the decree granting relief to Goree, but the interlocutory decree overruling the demurrer to the bill. The appellee submits a motion to strike out the assignments which question the ruling on demurrer, "because it appears from the record that said decree upon which the same are based was rendered more than twelve months before the appeal was taken." It is very true that from the decretal order overruling defendant's demurrer to complainant's bill an appeal might have been prosecuted to this court at any time within 30 days after it was rendered. It is equally true that, if such appeal is not taken, then errors may be assigned on such ruling, if appeal be taken to this court at any time within one year from the rendition of the final decree. Code 1886, §§ 3611, 3612, 3619. There was no appeal taken from the decretal order overruling the demurrer to the bill, and it follows that movant can take nothing by his motion.

The bill charges that Goree is the owner, by legal title, of a tract of land, which it described; that the land is heavily timbered, the timbers being suitable for sawing into lumber, and that, with the exception of the timber, the land is of but little value; that he (complainant) is the owner of a sawmill in the vicinity of the land, and that he purchased the land for the purpose of obtaining such timber, to be used by him in the operation of said sawmill, the timber being necessary to complainant in the operation of his mill; and that, if he is deprived of the same, he will suffer great loss and damage, not only in the value of said timber, but in the great expense and trouble to which he will be put in order to obtain the necessary timber to operate his said sawmill. The bill further charges that Wadsworth, though notified of complainant's claim and right, and warned not to cut or remove the timber, is in possession of the land, persists in cutting and removing large quantities of timber therefrom, and, unless restrained, will soon cut and remove therefrom all timber suitable for sawmill purposes, to the irreparable injury of complainant. The bill then charges that complainant, Goree, has brought an action of ejectment against Wadsworth for the recovery of the land, but, owing to the crowded state of the docket, the case cannot be tried before the next term of the court; "and, if the said Wadsworth persists in cutting said timber, and removing the same from said lands, all that is suitable for sawmill purposes will be taken therefrom before orator will be able to obtain a trial of said ejectment cause." We have now stated briefly the substance of the averments on which the prayer for injunction was rested. It is not charged that Wadsworth was insolvent, or unable to respond in damages for any injury he might inflict. An injunction was granted, and one object of the demurrer, we presume, was to get rid of the injunction. It will be noted that this case is not rested on the right of a reversioner or remainderman to have the freehold preserved against waste or spoliation for his ultimate enjoyment. The complainant avers that the legal title is in him, and states a case which, if true, shows a present right in him to maintain ejectment or trespass for the redress of the wrong it is alleged he was being made to suffer. The ground of demurrer was and is that, complainant's alleged title being purely legal, and the wrong charged in the bill against defendant being a naked trespass, remediable by action at law, no reason is shown why the extraordinary process of injunction should be invoked and granted in this case. If the wrong charged be only a naked trespass, containing no elements of damage which cannot be redressed in an action at law, then this bill is without equity, and the demurrer should have been sustained. High, Inj. §§ 699, 713, 728; Thomas v. James, 32 Ala. 723; Brooks v. Diaz, 35 Ala. 599; Burnett v. Craig, 30 Ala. 135; Attaquin v. Fish, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 140. To justify injunction in such case, there must be something special in the case made, which a court of law cannot adequately redress. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1347; High, Inj. §§ 673, 699, 713; Lyon v. Hunt, 11 Ala. 295, 306. The case made by the bill, as we have seen, is that complainant is a mill owner; that the lands are in the vicinity of his mill; that there is an abundance of timber on the lands, suitable for saw logs; and that the chief value of the land consists in its abundance of timber that may be sawn into lumber. The inference from the averments of the bill is irresistible that, in acquiring said timber land, complainant's controlling motive and purpose were to obtain the timber, that he might convert it into lumber. This charge necessarily implies the loss to him of the use and enjoyment of his mill and its machinery, and all the profit to be derived from converting the timber into lumber. Can he obtain compensation for this loss in an action at law? In an action at law for cutting and removing the timber, complainant, if he have the legal title to the land, can sue and recover. What would be the measure of his recovery? True, in an action of trespass, he might, in the discretion of the jury, recover smart money, but the only actual damage he could claim would be the actual value of the timber as timber. We speak not of the statutory action provided for by sections 3296, 3297, of the Code. The injury suffered in being deprived of the profit to be derived from the conversion of the timber into lumber, or any other prospective enhancement of its value, would be classed as speculative, and not recoverable in an action at law. Pollock v. Gantt, 69 Ala. 373; Bank v. Jeffries, 73 Ala. 183; 3 Brick. Dig. p. 293, § 8. We think the bill makes a case for an injunction against cutting and removing the timber, pending the suit for the recovery of the land. Kane v. Vandenburgh, 1 Johns. Ch. 11, and note 1 N. Y. Ch. R. 10; Jerome v. Ross, 7 Johns. Ch. 315; 10 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 884, and note; Shreve v. Black, 4 N. J. Eq. 177; Chambers v. Iron Co., 67 Ala. 355; Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 537, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565, and other authorities on brief of appellee. The chancellor did not err in overruling the demurrer to complainant's bill.

In the case we have in hand the bill avers that Goree, the complainant, had instituted an action of ejectment against Wadsworth for the recovery of the lands, which was still pending and undetermined. The record nowhere informs us that any trial has been had of that suit at law, and we must infer from its silence that when the final decree was rendered in this case that action of ejectment had not been tried. It is shown in the record before us that each of the parties, Goree and Wadsworth, claims title to the land, and that whatever title either of them asserts is, in form, a legal title. The bill does not seek to have the question of title determined in the chancery court, and, if it did, it would probably, to that extent, be without equity. When opposing disputants each claims title which is legal in form, the general rule is that such issue can only be tried in a court of law; and to justify its trial and decision in a chancery court special circumstances must be shown, or the question of title must arise as an incident to some other controversy of equitable cognizance. No such case is shown in the present record. In fact the bill contains neither averments nor prayer to have the title passed on in the chancery court. Its whole scope and aim are to have Wadsworth restrained from wasting and destroying the timber, until the question of title is determined in the ejectment suit. A bill filed for such purpose is ancillary to the common-law action, and accomplishes the whole of its legitimate object when it prevents waste or spoliation pending the action at law. The chancellor erred in making the injunction perpetual; at least at that stage of the case. Jerome v. Ross, 7 Johns. Ch. 315, 2 N. Y. Ch. R. 313; 10 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 820, 821; Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 537, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565; Cornelius v. Post, 9 N. J. Eq. 196; Tainter v. Mayor, 19 N. J. Eq. 46; Ashurst v. McKenzie, 92 Ala. 484, 9 South. Rep. 262. The decree of the chancellor, making the injunction perpetual, is reversed. Let the injunction as first granted stand until the final disposition of the ejectment suit, and let the appellee pay the costs of the appeal.

Reversed and rendered.

Succession of COMSTOCK. (No. 11,005.)

EXECUTION AGAINST SUCCESSION REPRESENTATIVE —PRESUMPTIONS.

1. Execution can issue against a succession representative, who fails to pay a judgment creditor, only when he has funds in hand wherewith to discharge the debt, and does not do so, after due demand, and when proceedings have been previously instituted against him, culminating into a personal judgment against him, on which the writ can issue.

2. Courts of justice will not supply wanting proceedings, and assume the existence of facts which have no being.

ON REHEARING.

1. A judgment sustaining an opposition to an administrator's account, by which the opponent is decreed entitled to recover a sum of money due by the deceased, does not affect the personal liability of the administrator, who was in no way responsible for the debt; who was not asked to be, and was not, condemned to pay the amount.

2. The registry of such judgment in the mortgage records does not create a judicial mortgage against the administrator, whom it did not affect individually; and the judgment creditor is not entitled to any preference, by virtue of such pretended mortgage, out of the proceeds of the real estate of such administrator.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of East Feliciana; F. D. BRAME, Judge.

A. E. Comstock, as executrix of her husband, filed an account, which was opposed by H. B. Vaughn, who asked to be placed thereon for $4,097. His opposition was sustained. The executrix died, and her succession was opened by Vaughn, who was appointed to administer it. He rendered an account showing a balance of $2,199, which he proposed to apply to the payment of his judgment. D'Armond opposed. From a judgment sustaining this opposition, and rejecting Vaughn's claim, he appeals. Affirmed.

D. J. Wedge and Merrick & Merrick, for appellant. W. F. Kernan, for appellee.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. The question presented in this controversy involves the right claimed by the administrator of this succession to a judicial mortgage in his favor, in his individual name, on the real estate left by the deceased, and its proceeds. It appears that Mrs. Comstock, while acting as executrix of her husband, George C. Comstock, filed an account, which was opposed by H. B. Vaughn, who asked to be placed thereon for $4,097. His opposition was sustained for that sum, with interest on fractions of the same, from different dates, on June 30, 1885. This judgment was recorded in the mortgage records on the 3d of July following. Mrs. Comstock having died, her succession was opened by Vaughn, who was appointed to administer it. He subsequently rendered an account showing a a balance of $2,199, which he proposed to apply to the payment of his judgment; claiming that its registry gave him a judicial mortgage on her property and its proceeds. This pretension was opposed by one D'Armond, who claimed for himself a judicial mortgage, and denied any in favor of Vaughn. After hearing, the court sustained the opposition, and rejected Vaughn's pretension. Hence this appeal.

An inspection of the judgment in favor of Vaughn, from the registry of which he contends that a judicial mortgage was created in his favor against Mrs. Comstock and her real estate, shows that it is merely one in favor of Vaughn against the succession of Mrs. Comstock, and in no way one against Mrs. Comstock individually. The opposition does not charge her with any personal liability for the amount claimed. There was no contention on the subject, and therefore no judgment against her. There is no doubt that administrators may be held personally for omissions or commissions, in certain cases, but there must be charges in such instances; issues must be formed, and a personal responsibility fixed; none of which exists in the present litigation.

Judgment affirmed.

ON REHEARING.

Notwithstanding the protestations and assurances of the counsel for Vaughn, the court persists in affirming that the judgment, from the recording of which a judicial mortgage is claimed to have sprung, is not a personal judgment against Mrs. Comstock, but is a judgment on his opposition to an account in the succession of Mr. Comstock against his estate, ordering the opponent to be placed upon it and paid accordingly. It will not do to argue that execution could have issued against Mrs. Comstock on that judgment, and that no execution could thus have issued, unless the judgment was a personal judgment. This is an assumption altogether unauthorized; a petitio principii and a fallacy which create a confusion of ideas on the subject. Under the articles of the Code of Practice treating of this matter, and the several authorities cited in the opinion, the creditor might have taken that judgment as a basis for a personal judgment against Mrs. Comstock if, having funds to pay, she had refused or failed to do so, the same to be obtained on subsequent contradictory proceedings, culminating into such personal judgments; but it is not until then that execution could issue. Code Prac. arts. 993, 1057, et seq.; Carriere v. Meyer, 16 La. 126; Wells v. Roach, 10 La. Ann. 543; Stevens v. Stevens, 13 La. Ann. 416; Succession of Philbrick, 18 La. Ann. 220. No such proceedings were taken, and no personal judgment, therefore, was subsequently rendered against Mrs. Comstock, on which execution could have issued.

Vaughn complains that D'Armond, whose claim was recognized with a judicial mortgage, is not entitled to that security, because, Mrs. Comstock having died in October, 1889, and D'Armond's judgment having been recorded in December following, the registry did not create a judicial mortgage in his favor, because it was made after her death. Succession of Gayle, 27 La. Ann. 552; Succession of Myrick, 43 La. Ann. 885, 9 South. Rep. 498; Succession of Gagneux, 40 La. Ann. 703, 4 South. Rep. 869. We did not consider this objection in the opinion, for the reason that we thought that, as Vaughn was no creditor at all of Mrs. Comstock, he had no interest to attack D'Armond, and that the district judge had nevertheless recognized the claim and the mortgage. The record shows that D'Armond is a creditor, as the transferee of a judgment against Mrs. Comstock for $715, but does not establish the date of the death of Mrs. Comstock. D'Armond surely had the right, as a judgment creditor, to oppose the absorption by Vaughn of the residue of $2,199 in favor of his judgment against the succession of Mrs. Comstock; and the district court was right in so holding. If it be true that, at the time he was recognized as such creditor, Mrs. Comstock had ample funds in hand to discharge his claim, and that, on due demand, she failed to do so, Vaughn could have taken the steps pointed out by law to hold her personally responsible; and, after obtaining a judgment against her individually, he could have issued execution against her, and, having recorded the judgment before her death, could have claimed a judicial mortgage on her real estate, and enforced it after her death against her succession and heirs. It may be that he suffers, but his lot is of his own making, and he cannot complain now that his derelictions have defeated his claim, which otherwise, perhaps, might have been satisfied. Courts of justice cannot supply wanting proceedings, and assume the existence of judgments which never existed.

Succession of GIRARDEY. (No. 10,836.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 18, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

PRACTICE—PROBATE COURTS—PRESERVATION OF EVIDENCE—HOMOLOGATION OF ACCOUNTS.

1. The provisions of Code Pr. art. 1042, which require that "the testimony of witnesses in cases before the court of probate shall be taken in writing, and annexed to the record," has for their object to preserve the evidence of claims which are placed upon a succession account for the benefit of minors and absentees, so that their right of appeal shall not be abridged.

2. In case an account be homologated without due proof reduced to writing or otherwise, except as to a single creditor who has opposed, the judgment cannot be maintained, except as to the claim of that opponent.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Succession of C. E. Girardey. The city of New Orleans filed an opposition to the provisional account. From the judgment opponent appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Sommerville, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for appellant. B. R. Forman, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. Originally there were several different oppositions to the account, all of which are dealt with and determined, respectively, in the judgment homologating same, on the 12th of March, 1891; that of the city of New Orleans having been dismissed on an exception and plea of prescription. On the 16th of December, 1890, there was a judgment homologating the account, "so far as not opposed." The city appears as intervener quoad the last-mentioned decree, and as such she appeals; and from the first-mentioned judgment she has appealed, in her capacity of opponent and defendant, other opponents not making any further contest. Hence the question for decision is the distribution of the funds of the succession, and the right of the city to participate therein. In this court counsel for the city has filed an assignment of errors, in aid of her appeals, in which are formulated and circumstantially stated the grounds of her appeals, and which are substantially that (1) the said judgments of homologation were rendered without any proof having been introduced as to the correctness of the items of the account opposed; (2) that the record contains no note in writing of any such evidence having been introduced to serve as a proper foundation of said judgments; (3) that the record contains no evidence of the correctness of the items of said account, and the judgments homologating such accounts were rendered without any sufficient evidence. The record shows that the city's petition of opposition simply alleges that she is a creditor of the succession for a large amount of taxes, due for the years 1877 to 1890, inclusive, the whole aggregating, in capital alone, $3,177.64; and her prayer is "that the account herein filed be amended by placing [her] thereon as a first privilege creditor" for the amounts due for the various years enumerated, with interest, and that same enjoy preference in payment from the proceeds of the sale in the hands of the administratrix. During the progress of the proceedings counsel for the administratrix tendered, as an estoppel against the right of the city to participate in the distribution, her resistance to a rule the administratrix had theretofore taken to compel the cancellation of certain tax inscriptions against the property, subsequent to its sale; and she also urged the prescription of two, three, five, and ten years as a bar to the city's claim for taxes, as well as against the privilege claimed as securing their payment. On this statement of the issues raised, in respect to the opposition of the city, there seems to be no question for determination, other than that of privilege vel non, and that rests alone upon the plea of prescription urged by the administratrix.

It is true that counsel objected to the city tax bills being introduced in evidence, on the ground that the comptroller's certificate, or certified copies of the tax rolls, constitute the best evidence. We are of opinion that the judge of the lower court correctly overruled the objection, because the tax bills appear to be official exhibits, or exemplifications from tax-rolls signed by the city treasurer, giving full and complete data of the assessment. If there be any objection, it goes to the sufficiency, and not to the admissibility, of the evidence. Mullan v. His Creditors, 39 La. Ann. 398, 2 South. Rep. 45.

Considering the question of the prescription of the tax privileges of the various years in question, we find that those of the years 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885 are governed by the terms of section 34, Act 96 of 1882, p. 130, which fixes the prescriptible period at five years; and those since 1886 are governed by the provisions of section 34 of Act 98 of 1886, p. 145, (since re-enacted as Act 85 of 1888,) which fixes the prescriptible period at three years. Opposition of the city having been filed on the 21st of December, 1891, all tax liens and privileges securing the taxes of 1885 and antecedent years were prescribed by five years. Succession of Stewart, 41 La. Ann. 127, 6 South. Rep. 587. And those securing the taxes of the years 1886, 1887, and 1888 were extinguished by the prescription of three years. By the operation of these two periods of prescription all of the tax privileges have become inoperative against the claims and demands of succession creditors, except, possibly, the insignificant sum of $27.59, for the taxes of 1889 and 1890, of which the city appears to have made no specific complaint. This is manifestly an insolvent succession, the total proceeds marshaled for distribution only aggregating $18,712.50, and the privileged debts enumerated on the tableau amounting to $17,570.46, in capital alone; nothing remaining to be applied to the payment of ordinary debts of about $3,000, and only a small amount of property remaining unsold. Under this statement of facts, the demands of the city, as an ordinary creditor of the succession, would be completely overshadowed and defeated by the demands of other creditors, whose claims are secured by mortgage and privilege. Succession of Mercier, 42 La. Ann. 1135, 8 South. Rep. 732. As a reason why the demands of such creditors—and notably of the widow of the deceased, who figures as a creditor of his succession for a large sum—should be disallowed and rejected, counsel for the city points to the provisions of article 1042 of the Code of Practice as mandatory and controlling, and his insistence is that the failure of the counsel to observe its provisions results fatally to all the claims that are covered by the judgments rendered. That article is found in that chapter of the Code which treats "of the proceedings in violation to all actions brought in the parish court as a court of probate," and it declares that "the testimony of witnesses in cases before the courts of probate shall be taken in writing, and annexed to the record," etc. Respecting the provisions of that article as mandatory, we cannot perceive the interest of the city to urge them. She is a person in law, and sui juris. In her answer and opposition she affirms the existence of a lien and privilege for the security of her taxes, but she does not object to or disaffirm the validity or binding force of the privileges and mortgages asserted by other creditors. If the evidence, the absence of which she complains, were in the record, it is very doubtful whether or not she could avail herself of it, to impeach or diminish the demands of which she has made no complaint. Res inter alios acta. In Succession of Reeves, 3 La. Ann. 554, a case cited in city's brief, the court, in commenting on that article, says: "The interests of minors and absentees in probate proceedings have induced our predecessors, on all occasions, to require a compliance with this regulation on the part of those courts," etc. In quite a number of cases this article has been examined and construed, the purport of decision being that its object is to preserve the evidence of claims placed upon succession accounts, for the benefit of minors and absentees, so that the right of appeal shall not be embarrassed or abridged. Thompkins v. Benjamin, 16 La. 200; Graham v. Graham, Id. 203; Desormes v. Desormes, 17 La. 115; Pargood v. Breard, 4 La. Ann. 517; Succession of Ross, 21 La. Ann. 511; Succession of Dorville, 27 La. Ann. 131; Succession of Cloney, 29 La. Ann. 328; But in Succession of Bellocq, 28 La. Ann. 154, a case is stated wherein an account had been "homologated in so far as not opposed," and the record disclosed but one opposition to the account; and, considering the provisions of the cited article, the court said: "As the account was homologated without any proof reduced to writing or otherwise, except as to the creditor who opposed it, the judgment, except as to said opponent, cannot be maintained." (Italics ours.) In Succession of Commagere, 38 La. Ann. 834, we had occasion to examine and collate the authorities pro et con bearing on the question of what effect is to be attributed to a judgment homologating an account, so far as not opposed, and we held, substantially, that one opponent could take advantage of the opposition of another opponent, which suspended decision of the court, in respect to any and all items thereon opposed, so as to enable the former to supplement his opposition by including such items as the latter had opposed. But in the instant case all oppositions, other than that of the city, have been abandoned, or the judgment of homologation acquiesced in; and the city has no effective opposition on which to rest her claim for relief as an ordinary creditor. In our opinion, the judgment appealed from is correct, and it is affirmed.

McCLELLAN, Tax Collector, v. PETTIGREW.

(No. 10,980.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. March 7, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

LICENSE—AGENT OF FOREIGN MANUFACTURER—SALES BY ORDER—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—COLLECTION.

1. The agent of the manufacturer of clocks in another state, who takes orders for them in Louisiana, is not subject to the payment of a license tax.

2. The agent would be liable to the tax imposed by section 23, Act No. 150 of 1890, if the clocks had been shipped to Louisiana, and, after they had been located in Louisiana, the agent, by peddling them, disposed of them.

3. Whether the tax can be imposed, either directly on the goods introduced into the state, or by license on the party who is intrusted with their sale, depends upon the fact whether the goods have been incorporated into the general mass of property subject to taxation.

4. If the manufacturer in another state sends an agent to Louisiana to find a purchaser for his manufactured goods still at the factory, and he takes orders, and the goods are shipped directly to the agent, to be delivered to the purchaser, he is not liable to said license tax imposed by said act. It is immaterial whether the sale is perfected by delivery. The clause of the constitution of the United States which declares that congress shall have the power to regulate commerce among the several states extends to negotiations for the sale of manufactured articles solicited in another state. Therefore any license tax imposed upon an agent or solicitor for soliciting orders for said goods by sample is in violation of said clause of the constitution of the United States.

5. A tax collector has the same remedy to enforce the payment of parish as state taxes and licenses.

6. A tax on peddlers is sufficiently graduated when a specific sum is imposed upon them.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Madison; FIELD F. MONTGOMERY, Judge.

Proceeding by J. T. McClellan, tax collector, against L. R. Pettigrew, as agent of the Seth Thomas Clock Company, to enforce the collection of a certain license tax. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and judgment entered for defendant.

Bell & Randolph, for appellant. A. L. Slack, for appellee.

McENERY, J. The plaintiff tax collector proceeded by rule against the defendant, as agent of the Seth Thomas Clock Company, a corporation domiciled in the state of New York, to enforce the collection of state and parish licenses against said company as clock vendors, imposed by section 13 of the revenue act of 1890. An exception was filed by defendant, denying the right of the plaintiff to sue for the license due the parish of Madison. The tax collector needs no special authority to collect the tax. The amount of the tax, and the delivery to him of blank licenses and the tax rolls, is a sufficient basis for his authority to enforce the collection of the tax or license. But we think the authority for him to collect by legal process is contained in Act 106 of 1890 and Act 85 of 1888. The exception was overruled, and the defendant answered, denying liability, because the license was not graduated, and that the license imposed was a tax upon interstate commerce. The license tax was a specific sum for the business conducted by defendant. It was the only practical method of imposing the license tax, as there was no means of graduating the license among different peddlers of the same kind of goods. State v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co., 40 La. Ann. 463, 4 South. Rep. 504; State v. Chapman, 35 La. Ann. 76.

On the second objection, the facts agreed upon to determine the liability of the defendant are as follows: "That the agent, Pettigrew, is temporarily in the parish of Madison as the solicitor of the Seth Thomas Clock Company, a corporation domiciled in the state and city of New York, a manufacturer of clocks; and that the said Pettigrew is engaged in said parish in soliciting orders from purchasers, with a view of introducing said clock into the state; that he obtains orders, forwards same by mail to the said clock company, then ships the clock to points convenient to the purchaser, and they are delivered by the company at its own expense in this parish. There have been two wagons employed to deliver said clocks to the purchasers. This delivery is generally made under the direction of defendant. The said defendant has no interest in or title to said clocks. The sales are generally made on a credit as per attached blank note, which is signed by the purchaser at time of purchase, and forwarded to said Seth Thomas Clock Company. In traveling and soliciting said orders as above, said defendant carries along a sample clock, to show its style and operation, and makes his sales by said sample. For his services he is paid a salary by said clock company. It is admitted that on orders so received said company has delivered clocks in this parish to purchasers. It is admitted parish license is same as state, as provided by section 13 of the revenue act." The note attached to the agreement, and a part of it, is as follows: "$36.00 ——— P. O. State of ———. 189—. On or before the first day of ———, after date, I promise to pay to Seth Thomas Clock Company or order the thirty-six dollars, value received, without discount or offset, waiving all rights to exemption allowed us by law as to the debt, with interest at the rate of eight per cent. from date if not paid when due and presented. This note is given for one Fashion calendar clock, which I have this day purchased from said Seth Thomas Clock Company, to be delivered at ——— premises, within ——— days from this date. This note is to be void only upon the condition that said Seth Thomas Clock Company refuse to deliver the said Fashion clock, as above specified, and for no other cause whatever. There are no outside contracts or conditions affecting the sale of this note except what is herein specified." There was judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, the tax collector, from which the defendant appealed.

The reasons assigned for the judgment were that when the clocks reached Louisiana they were still the property of the defendants, and remained their property until delivered to the purchasers; that the agent was not a drummer, but a vendor of clocks, as the sale was not completed until the clock was delivered to the purchaser. If the clocks had been shipped to Louisiana, the place of their destination, and were to remain there until a purchaser could be found, there can be no doubt that they would then have been incorporated into the general mass of the property of the state, subject to taxation. This is clearly enunciated in the cases of Machine Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1091; Robbins v. Taxing Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592; Hardware Co. v. McGuire, 39 La. Ann. 849, 2 South. Rep. 592. In the Robbins Case, 120 U. S. 489, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, the court said: "In a word, it may be said that, in the matter of interstate commerce, the United States are but one country, and are and must be subject to one system of regulations, and not to a multitude of systems. The doctrine of the freedom of that commerce, except as regulated by congress, is so firmly established that it is unnecessary to enlarge further upon the subject. In view of these fundamental principles, which are to govern our decision, we may approach the question submitted to us in the present case, and inquire whether it is competent for a state to levy a tax or impose any other restrictions upon the citizens or inhabitants of other states for selling or seeking to sell their goods in such state before they are introduced therein. Do not such restrictions affect the very foundation of interstate trade? How is a manufacturer or merchant of one state to sell his goods in another state without in some way obtaining orders therefor? Must he be compelled to send them at a venture, without knowing whether there is any demand for them?" The prohibition to levy a license for the sale of goods situated in another state does not depend upon the actual sale of the goods. It extends to the negotiation for the sale of the goods, to their introduction into the state, and the opening of a market for them. If the goods are situated in the state, having been shipped there for sale, and the negotiations are then made in relation to their final disposition, they are subject to taxation, as they have been incorporated into the general mass of property subject to taxation. It does not, then, make any difference where they were manufactured. Had the defendants shipped their clocks to the state, and then endeavored to find purchasers for them, by peddling them through the parish of Madison, they would have made themselves liable to the license imposed by the revenue act of 1890. 100 U. S. 676. The admissions show that the defendant employed a solicitor, who exhibited a sample clock in order to procure orders. The clocks were in New York, at the manufactory, when the orders were solicited. When an order for a clock was obtained, it was shipped to the defendant solicitor for delivery. He delivered them by a wagon,—having two of these vehicles in his service. The clocks were shipped to convenient points for delivery to the purchaser by defendant's agent. After the orders were obtained, the clocks in fact were shipped directly to the purchaser. The fact that their agent received and delivered them cannot so locate them in the state as to make them a part of the general mass of the property subject to taxation. They became so when delivered to the purchaser. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled and reversed, and it is now ordered that there be judgment in favor of defendant, and plaintiff's demand be rejected and dismissed.

LONG v. KEE. (No. 10,967.)

PARTNERSHIP—SETTLEMENT—SEQUESTRATION—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL.

1. When, in the course of a quasi partnership settlement, a sequestration is obtained of property mutually claimed by each one of the parties, the strictness of the rule applicable to an equitable estoppel by conduct may be somewhat relaxed.

2. If, in such case, the defendant sets up a reconventional demand for property alleged to have been taken by the sheriff, and not reported in his return, allegations should describe it with some degree of precision, in order that proof be admissible.

3. When quasi trust relations exist between such parties, the burden of proof rests upon that party to whose care and fidelity the affairs of such quasi partnership was intrusted to make a fair and clear showing as the basis of settlement. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Lafayette; ORTHER C. MOUTON, Judge.

Action by Denis Long against John E. Kee. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Motion was denied, and judgment on the merits modified.

Gus A. Breaux and C. De Baillon, for appellant. Jos. A. Chargois, Chas. D. Caffery and Julian Mouton, for appellee.

ON MOTION TO DISMISS APPEAL.

WATKINS, J. Defendant and appellee seeks to dismiss the plaintiff's appeal on account of certain alleged imperfections in the appeal bond. To the motion appellant's answer is that it comes too late, having been filed more than three days after the filing of the transcript, and after the return day. This answer is good, and disposes of the motion, as the transcript was filed on January 20, 1892, subsequent to the return day, the 18th thereof; the motion to dismiss having been filed on the 25th of said month. Webb v. Keller, 39 La. Ann. 55, 1 South. Rep. 423; St. Romes v. Cotton Press Co., 31 La. Ann. 224; Holbrook v. Holbrook, 32 La. Ann. 13; Succession of Charmbury, 34 La. Ann. 21; O'Reilly v. McLeod, 2 La. Ann. 138; Hall v. Nevill, 3 La. Ann. 326; Mitchell v. Lay, 4 La. Ann. 514; Boykin v. O'Hara, 6 La. Ann. 115; Temple v. Marshall, 11 La. Ann. 613; Creevy v. Breedlove, 12 La. Ann. 745; Murrison v. Seiler, 22 La. Ann. 327; Kohn v. Davidson, 23 La. Ann. 467; Dumonchel v. Lemerick, 21 La. Ann. 30. The motion is therefore denied.

ON THE MERITS.

When the case was under consideration last, the pleadings were analyzed, the respective positions of the parties stated, and many of the issues decided. 42 La. Ann. 599, 8 South. Rep. 610. From our opinion it appears that the plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract on the 26th of February, 1886, in which, among other things, it was stipulated that the former furnished his plantation with all its ameliorations and equipments, and some live stock,—of which a description is given, as passing, with the place, into the joint adventure, and other cattle which did not. Thereunder the defendant entered into possession, stipulating that he was to give his time and undivided attention to the supervision and management thereof, and to the care and protection of all the live stock; and as a consideration for his services he was to have the profit arising from the cultivation of the annual crops and one half the increase of the live stock. Claiming the right to terminate the contract, on account of defendant's mismanagement, and retake possession of his property, the defendant resisting, plaintiff caused certain specified property to be sequestered judicially, and, in default of defendant exercising that right, gave bond therefor, and took it into possession. On the trial, in the district court, plaintiff's sequestration was dissolved, and defendant restored to possession of the plantation and property that was sequestered. On appeal to this court, the judgment rendered was reversed; many issues therein were decided, as above stated; the contract was held to have been legally terminated on the 31st of December, 1889, and plaintiff's right to possession recognized, and the cause remanded for the trial of three issues, viz.: (1) Damages inflicted upon personal property; (2) defendant's right of ownership of personal property claimed; (3) the adjustment of his claim to a share in the increase of the live stock,—all of which are circumstantially set out in an extended answer and reconventional demand. With defendant's demands thus reformed and restated, the case went back to the district court, and was again tried,—the defendant apparently abandoning his claim for damages, and only insisting on his other demands; that is to say, his demand for restitution of personal property, and an interest in the live stock, (a minutely detailed list of which is appended to his answer,) the aggregate value of the former of which he places at $6,275.85, and of the latter at $2,550, the two aggregating $8,625.85. There was judgment commanding the plaintiff to make restitution to the defendant, within 30 days after the finality of the decree, of the following items and articles of property, or, in the alternative, to pay the various sums set opposite said items, as the respective values thereof, viz.:

5 horses and 3 mules	$ 710 00
Blacksmith shop and tools	68 80
Old buggies, etc	79 50
Poultry, pigs, etc	159 50
Vegetables, etc	30 00
Farming implements, etc	363 75
One rice-thrasher	250 00
Aggregating in value	$1,661 55

It further commands plaintiff to make restitution to defendant of one half of the increase of horned cattle, the whole number of which is fixed at 161 head, thus entitling defendant to 80½ head; and decreeing that, in default of making restitution, the plaintiff shall pay him therefor at the rate of $10 per head, or $800 for the whole number. From this judgment, which condemns the plaintiff to surrender property, or to pay an alternate value of $2,461.55, he prosecutes the present appeal. It is of importance to mention that, after disposing of the foregoing property, the judgment decrees that "all other property herein claimed by the parties to this suit * * * belong to Denis Long."

1. The first question to be disposed of is the claim of the defendant to an interest in the increase of the horned cattle, which is stated, in his answer and reconventional demand, to be $2,550 in value, but which the judgment fixes at $800, and which must be accepted as the limit of his demand, inasmuch as he has not, in this court, requested an increased allowance. As a basis of the judgment, we quote the following therefrom, viz.: "It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the amount of stock of horned cattle, at the time of sequestration, be, and the same is hereby, recognized at 430 head; and that the interest of J. E. Kee, defendant, in the increase thereof, be, and the same is, fixed as follows, viz.:

First deduct cows	156
Three years old	85
Two years old	27
One year old	28
Calves	19
Oxen	4
Aggregating	269	430"
Leaving an increase	161

In the preceding part of the judgment it is stated that there was ascertained from the evidence to have been on hand, at the date contract was entered into, 269 head of horned cattle, and it is on this basis that the calculation is made. In our former opinion it is stated, viz.: "Now, in this case, the testimony of the defendant is that, at the time of making the contract of 1886, he did not count the cattle, and could not state the number. He took all the cattle on the place, and was to have an interest in the increase. Of the calves that were branded in 1886, 1887, and 1888, he was unable to say how many survive. It is quite unnecessary for us to examine or discuss any additional testimony on this branch of the case, as it is manifest that, under this admission, no settlement can be made at this time," etc. 42 La. Ann. 907, 908, 8 South. Rep. 613.

We had before us then, as we have now, the original agreement, which is authentic in form, which specifically declares that, with the plantation and its appurtenances and farm implements, the plaintiff furnished to the defendant "three mules for which [he] paid $375.—Fly, Dolly, and Queen;" and also that he "further furnished live stock, cattle, sheep, etc., at a cost of $4,165" in addition to seventeen head of Kentucky thoroughbred cattle not covered by the agreement. We had before us then, as we have now, the admission in defendant's answer that it was he who proposed to go into the stock business with the plaintiff, on "the condition that [the latter] would furnish the money to buy the cattle, and he [defendant] was to be half owner thereof, and pay back to plaintiff one half the money, with interest;" and that this proposition was accepted by the plaintiff, who "then advanced $4,000, which was expended by defendant in the purchase of cattle." That the agreement was subsequently modified by the agreement of February, 1886," whereby plaintiff became entire and sole owner of the cattle and sheep," etc.; and that "he had said live stock on the place at the time of the execution of the agreement of 1886, and same were kept there afterwards, as well as such as have been placed there since." This admission in the defendant's answer is confirmatory of the truthfulness of the recital of the agreement as to the value of the live stock invested under the contract; and, as the judgment found there were on hand, at date of sequestration, 430 head of cattle, which, valued, as other cattle were, at $10 per head, would have aggregated $4,300 in value, there would seem to be practically no increase for division,—the difference between the cattle purchased and on hand in 1886 and those on hand in 1890 being only 14, and this difference is nearly offset by the 13 head of cattle the defendant confesses to have disposed of in violation of a stipulation of the agreement to the contrary, and the value of which he places at $123. The memorandum list appended to the plaintiff's petition calls for 600 head of cattle, as on hand at date of contract, which is readily explained by taking as the initial point of the calculation a smaller price per head, say $7, which would produce the value of $4,200, or a fraction above the value stated in the contract, viz., $4,165, and is possibly a more accurate estimate. But this would show a loss of 200 head of cattle, or, at $7 a head, an aggregate diminution of $1,400 on the stock which was invested in the enterprise originally. The judgment fixes the same number and value of the stock on hand as that stated in the sheriff's return on the writ of sequestration, and the list appended to the defendant's answer only shows the net increase to which he alleges himself entitled, i. e., 250 head of cattle. An examination of the reasons which the judge assigns as the foundation of his decree in this respect simply discloses this statement, viz.: "As to the number of cattle furnished by Long, under contract of 1886, I conclude that, at the time of the contract, there were 238 head; bought from Sterne, 7; from Torrence, 14; and from Hawkins, 10,—making a total of 269." Then follows, immediately after this quoted paragraph, the tabulated statement and conclusion related above. The judge does not make any reference to the evidence of witnesses on which this conclusion is based, and a patient examination of the record has failed to disclose any. And, if there was any such evidence, its reliability would be, evidently, problematical. The defendant was, on the last trial, as he was on the former trial, fully examined and cross interrogated, without, in any material respect, bettering his case; and, as plaintiff in reconvention, he evidently carries the burden of proof. It is our deliberate opinion that the judgment is in error in this respect, and the defendant's demand, pro tanto, should be rejected.

2. With regard to the defendant's claim for personal property, or its value, the difficulties of solution appear to be greater than those in reference to the increase of stock. They arise from the fact that this is a quasi partnership settlement of ordinary planting partners and stock-raisers, of which the defendant had the exclusive use, control, and management, the plaintiff residing in the state of Kentucky, and possessing no information other than such as it pleased the defendant to disclose. In our former opinion we held that the agreement between the parties, "although styled a 'partnership,' is a contract of hire of labor;" that "the plaintiff had just grounds for his sequestration," and had the legal right to put an end to the agreement as he did. In that opinion defendant was treated as, in some sort, an unfaithful agent, who had abused the confidence and trust his lessor or principal had reposed in him, and, upon the principles of equity, he must be held to a strict accountability, and required to make clear proof of his demands. This fact appears prominently, at the opening of the discussion, viz., that upon no theory has plaintiff been benefited by the transactions of many years, notwithstanding he was the owner of all the property, primarily, and furnished large sums of money to the defendant. It is quite true that evidence of such advances of money was rejected by the district judge, on the ground that such proof did not correspond with any averments in the petition; but we are of opinion that his ruling was erroneous, and that plaintiff, occupying the position of defendant in reconvention, had the right to introduce such evidence in rebuttal of the defendant's claim, without making any plea, replications not being permissible. This view is supported on the hypothesis of plaintiff's counsel that these moneys were invested in stock and personal property of the kind mentioned in defendant's reconventional demand, and should be carried into the calculation of the value for which he insists plaintiff is responsible; and it seems so manifestly just and reasonable that, to our minds, there is no escape from this conclusion.

This much having been premised, we will dispose of the contentions of the plaintiff which are set up as a bar to the prosecution of the defendant's claim in reconvention, viz.: (1) That, the latter having pointed out to the sheriff the property for sequestration, he is equitably estopped by conduct from subsequently asserting his ownership of same; (2) that said defendant having, during the period of the contract, had the personal property assessed as that of the plaintiff, and upon his own affidavit, he is likewise estopped from making claim to it. While, under ordinary circumstances, such considerations would have great weight, yet, under the exceptional circumstances of this case, they cannot be deemed controlling: (1) Because the sheriff was furnished with a detailed list of the property intended for sequestration, and a seizure of which was demanded, and it is likely enough that the defendant merely indicated where such property could be found, without intending to waive or abandon his right; (2) because of the fact that the defendant admitted the ownership of the plaintiff in the real estate, and of some of the stock and personal property, of which he was also part owner, he may have thought an assessment, solely in the name of the plaintiff, would suffice, and inflict no injury upon the state. Such an assessment cannot have any real, substantial bearing upon the rights of the parties, and we must decline to consider it as such in this case. Plaintiff's further contention is that no claim of property can be entertained and decided, under a proper construction of the issues raised in defendant's answer, other than such as appertains to the property that was sequestered, and made mention of in the sheriff's return; and we think there is great force in this contention. The plaintiff's counsel was careful to make out a list of property which he desired seized, and handed it to the sheriff; and that is the property he sequestered in part, though he sequestered some additional property. In the answer there is a declaration to the effect that the sheriff did seize and actually take into his possession other property belonging to him, of which no account is taken in the inventory and return, and for which he makes claim; because his contention is that, when plaintiff gave bond and released the property from seizure, he took possession thereof, and placed it in the hands of his agent, where it now is. But there is no list or description of the particular property referred to whereby it can be identified with any degree of certainty, and to hold an absentee landlord to a rigid accountability for large values, predicated upon such an averment, would be manifestly unjust. The kind and character of the property is given in the judgment, and referred to in a previous paragraph of this opinion. We think it better to limit this decision to the property sequestered, reserving the rights of the defendant to make claim to any other property of which the plaintiff may be illegally possessed.

Confining ourselves to an examination and comparison of the items and amounts stated in the judgment with those enumerated in the sheriff's return, we find the following to be a just and proper settlement between the parties, to-wit: That the following items of property listed in the judgment be reduced in value by the following amounts, viz.:

The mule Mary by	$ 75 00
The mule Rock by	35 00
The mule Jane by	50 00
The mare Katy by	25 00
The mare Bella by	20 00
The mare Queen by	50 00
The horse Rondeau by	75 00
The horse Kee by	10 00
Two horse carts by	20 00
Two buggies by	10 00
One lot of chickens by	6 70
One lot of geese by	3 80
Aggregate reduction of	$380 50

That the following items of property be, and the same are to be, stricken from said list, viz.:

One duck, at	$ 25
One saddle, at	7 00
5 sows with pig	45 00
1 boar	15 00
26 head of hogs	78 00
7 sugar coolers	28 00
Aggregating in value	$173 25

These diminutions and reductions will operate a change of the alternate values of the articles specified by the total sum of $380.50, and deduction from the list of property which the judgment decrees to belong to the defendant of the articles last enumerated, having an aggregate valuation of $173.25; and, as thus altered and amended, the judgment should be affirmed. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended in the following particulars, viz.: (a) By eliminating altogether the claim and demand of the defendant for a share of the increase of the horned cattle, and in the judgment, estimated to be worth $800; (b) by reducing the value of the various items of property listed above by the amount of $380.50; (c) by rejecting and disallowing the defendant's claim to the ownership of other articles enumerated above, valued at $173.25. And it is further ordered and decreed that, as amended, said judgment be affirmed at appellee's cost; the right of defendant being reserved to claim any other property than such as was sequestered, and the right of plaintiff is also reserved to claim of defendant an account and settlement of moneys had and received.

5. Where a tutor administers a succession which has debts against it, with the consent of the creditors, he can hold the property as tutor only after he has fully administered the succession.
6. If the tutor conduct the mercantile and planting business left by the deceased, and borrows money to pay off succession debts, and then, to pay off this debt so created, uses money made in the business, and then borrows money to pay off the indebtedness of the business created since the opening of the succession, this last debt is a debt against the succession, and not against the tutorship.

Appeal from district court, parish of De Soto; W. PIKE HALL, Judge.

The succession of Henry F. Fullilove, deceased. O. H. P. Sample, claiming to be a creditor of deceased, proceeded by rule against R. N. Scarborough, natural tutor of Henry F. and Thomas F. Scarborough, who were sole heirs of deceased, to compel payment of the debt. From a judgment for the tutor, Sample appeals. Reversed.

E. W. Sutherlin, for appellant. J. F. Pierson, for appellee.

McENERY, J. This case was before this court in March, 1891, and the pleadings are stated in the opinion in 43 La. Ann. 316, 8 South. Rep. 940. The suit was remanded for further proceedings to ascertain whether the succession was under administration when the debt upon which the plaintiff in rule proceeded to enforce its payment was created. The law applicable to the administration of successions by tutors in the interest of both creditors and minors was fully discussed in the opinion remanding the case. It is not necessary to refer to this question, which is referred to in the brief of counsel.

When the case was reinstated in the lower court, in addition to objections to the form of proceedings, the defendant put at issue the validity of the claim sued on. To defendant's answer the plaintiff, by exception, filed the plea of res judicata. The defendant objected to the filing of the plea on the ground that it was a "replication" or "rejoinder" to defendant's answer, which is prohibited by article 320, Code Prac. The objections were overruled, to which the defendant excepted and reserved his bill. The plea may be presented by petition, exception, or rule, or by intervention, or in any form of proceeding; and whenever the same questions recur between the same parties, even under a different form of procedure, the exception of res judicata estops. There is no particular form required for pleading it. It may be pleaded either by way of exception or in the answer; the only requirement being that it be specially and specifically pleaded. There is no way in which the plaintiff can plead it, unless by exception or special plea. The form is immaterial.

Plaintiff's claim was presented for approval to the court by the defendant as tutor. All parties—the plaintiff, creditors, the under tutor, and the defendant as tutor—were represented in the judgment homologating the account. There was no opposition to the account, and it became final and definitive as to all parties, and the judgment thereon operated as an effectual estoppel to all parties thus represented. While presented as the account of the tutor, it was in fact an account of his administration of the succession, which he, with the consent of the creditors, was administering by virtue of his office as tutor.

The facts disclosed by the record and before the court are as follows: Henry F. Fullilove died in February, 1885. He left an estate consisting of plantations, a storehouse, and stock of goods. He was a merchant and planter, and was engaged in the usual line of business conducted in a country store. Henry F. and Thomas F. Scarborough, grandchildren, were his heirs. R. N. Scarborough, the father of the children, and surviving husband, qualified as natural tutor of his minor children. As tutor, he took possession of the effects in the succession of Fullilove. On March 24, 1885, a family meeting was convened on the petition of Scarborough, tutor. He represented that said succession owed about $4,000, and that there were no funds on hand to pay this amount; and he also recommended that the mercantile and planting business conducted by the deceased should be continued. The family meeting which convened advised as the tutor had recommended, and also advised that he be authorized to contract debts to the amount of $5,000 in the interest of said business. The succession really owed $3,703.02, and its assets were large; the indebtedness only being about 10 per cent. of the value of the succession effects. A profit was made by the business for the year 1886. Another family meeting was convened, and the tutor authorized to borrow $5,000 and to continue the business. At the end of the year 1887, he procured another family meeting, which authorized him to borrow $3,000 and to continue the business to March 28, 1888. On 23d February, 1887, the debts of the succession had been paid by money obtained from Perrin & Zeigler, of Shreveport. All the old debts of the deceased, Fullilove, were paid through this firm. It took all of the money in the hands of the tutor to pay this debt. In the mean time, there were other debts, which had been created since the opening of the succession, and only a short period before the account was filed by the tutor. These were debts created by the tutor in carrying on the business authorized by the family meeting.

The defendant contends that, when the debts of the succession were paid by Perrin & Zeigler, this put an end to the succession, and the tutor held the property of the succession for the minors, and that they, through the tutor, the moment the succession ceased to exist, by the payment of the succession debts, went into possession of their inheritance from their grandfather; that all debts created after this were debts of the tutorship. The distinction makes a material difference in the means employed to secure the payment of the debt, as well as in the effect of the homologation of the final account. To pay the outstanding indebtedness created since the payment of the debts of the succession by Perrin & Zeigler, the tutor, Scarborough, borrowed the money from the plaintiff. This is the amount now in controversy. From the abbreviated statement of the facts in the case, it will be observed that the efforts of the tutor in the administration of the succession were to pay its debts, which were small in amount, not exceeding $4,000. The mercantile and planting operations were conducted for this purpose. In his acts of administration, he found it necessary to borrow money to pay off the indebtedness of the deceased, and to continue the business to pay off the amounts that he borrowed. If he paid the debts from money obtained from one source, others were created, equal in amount, in an endeavor to pay that which was borrowed. The acts of the tutor in administering for the heirs and for the creditors cannot be distinguished. His administration was an entirety,—one effort of administration to make money to liquidate the indebtedness. The minors only had a residuary interest in the succession after the payment of the debts of the succession. The old debts against the succession, it is true, were paid, but it was in the course of the administration of the succession in conducting the business left by the deceased. The debts were paid either by money borrowed for the purpose, or from the profits of the business. It is immaterial from what source the debts were paid. The succession had never been freed from its debts, for, as rapidly as the old debts were paid, new ones were created, from the necessity of paying the old ones. These were but substitutes for the debts left by the deceased, and all the acts of the tutor were done in the line of administering a succession to pay its debts. In remanding the case, we said that "it does not appear from the pleadings and account that the minors Scarborough have entered into possession of their grandfather's estate as an inheritance, yet upon issue joined, and trial had, the fact may be made to appear. Until this fact is made to appear affirmatively, we must hold that a tutor acting as administrator of an open succession does not possess apparently for the heirs, and that the property will not pass to him as tutor until his administration as such is terminated." The account filed by the tutor was an exhibit of his administration of the succession. It showed debts still existing against the succession. It was a provisional account. Until the tutor's administration of the succession is terminated, the property will not pass to him as tutor. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled and reversed, and it is now ordered that the rule granted herein be made absolute, and the prayer of the plaintiff in rule be granted.

WATKINS, J., (concurring.) The following is an extract from the brief of defendant's counsel at page 28, viz.: "We most respectfully submit that the court was drawn into error as to the true meaning of the opinion in the case of Lemmon v. Clark, 36 La. Ann. 744. Upon a critical analysis of that case, we come to the conclusion that the doctrine there announced is the reverse of the conclusion drawn from it by the court in the opinion in this case. We do not find that the court there admits the doctrine that an appointment and qualification of one as tutor authorizes him, under such appointment and qualification, to act also in the different capacity of administrator of a succession falling to his wards without another appointment and qualification in such other capacity, also." Reference to our opinion will show that the paragraph immediately preceding the one selected and quoted by counsel does not state that the case of Lemmon v. Clark recognized the right of a tutor, ex virtute officii, to administer a succession. Indeed, it did not present that question for the decision of the court at all, nor does our previous opinion say that it did. It was a case of heirs in possession, as Soye v. Price, 30 La. Ann. 93, was. But in deciding that case the court, for the purpose of illustration, merely, announced the existence of the rule stated by us, saying: "The cases quoted by counsel for plaintiff are all cases in which the tutor held in a dual capacity, of tutor and administrator," etc. That was all the use our previous opinion in this case meant to make of the quotation from Lemmon v. Clark. The sequence of counsel's argument is that the tutor, having been appointed and qualified as such, and never having been appointed and qualified as administrator of the succession of the deceased, cannot represent the succession or its creditors, and that, acting as tutor alone, plaintiff's account was necessarily one of tutorship per se, the homologation of which was only prima facie proof as against his wards; and therefore, as a creditor whose claim had been acknowledged and placed thereon, plaintiff had no right to proceed by rule, under article 990 of Code of Practice, as he has done, for a sale of property to pay same. But I think our opinion is correct in announcing, as a proposition well sustained in our jurisprudence, that a duly qualified, bonded, and acting tutor may, ex virtute officii, administer the succession coming to his wards without any appointment as administrator thereof, and in so doing perform the dual functions of tutor and administrator. True it is, as stated by counsel in his brief, that the contrary was held to be the rule of jurisprudence in many early cases, some of which he cites, viz.: Jacobs v. Tricou, 17 La. 109; Tildon v. Dees, 1 Rob. (La.) 409; Atchison v. Parks, 9 Rob. (La.) 141; Self v. Morris, 7 Rob. (La.) 24; Beal v. Walden, 11 Rob. 75; Arthur v. Cochran, 12 Rob. (La.) 43. But it has not been maintained in opinions of more recent date, and he cites none to that effect. In Martin v. Dupre, 1 La. Ann. 239, it was held that a tutrix "had power to administer the estate as such." In that case the validity of a sale at public auction by the tutrix was maintained against the demand of a subsequently appointed administrator for its nullity. In Bryan v. Atchison, 2 La. Ann. 463, the question was whether a tutor, as such, might administer a succession, and as to his capacity to stand in judgment, in a suit for the sale of property, so as to make the decree of sale binding upon the heirs and creditors. The court say: "It is not pretended that any creditor in this case ever required the appointment of an administrator, and the judge was not bound to appoint one. So that, if the tutrix does not represent the succession, creditors could not enforce their rights." And, commenting on that proposition, they say: "There can be no doubt that the succession was properly represented." This declaration was made in answer to the complaint of a subsequently appointed administrator of that succession. In Monget v. Penny, 7 La. Ann. 134, the court held, upon the principle announced in Bryan v. Atchison, that "the defendant, as tutor to his minor children, was the representative of the succession, and as such the proper party defendant in plaintiff's suit." In Hoover v. Sellers, 5 La. Ann. 180, it was held that "it is a well-settled doctrine that a succession inherited by minors may be administered by their tutors." In Hair v. McDade, 10 La. Ann. 534, it was held that "as tutrix [plaintiff] had the right to administer upon the estate belonging to the minor children without taking out letters of administration, unless required to do so by creditors." In State v. Leckie, 14 La. Ann. 641, the foregoing opinions were cited and approved; the court holding this course of procedure to be "an exception to the general rule to be applied if creditors do not require the appointment of an administrator." This is now the established rule of our jurisprudence, and it has been sustained by this court in many subsequent cases; and I had no thought of its being disputed. Vide Succession of Weber, 16 La. Ann. 420; Ducote v. Bordelon, 24 La. Ann. 145; Succession of De Lerno, 34 La. Ann. 38. All of the foregoing cases, with the exception of the last three, were cited in the former opinion of this court in this case; and I respectfully submit that they furnish ample foundation for the opinion expressed, as counsel would have learned, had he taken the precaution to review them before writing his brief. I concur in the present opinion of the court, fully.

SAMPLE v. SCARBOROUGH. (No. 10,902.)

VERBAL SALE OF IMMOVABLES—VALIDITY AS TO THIRD PERSONS—RECORDATION—MORTGAGES—OWNERSHIP OF MORTGAGOR—TUTOR AND WARD.

1. The authority of the thing adjudged must be tested by the requisites of article 2286 of the Civil Code. The decree is not final unless it falls within the terms of that article.
2. Verbal sales of immovables are null as to third persons.
3. The promise to sell must be established with the same formalities as sales.
4. All sales affecting immovable property, not recorded, are null and void, except between the parties thereto.
5. Property can be specifically hypothecated only by the owner, or some one authorized to act for him.
6. The mortgage given by one not the owner will not become valid unless he acquires the ownership.
7. Joining the owner, who has promised to sell to the mortgagor in the sale of the property, is not an acquisition of the property, and does not give validity to the mortgage.
8. A tutor has no right to pledge the note due his wards as a security for his debts.
9. One of the notes, at one time unlawfully pledged, having been returned, and the other having been collected in the name and for account of the tutor, who applied the amount to the payment of his debt, he has no right of action to recover the amount paid in satisfaction of his individual debt.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of De Soto; W. PIKE HALL, Judge.

Suit by O. H. P. Sample against R. N. Scarborough to foreclose a certain lien. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. F. Pierson, for appellant. E. W. Sutherlin and C. W. Elam, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiff sues to foreclose, via ordinaria, a vendor's privilege and mortgage against the defendant, amounting to $1,237.40, and for interest and fee of attorney, on a tract of land known as the "Fortson Place," in the parish of De Soto. The defendant makes no defense, personally. As the tutor of his minor children, he intervened, and in his petition of intervention avers that this property was on the 15th day of December, 1886, mortgaged to him, as tutor, to secure two amounts, aggregating $3,577.21 and interest. There was another amount $2,500, claimed, which was subsequently abandoned, and is therefore no longer at issue. The mortgagor was F. N. Coleman, who did not have a deed to the property mortgaged. The intervener alleges that at the time the mortgage was given the mortgagor had paid the purchase price, except about $1,000. He assumed that the sale would be made to him, and mortgaged this property, which he did not own, with other property he owned at the time. The intervener avers that in April, 1888, F. M. Fortson, who had promised to sell to Coleman, sold the property to the defendant, Scarborough. In this sale Coleman joined, and the defendant contends that in thus joining the mortgage before mentioned became valid. The intervener also avers that he acted without authority in placing with plaintiff the notes of his minor children, secured by said mortgages, as collateral security for a debt of $3,468.66. This said amount is claimed by plaintiff in another suit pending before this court. Scarborough, tutor, defends on different grounds. He, as tutor, alleges that he has the right to recover back the mortgage notes, and all amounts collected on them, as the claim belonged to the minors; that the mortgage of the minors is superior in rank to that of the plaintiff. To the demand of the intervener the plaintiff pleaded res adjudicata, and in its support alleged that the tutor, who is the intervener, presented an account of tutorship, in which was carried this claim of $3,468.66 as due to plaintiff. This account was homologated in 1889.

This judgment was the subject-matter of a suit before this court at its last session. 43 La. Ann. 316, 8 South. Rep. 940. This court held that the judgment did not have the appearance of one enforceable against the minors, as it was not proven that they had been placed in possession, and the succession closed; that if, on the trial of the merits, it should be conclusively shown that the tutor administered the succession ex virtute officii, a rule under Code Prac. art. 990, was the proper remedy to enforce payment. That case was remanded for further proceedings. It was tried. Judgment was rendered in favor of R. N. Scarborough, tutor, which was reversed by this court. 44 La. Ann. —, 10 South. Rep. 858. The issues are different in the pending case. The action is to recover on a note secured by mortgage. The intervener claims a superior mortgage; and certain notes and obligations, he alleges, are illegally held by the plaintiff. The parties are not the same. In one case the defendant debtor is sought to be held; in the other, the contention arises about the indebtedness of a succession, and the mode of enforcing collection. The plea of lis pendens was also filed against the intervention. The cause of action is not the same. A final judgment in the case pleaded as lis pendens will not settle the issues in this case. To sustain the plea, not only the subject, but the parties, must be the same, or privies to the parties in the pending suit. The subject-matter involved in the present case is different from that in the case of the tutorship of the minors Henry F. and Thomas Scarborough, (Sample v. Scarborough, 10 South. Rep. 858.) The relief asked for is different. In the matter of the sale, in said case, it is contended that the judgment is not binding on the minors, and that the property cannot be sold on rule to sell as against an administrator in this case. They seek to recover notes pledged as collateral, and the amount collected by the creditor on the collateral, and to prevent a mortgage from being enforced as first in rank. Plaintiff also urges an exception that the intervention is in its nature independent of the main action brought by plaintiff, and not connected with or incidental to the same. The intervener alleges an interest, and claims that he has a prior mortgage, and alleges that plaintiff's mortgage is invalid. The interventional demand is clearly connected with the main action. It was properly used to protect a right in the property plaintiff asks to have sold for the payment of his alleged mortgage. These pleas were properly overruled.

ON THE MERITS.

The priority in rank, vel non, of plaintiff's mortgage, presents the first question for our determination. It is conceded that at the time the mortgage to Scarborough, tutor, was signed, the mortgagor was not the owner. The intervener does not contend that the mortgage by one not the owner gives him a right. He claims that the promise to sell has been complied with, and that the mortgage had thereby become valid, and relies upon article 3304 of the Civil Code: "This mortgage shall be valid if he [the mortgagor] should ever after acquire the ownership of the property, by whatever right." In support of his contention, he invokes the fact that the notes secured by this mortgage (Coleman to Scarborough, tutor,) were pledged to the plaintiff, and that, in the written receipt of these notes, it is stated that they are secured by this mortgage, and that he is therefore estopped. He also relies upon a sale made in 1888. With reference to the sale, it appears that the party who had verbally promised to sell was unable to return the amount he had received on account of the price, and the party (the said mortgagor) who was to buy was unable to pay the remainder to consummate the sale; whereupon, Fortson, who had promised to sell to Coleman, offered the land to Scarborough, who purchased. The latter applied to plaintiff to borrow the money to pay for it. Plaintiff consented to loan the amount provided notes secured by mortgage and vendor's privilege were executed by the buyer, which would be transferred to him, (plaintiff.) The deed was signed, and the note transferred, in compliance with the agreement made. The property was not sold to the mortgagor at all. Although never owned by the mortgagor, the intervener pleads the act of mortgage to defeat plaintiff's claim, and contends that it precedes that of his creditor. There was a verbal promise to sell. The conditional promise to sell does not give the right to mortgage property, and no right will arise under the mortgage unless the promise is followed by compliance. The receipt invoked does not create a mortgage, as none exists. The plaintiff testifies that he did not know of any such mortgage. The declaration in the receipt does not give validity and binding effect to the alleged mortgage. The condition laid down in the article of the Code is that the mortgage shall be valid if the mortgagor becomes the owner. The receipt did not make the mortgagor the owner, and therefore the alleged mortgage was ineffective. An estoppel is limited to questions concerning the receipt, and does not apply to incidental descriptions. A receipt may be contradicted or explained. "Even in a deed, the recital, to operate an estoppel, must appear as intended not to be questioned, or that injustice would follow if the court were to allow it to be contradicted." Bigelow, Estop. p. 311. The property having been sold by the owner, no one can lay claim to any right under the mortgage not executed by the owner. In the deed of mortgage of December, 1886, by Coleman (not the owner) to Scarborough, tutor, it is declared that the mortgagor expects to receive a title. The owner, who had promised to sell, as a witness states that it was agreed that no sale would be passed before payment of the price. The price was not paid, and the property was sold to another. The sale to the mortgagor never was made.

The intervener claims one of the notes identified with the alleged mortgage, amounting to $2,075, and the amount collected in payment of another, also identified with the act. These notes were pledged to secure the payment of certain amounts due by the intervener. The issues do not establish a pecuniary responsibility on the part of plaintiff, for he has returned the notes, and only received an amount in payment of a sum due him. The intervener in this case, some time since, in another suit, intervened, and alleged that he had possession of the note he now seeks to recover. Since that intervention was filed, it is not shown that plaintiff has had it in his possession. The record discloses that it has not been in possession of the plaintiff since 1888.

With reference to the amount collected on the second note. It appears of record that the mortgagor, Coleman, sold certain property to James F. Greer on 9th February, 1888. The notes were at the time in the possession of Sample, the plaintiff, pledged as before mentioned. One of these pledged notes was paid. The other was returned to the intervener. The question does not arise on these notes as being in the hands of the pledgee claiming a right, but arises after one of the pledged notes has been paid, and the other is in the possession of the pledgor. The intervener seeks to make the at one time pledgee return an amount received, and return a note of which he already has possession. The mortgagor had the absolute right to pay his debt secured by mortgage, and the possibility that the tutor will squander the amount will not affect the receipt. Riddell v. Vizard, 35 La. Ann. 310. The notes were collected for account of the tutor, who applied the amount to the discharge of his debt. It is a fait accompli, and cannot be revoked at the instance of the tutor, who personally made the payment.

With reference to the claim of $3,468.66. We are relieved from giving it consideration in this case, as it has received the court's attention, and was the subject-matter of another suit, decided to-day, (10 South. Rep. 858) in which it is held that the amount is due.

Judgment affirmed, at appellant's costs.

H. B. CLAFLIN CO. v. FEIBLEMAN et al., (SWEETZER, PEMBROKE & Co. et al., Interveners.) (No. 11,004.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. March 7, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

PEREMPTORY EXCEPTION — WAIVER — NOTE — LIABILITY OF INDORSER — ATTACHMENT — INTERVENTION.

1. A peremptory exception going to the cause of action is not waived by being referred to the merits, and tried and submitted with them.

2. The indorser of a promissory note only becomes the debtor of the holder after complying with the conditions of presentment at maturity, failure of maker to pay, and due notice given.

3. A demand against an indorser, brought before maturity, is properly rejected on exception to cause of action, or even under the general issue.

4. Creditors who have attached the same property may intervene in a prior attachment proceeding by another creditor, and oppose the maintenance thereof; and the prima facie proof of debt, which the law sanctions as sufficient to authorize their attachments, is also sufficient to maintain their interventions, without requiring them to anticipate the issues involved in their suits against their debtor, and to make such proof as would sustain a final judgment.

5. The attachment must stand or fall, according to state of facts at date of issuance, and the demand in this case is not of a nature to authorize an attachment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of East Baton Rouge; GEORGE W. BUCKNER, Judge.

Attachment by the H. B. Claflin Company against B. Feibleman & Co. Sweetzer, Pembroke & Co. and others intervened. From a judgment rejecting its claim as to three notes, and also sustaining the interveners', plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing refused.

Gus A. Breaux and Farrar, Jonas & Kruttschnitt, for appellant. Henry L. Lazarus and C. C. Bird, for defendants and appellees. Read & Goodale, for interveners, appellees.

FENNER, J. The H. B. Claflin Company instituted this attachment suit against the commercial firm of B. Feibleman & Co., claiming an indebtedness as due them by the defendant of $30,970.70, of which, however, the sum of $22,500 was claimed by them as holders of three promissory notes, of $7,500 each, which were made by the firm of Cohn & Feibleman, and indorsed by the defendant, and not due at the date of suit. The defendant firm promptly interposed an exception to the cause of action, on the ground "that the action is premature, and the debt not due." Subsequently, Sweetzer, Pembroke & Co. and sundry other alleged creditors of B. Feibleman & Co., who had levied attachments on the same property attached by the Claflin Company, intervened in this suit, and setting up that, as to the said claim for $22,500, it could not authorize or sustain an attachment, they prayed that, to this extent, the plaintiff's attachment be not sustained or recognized as inferior to their attachments. This intervention was put at issue by answer, and the defendants also appeared, and filed an answer to the principal suit, in which, first "reserving the benefit of the exception herein filed," they pleaded the general denial. On January 18th, on motion of defendants' counsel, without objection, the exception was referred to the merits. The cause was then assigned for trial instanter, and, after introduction of evidence and argument of counsel, was submitted to the court. Judgment was rendered in favor of the Claflin Company to the extent of the debt due, with recognition of their attachment privilege, but rejecting their demand on the three notes of $7,500 each, above referred to, and also sustaining the intervention of Sweetzer, Pembroke & Co. et al. From this judgment the Claflin Company appeals. The appellant claims that, by referring their exception to the merits, and by going to trial on the merits without requiring the court to pass upon the exception, defendant must be held to have waived the exception. It relies on the following authorities: Mix v. Creditors, 39 La. Ann. 624, 2 South. Rep. 391; Boone v. Carroll, 35 La. Ann. 284; Chaffe v. Ludeling, 34 La. Ann. 966; Francis v. Lavine, 26 La. Ann. 312. Reference to them will show that they apply only to dilatory or declinatory exceptions, the effect of which is only to retard, or change the forum of, the action. The exception here is not of that character. It is, by its terms, an exception to the "cause of action," based on the elementary proposition that the indorser of a promissory note incurs no other obligation except to pay in case the maker, on due demand at maturity, shall fail to pay, and in case due and legal notice thereof shall be given to him. Hence, before maturity, the indorser is not the debtor of the holder, who has no cause of action against him. Such a defense would be conclusive under the general issue, or even on application to confirm a default. It was never waived by defendants, was entirely susceptible of being referred to and tried with the merits as part of them, and, in point of fact, the judgment, though it does not mention the exception, is obviously based upon it.

We think, moreover, the interveners properly established their right to intervene. They were attaching creditors of the same property, and made their attachment proceedings parts of their petition. These exhibited the prima facie proof of debt which the law sanctions as sufficient to authorize the attachment, and, if they were authorized to attach, they were authorized to intervene, and to protect their attachment from being nullified by the allowance of a preference in favor of a prior illegal attachment. They were not bound to anticipate the issues involved in their suit against the debtor by proof of their claims, such as would sustain a final judgment against him. Their interest is too palpable to admit of dispute, since the maintenance of plaintiff's attachment would render their own futile. The case is fully within the authority of Bank v. Moss, 41 La. Ann. 227, 6 South. Rep. 25, where we held that an attachment must stand or fall according to the state of facts existing at date of issuance; that, in order to sustain it, the debt must be unconditional; and hence that the holder of a bill of exchange, not yet due, cannot attach against the drawer of the bill, because his liability does not arise until after compliance with the conditions of presentment at maturity, failure of the drawee to pay, and due notice. We can discover no error in the judgment appealed from.

Judgment affirmed.

ON REHEARING.

WATKINS, J. The importance of the questions involved, and the earnestness with which the application has been presented, have induced us to re-examine the case. Counsel do not, however, seem to be in agreement as to the character of the questioned contract of the defendants, —one presenting the theory that, notwithstanding averment is made in the petition that their contract is one of indorsement, yet they are entitled to take judgment against them as principal debtors, on the proof in the record, admitted without objection; while that presented by other counsel is that, in truth, they are either securities in solido, or solidary obligors, and bound primarily. In addition to the foregoing, the point is made and insisted upon that the interveners are merely ordinary litigants, tendering issues of fact for trial, which they are bound to establish, and, failing to do so, are not entitled to recover. The case before us is a controversy between the plaintiff, as first attaching creditor of B. Feibleman & Co., defendants, and the interveners as second attaching creditors of the same property; the latter claiming the right to prime the former in the distribution of the proceeds thereof, after the defendants' absolute indebtedness has been satisfied therefrom. It is error to insist that interveners seek to obtain a judgment in this suit against the defendants. They are only seeking to reduce and restrict the amount of plaintiff's judgment against them, so as to enable them to realize something out of the property attached. Manifestly, the defendants' exception and answer cannot affect their right. All that is necessary in order to entitle a party to intervene in a pending suit between other parties is that his petition shall disclose an interest in the success of either party, or an interest opposed to both parties. Code Pr. § 390. The proposition on which the interveners mainly depend is that the plaintiff's demand, to the extent of $22,500, is based upon indorsements of B. Feibleman & Co. upon the notes of Cohn & Feibleman, drawn to their own order, and by them indorsed, and made payable at a future date, and not due at date of suit; and that on such indorsements no attachment will lie, because the obligation of an indorser is conditional only, and cannot become absolute until the maker is in default for nonpayment, and due presentment, protest, and notice have been made. In the assertion and maintenance of such a proposition interveners certainly had an interest, and, in support of such plea, it was only necessary that they should allege and prove the existence of their attachments, and the character of the defendants' contract. The assertion of their interest does not depend at all upon the validity of interveners' claims against the defendants, for that is not an issue in this case. Defendants objected to the introduction of evidence tending to establish them. The real object of their demand is to diminish the plaintiff's claim against the defendants, so that the extent of their privilege on the property attached might be correspondingly reduced. In order that this object be accomplished, it became necessary that the claims of the interveners should be presented "to the court by whose mandate the property was first seized," so that it should "proceed to class the privileges * * * according to their rank, * * * in a summary manner," etc. Rev. St. § 2903. From the record it appears that the three notes in controversy are each for the sum of $7,500, drawn by Cohn & Feibleman as makers, payable to their own order at the Importers' & Traders' National Bank of New York, and by them indorsed in blank. They matured, respectively, on the 27th of November and December 12, 1890, and 10th of January, 1891, and suit was filed and service on the 1st of December, 1890, the very date on which the first note went to maturity. Upon each of those notes the name of B. Feibleman & Co. is indorsed in blank, immediately underneath that of Cohn & Feibleman, without any accompanying explanatory statement. On the same date, and contemporaneously with the service of citation, a protest of said note was made, and due notice given to both makers and indorsers, the evident purpose thereof being to fix the liability of the defendants.

Viewing defendants' contract as one of indorsement, pure and simple, this protest, made, as it was, in the city of New Orleans, was altogether unavailing, because the note was payable at a bank in New York, and could not be presented for payment elsewhere. It is a familiar principle that the indorser's "undertaking is not general, but conditional upon due diligence being used against the principal debtor, and such diligence requires presentment at the place specified, where it is presumed that funds have been provided to meet the bill at maturity." 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 644, (3d Ed.) Inasmuch as this protest was insufficient to place liability upon defendants, the three notes occupy very much the same position in this case, the defendants having become exonerated from the payment of the first, and their liability on the other two not having become absolute at date of suit.

The controversy is thus narrowed to the single question, whether B. Feibleman & Co. were really, as matter of law, sureties of the makers, notwithstanding plaintiff's averment that they are indorsers. This court has frequently held the law to be well settled that one not a party to a bill or note, who puts his name upon it, is presumed to have done so as surety; and that, in such case, his obligation will not be that of an indorser, under the principles of the commercial law. Cooley v. Lawrence, 4 Mart. (La.) 639; Guidrey v. Vives, 3 Mart. (N. S.) 659; Smith v. Gorton, 10 La. 374; Lawrence v. Oakey, 14 La. 386; Gilbert v. Cooper, 4 Rob. (La.) 161; McGuire v. Bostworth, 1 La. Ann. 248; Drew v. Robertson, 2 La. Ann. 592; McCausland v. Lyons, 4 La. Ann. 273; Chorn v. Merrill, 9 La. Ann. 533; Richard v. Butman, 14 La. Ann. 144; Weaver v. Marvel, 12 La. Ann. 517; Collins v. Trist, 20 La. Ann. 348; Field v. Newspaper Co., 21 La. Ann. 25; Adams v. Gordon, 22 La. Ann. 41; Rogers v. Gibbs, 24 La. Ann. 468. This rule is well recognized by text writers. Story, Prom. Notes, passim; Chit. Bills, p. 435; 1 Pars. Notes & B. 521 et seq. But it is just as well settled that the foregoing rule is exclusively applicable to bills or notes payable to order, and which are subsequently indorsed by one not originally party thereto; the real purpose and object of an indorsement being to transfer the property in a bill or note, and to effect a legal delivery thereof to the indorsee. From this settled principle it follows that it has no application to such notes as those in controversy, same being payable to bearer, and not to order; for Mr. Daniels has justly observed of the proposition under consideration, to wit: "If the note be payable to bearer, either in terms, or becomes so in effect, by being made payable to the maker's order, and then being indorsed by him, in either case the party who places his name on the back of it will be deemed an indorser only." 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. p. 635, § 707*a*, (3d Ed.) The author cites in support of this proposition the very clear and pertinent opinion of the Massachusetts court, as expressed in Bigelow v. Colton, 13 Gray, 309, to the effect that, in case the note is payable to and indorsed by the maker, "it does not fall within that anomalous class where a third person, neither maker nor payee, puts his name on the back of a note, before its indorsement by the payee, but is the ordinary case of an indorsement of a note payable to bearer, the effect of which cannot be varied or controlled by parol proof." We have no hesitation in accepting this interpretation of the principles of the law merchant, and they are especially applicable to this case.

Applying them to the contract in question, there is not a doubt in our minds that it was one of indorsement, pure and simple, and not of suretyship or unconditional obligation. Nor, in our opinion, does it matter materially that certain parol proof was introduced in reference to the disposition that was made of the proceeds of the discounted paper, and without objection on the part of interveners. The evidence referred to is as follows, viz.: "Question. Is the firm of B. Feibleman & Co. and Cohn & Feibleman practically one concern? Answer. Yes, sir; except with different partners. I had most of the money in both of them. Q. What was done with the proceeds of these notes? A. It was first handed to Cohn & Feibleman, and then paid to me. I paid B. Feibleman's accounts with it, and continued our business. Q. The three notes of $7,500, you mean? A. Yes, sir. Q. The proceeds of these notes were used, then, for the payment of debts created for the benefit of B. Feibleman & Co.? A. Yes, sir." It shows that Cohn & Feibleman really discounted the paper, it may be for the benefit of the defendants; but that can make no possible difference, as, presumably, every indorser receives a consideration for his signature. It shows, further, that, if Cohn & Feibleman did discount their own paper, it was apparently indorsed by the defendants at the time, and the money was expended for their benefit. Evidently, when interpreted in the light of this evidence, the undertaking of the defendants was conditional, and not absolute. A careful investigation of the law and evidence, and a comparison of our opinion made therewith, have served to confirm us in the correctness of our opinion, and therefore a rehearing is refused.

BRELET v. MULLEN. (No. 10,922.)

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—PROBABLE CAUSE—BONA FIDES OF PROSECUTOR.

1. It is universally held that a criminal proceeding, having been brought or prosecuted maliciously and without probable cause, affords, when terminated, the basis of an action in damages for malicious prosecution against the one bringing or prosecuting such proceeding.

2. In order that a plaintiff may maintain such an action three things must concur: (1) The motive must have been malicious; (2) the suit must have been instituted without any probable cause; (3) the suit must have terminated, after trial of its merits, in favor of the accused.

3. It is malice, composed of bad feeling and knowledge of the want of probable cause, which creates liability.

4. Public interest and a proper administration of justice require that such actions should not be maintained except in clear cases.

5. Courts will not inflict damages on a party resorting in good faith to law for the protection of his rights, rather than taking the chance of a recourse to arms, or tamely submitting to a usurper.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Action by Alexander Brelet against James Mullen for damages for a malicious arrest and prosecution. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and a new judgment entered.

W. R. Richardson and James Timony, for appellant. Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellee.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This is a suit in damages for a malicious arrest and prosecution, for $5,000. The petition contains the usual charge of malicious arrest and prosecution without probable cause, discharge after trial, and injury sustained; and the answer is a denegation of the averments. From a judgment for $250 by the judge the defendant appeals, and the plaintiff, on appeal, asks an increase to the amount originally claimed. It appears that in 1883 a city ordinance was passed, in pursuance of which the side of the revetment levee, at West End, not covered by grants to the New Orleans City Railroad Company, was divided into lots, and leases were made to various parties. One Carroll, who obtained one of the leases or permits to occupy, placed some improvements on his spot, subsequently selling his right thereto to one Minnie Wilson, who afterwards, on the 10th of March, 1890, by public act sold or transferred hers to Mary Boylan, the wife of defendant, including "buildings and improvements," for $600, acknowledged to have been paid. Under the impression that a certain structure existing between the revetment levee and the shore proper, and used as a "necessary," or place of convenience for ladies and children, had been erected upon the spot, the permit to occupy which had been purchased by his wife, Mullen, the defendant, thought he had a right to take possession of it for her. Finding it locked, and informed that it was in the possession or under the control of the railroad company, he went to the mayor's office to ascertain how the matter stood. The title to the spot was exhibited to the mayor, who, after hearing Mullen's complaint, compared it with the plan or map of West End, and found that it referred to lot No. 9 upon it. He then told Mullen the piece was his, (meaning his wife's, no doubt,) and to go and take possession of it. Thereupon Mullen, finding the building closed, entered it, and took possession of it, placing obstructions within, to prevent all entering into it. Subsequently a woman, who had the key of the building or structure, finding that the door had been barred, complained of her inability to enter to the plaintiff, Brelet, who is a police officer, commissioned by the mayor, but paid by the railroad company at West End, and put on duty at that place. This authority broke into the structure, removed the obstacles, and placed the woman in possession. Subsequently Mullen remonstrated with the person who held the key, who directed him to complain to the company, if he had any cause for grievance. Mullen did not follow the advice, but went again to the mayor, stating what occurred. The result of the interview was that the officer was sent for by the mayor, who stated the complaint against him, and advised him on the subject, favorably to Mrs. Mullen's pretentions. The officer denies that the mayor told him not to break into the premises; but he states that had he done so, and, had the railroad company directed him otherwise, to the reverse, he would have rather obeyed the latter. Be this as it may, the fact is that, after Mullen had placed other obstructions, Brelet broke into and entered the premises, putting the woman in possession again of it, thus championing, at his peril, the presumed right of others. Thereupon Mullen reported the fact once more to the mayor, who told him to take possession again, and to make a charge against whomever would interfere with the place. Then it was that Mullen went before the recorder, made a charge against Brelet for breaking and entering, upon which the latter was nominally arrested, taken to the recorder, who released him without bail. The matter came up before the magistrate, who dismissed the charge. Heard as a witness, he said that he did so because the case involved a title to property, which he declined to go into. It appears that some publicity was given of the arrest of Brelet, and that his discharge was also announced. Under those circumstances, $5,000 damages are claimed.

"It is universally held that a criminal proceeding, having been brought or prosecuted maliciously and without probable cause, affords, when terminated, the basis of an action of malicious prosecution against the one so bringing or prosecuting such proceeding." 14 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, "Malicious Prosecution," p. 25. "In order that the plaintiff may maintain this action, three things must concur: (1) The motive of the party instituting or prosecuting the suit or proceeding must have been malicious; (2) the suit or proceeding complained of must have been instituted without any probable cause therefor; (3) the suit must be terminated." Id. p. 17. A thoughtful consideration of the facts of this cause does not impress the mind with the conclusion that Mullen acted with malice, and without probable cause. The balance of probabilities rather preponderates the other way. His whole course indicates that, as a faithful husband, anxious of protecting the interest of his wife, he did all in good faith which ordinary prudence and discretion could suggest. He really thought that the structure in question had been put up on the lot, the right of occupancy of which his wife had purchased from one who indirectly held it from the city, which was a sort of warrantor. Before using violence or even taking any legal step against the party who had broken into it and placed another person in possession of it, Mullen thought it prudent to go to the city hall, and ascertain from the officer representing the city as to his wife's right to the occupancy of the structure. After comparing the act of sale with the map of West End, the mayor told him the building was on the spot, and to take possession of it. He did so, but, after the structure had been again broken into, he returned to the mayor, and, on his suggestion, made the charge against Brelet, the dismissal of which caused the bringing of the present suit. There is nothing to show any actual or constructive malice in any of Mullen's acts and doings in the premises. Under the circumstances, he had probable cause. If it be true that the structure is on the spot, and that Mrs. Mullen acquired the right of occupying and enjoying the same, it is clear that she had a good cause to have any one arrested who interfered with it; the more so, as the mayor, who is the authority who has the control of the police force of the city, thus said, and advised the bringing of the charge. The inquiry of the mayor, and his suggestions, are perhaps better than legal advice from counsel learned in the law, in a case of this description.

It may be asked further whether the prosecution has terminated, so as to justify a suit for malicious arrest by one who had no authority to intermeddle as he did. The merits of the charge were not inquired into, and the dismissal of the proceeding does not amount to an acquittal. The recorder said that he would not go into the question of ownership, and discharged the accused. Another accusation could be brought against him, were it in time, and did the facts warrant another prosecution. In a kindred recent case, in which the owners of two contiguous lots quarreled as to the spot on which a division fence should be placed, surveyors disagreeing, and the one caused the arrest and trial of the other, who was subsequently discharged, a suit in damages was brought for malicious prosecution, this court had occasion to review somewhat extensively the law applicable to cases of this character, and it declined to allow damages. It held that it is not always that malice and want of probable cause can be inferred from the dismissal of a charge against an accused before a committing magistrate, and that, if the discharge be prima facie evidence, the presumption may be rebutted. It also held that, in the absence of facts showing malice and want of probable cause, which are essential ingredients, no recovery can be had. It is the malice, composed of bad feeling and the knowledge of the want of a probable and just cause, which creates liability. Public interest and a proper administration of justice require that actions for malicious prosecutions should not be maintained without clear proof of malice and want of probable cause. Courts cannot inflict damages on a party for resorting in good faith to law for the protection of his rights, rather than taking the chance of a recourse to arms, or tamely abandoning the field to a usurper. Girot v. Graham, 41 La. Ann. 511, 6 South. Rep. 815. See, also, Maloney v. Doane, 15 La. 278; McCormick v. Conway, 12 La. Ann. 53; Lisk v. Mathis, 11 La. Ann. 419; Godfrey v. Soniat, 33 La. Ann. 915; Coleman v. Insurance Co., 36 La. Ann. 92; Dearmond v. St. Amant, 40 La. Ann. 374, 4 South. Rep. 72; Macias v. Lorio, 41 La. Ann. 301, 6 South. Rep. 538; Ivers v. Ryan, 42 La. Ann. 32, 7 South. Rep. 61. The circumstances of this case do not show malice in the defendant and a want of probable cause, and do not warrant the infliction of damages on him. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be avoided and reversed, and that there now be judgment rejecting plaintiff's demand, and relieving defendant from the claim; plaintiff to pay costs in both courts.

STATE ex rel. BLOCK et al. v. RIGHTOR, Judge. (No. 11,026.)

ATTACHMENT—INTERVENTION—SUSPENSIVE APPEAL—AMOUNT OF BOND—MANDAMUS.

The ruling in 22 La. Ann. 115, (State v. Judge,) has no bearing. The case is not analogous, as there was no fund in court for distribution.

ON REHEARING.

1. The law fixes no standard for the amount of the bond to be given by a party who wishes to take a suspensive appeal from a judgment refusing him a participation in funds in the hands of the court. A bond for costs is sufficient. The appellant can be condemned to pay nothing else.

2. A bond for more would be oppressive, and an idle ceremony.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application of Elias Block & Sons for a writ of mandamus to compel N. H. Rightor, judge, to grant the relators a suspensive appeal on a certain bond for costs. Writ allowed. Rehearing refused.

W. S. Benedict, for relators. Henry L. Lazarus and Hunter C. Leake, for respondent.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This is an application for a mandamus to compel the district judge to grant the relators a suspensive appeal on a bond for costs. The averments are that C. Lazard & Co., having brought suit against Henry Block & Co. for $31,000 and more, coupled with an attachment, under which property was seized and money realized to a large amount, ($10,000 or more,) which are in the sheriff's hands, Elias Block & Sons intervened, claiming to be creditors of the defendants, levying their attachment on the same property, and traversing the claim of the original plaintiffs; that, after trial, the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiffs, rejecting the intervention of Elias Block & Sons; that thereupon the latter applied for a suspensive appeal from the judgment so rendered, tendering a bond for $2,000, but that the judge declined to accept said bond, and required one to be furnished, according to law, less the amount in the sheriff's hands, meaning a bond for one half over and above the difference between the amount of the judgment and that in the sheriff's hands. The district judge substantially answers that the bond required by him is that prescribed by law, for the reason that a third party is no more allowed to suspend a money judgment on a bond for costs than the defendant in the case could, and therefore that such party is bound to furnish a bond for the same amount that the defendant would have to give should he apply for a suspensive appeal. The only effect of the appeal taken within the 10 days following the signature of the judgment would be to prevent a distribution, as far as the interveners are concerned, of the moneys in the sheriff's hands. The law fixes no standard for the amount of the bond to be given by a party who wishes to take a suspensive appeal from a judgment refusing him a participation with others in a fund in the hands of the court. A bond for costs is sufficient. Blanchin v. The Fashion, 10 La. Ann. 345. See, also, State v. Judge, 20 La. Ann. 108; State v. Judge, 22 La. Ann. 178; State v. Judges, 27 La. Ann. 685; State v. Judge, 30 La. Ann. 314; Succession of Gohs, 37 La. Ann. 428. The bond could only be for the satisfaction by the surety of the judgment to be rendered on appeal, should the principal fail to pay it. In no event could the relators be condemned, on appeal, to pay more than the costs. Requiring a bond for more would be oppressive, and an idle formality. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the mandamus prayed for be made peremptory, and that the suspensive appeal asked be allowed on the bond of $2,000 offered, which appears to be ample.

ON REHEARING.

(April 4, 1892.)

Article 579, Code of Practice, distinctly provides that the appeal bond must set forth in substance that it is given as surety that the appellant shall satisfy whatever judgment may be rendered against him on appeal. It is palpable that on appeal he could not be condemned to pay a judgment rendered against some one else, and that the only one which could be pronounced against him, as a dismissed plaintiff, appealing, would be for costs. Reference to the case of State v. Judge, 22 La. Ann. 115, affords relator no relief. It is not an analogous case, as there was no fund in court. The question whether the appeal by the relators would suspend the further execution of the judgment against the defendants and the garnishees does not arise here, and is not decided, although it may well be that it does not, so as to realize money for distribution, without making any repartition. The funds are arrested only to an amount sufficient to meet the claim of relators.

BERTHELOT v. FITCH et al. (No. 10,917.)

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—COLLATION—LIABILITY OF DONEE FOR RENTS—TAXES AND INSURANCE—LANDS IN FOREIGN STATE—PARTITION—APPEAL.

1. Collation is founded on the equality which should prevail among children, and the purpose is to restore the property or its value to the succession, so that the heir will receive his portion as if no donation had been made.

2. If, as to immovables, the donee elect to collate in kind, the property belongs to the succession as of the date of the donor's death.

3. He will be charged rent for the property from the time of the opening of the succession.

4. He is entitled during that time to the taxes paid by him, and the insurance.

5. He also has the right to repairs, made at his expense, covered by the provisions of articles 1256 and 1257 of the Revised Civil Code.

6. The donee of movables must collate by taking less. Article 1283, Rev. Civil Code.

7. The waiver of all rights by the usufructuary in favor of one of the heirs, in so far as concerns her portion, does not give valid cause to object to a partition. The usufructuary has the right to waive the entire right.

8. She can therefore waive a part on property falling to one of heirs.

9. The defendant who has not appealed cannot avail himself of the appeal of his codefendant.

10. A judgment cannot be amended as between coappellees.

11. Immovable property in another state, belonging to heirs, must be administered under its laws.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Suit by Emma Berthelot against Mrs. J. E. Fitch, Mrs. W. D. Maginnis, and Catherine Henderson. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing refused.

H. P. Dart, for appellant. Farrar, Jonas & Kruttschnitt, for appellee Mrs. Fitch. W. S. Benedict, for appellee Mrs. W. D. Maginnis. Gilmore & Baldwin, for appellee Mrs. Catherine Henderson.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiff petitions for a partition as one of the heirs of her late father, John Henderson, and to have returned to the mass of the succession, either in kind or by taking less, the property which two of the heirs have received in advance of their shares, in order that the property may be divided, together with the other effects of the succession. One of the heirs filed an exception to the suit on the ground that prior it was necessary to know the amount of assets and liabilities of the succession, in order that the judgment might settle the rights of the parties. The court overruled this exception. This heir denies, in her answer, that she is indebted to the succession. She also denies that any collation is due by her. She alleges that her brothers and sisters have received from their father an amount equal to that which she has received. Another heir admits that she received real estate from her father, and adds that only half is subject to collation, because her mother is living, and the property donated belonged to the community. The remaining heirs also pleaded the general issue, and express their consent to a partition, subject to the right of usufruct of their mother. The latter is also a party to the suit. In her answer she admits that she has waived the usufruct allowed her by law on the share of plaintiff in the estate of her father. The judge of the district court ordered a partition to be made, and the judgment decrees that the heirs shall collate the property donated, and the taxes, insurance on the property, and that necessary repairs be deducted from the time mentioned in the judgment. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

The order overruling the said exception gives no ground for defense, for the purpose of the suit is to ascertain the assets and liabilities of the succession. Proof of these cannot be required as a condition precedent to maintain the suit. The judge orders the partition, and regulates the manner in which it shall be made, as well as the collations. They are among the first acts to establish the assets and the liabilities of the succession.

ON THE MERITS.

Collation is founded on the absolute equality which should prevail in dividing property of the father and mother among children or other lawful descendants. The donations made did not stipulate that they constituted an extra portion. At the time of the donor's death they were in excess of the disposable portion of his estate. The court, in the judgment appealed from, fixed the value of the immovable property at the time the succession was opened, and at which the collation should be made, in the event that the donees elect to collate by taking less, as required by article 1269, Rev. Civil Code. The appreciation of the testimony in this respect by the district judge impressed us as being just and eminently correct,—that donated to Mrs. Maginnis at $14,000; that donated to Mrs. Fitch, $3,100. The latter is properly ordered to collate one half the property donated to her by her father as head and master of the community.

With reference to the expenses on the immovable property in case the donor elects to collate in kind. The court aqua ordered that the donees be charged with the rental of the property from the opening of the succession, and fixed the amount due by Mrs. Maginnis at $80 per month on the immovable property donated to her. This was proven as being a fair amount, and was properly allowed. We do not discover any error in ordering that the necessary repairs, taxes, and insurance paid during the time the rent is charged on the property be deducted. They were useful and unavoidable expense during the time that rent was being paid. Expenses on immovable property, in case of collation, are distinguishable by three kinds,—necessary, useful, and those for mere pleasure. The first are chargeable when they were necessary to preserve the thing. The second should be deducted when the value of the real estate has been enhanced thereby. The third should not be charged at all. The donor has the right to take them away, if he can, without injuring the estate, and leave things in the situation they were at the time of the donation. With reference to necessary repairs, it is said that the donee has the right to reimbursement when he has acted as a prudent administrator should, and has had the work done as cheaply as possible, and has acted for the best in every respect. "The de cujus would have been obliged to make the expense had he been the owner. He could not have had the repairs made for less. It is therefore just that the succession should indemnify the donees." 2 Baudry Lacantinerie, p. 186. This commentator illustrates what are necessary repairs by reference to the reconstruction of a wall threatening to fall; the elevation of an embankment to prevent loss. The useful repairs are such as a prudent owner would make. They must be substantial, and improve the value of the property. The reasons for judgment and the judgment establish that necessary repairs and useful repairs improving the value of the property are to be deducted, such as the cost of Barber asphalt pavement, $602, and the amount paid F. Jehnke also for paving, $270, to which the donee has a right. The donee has no claim for expense in substituting one iron fence for another, it being proven that the first was not out of repair. The other items which are not covered by the definition of "repairs improving the value of the property or necessary," must be rejected. The same principle applies in all respects to the Fitch immovable property of the other defendant. The plaintiff alone appeals. All the appellees except one have filed an answer to the appeal alleged to have been taken by Mrs. Anna Lee Maginnis. She is not an appellant. As between the appellees the several demands were passed upon by the judgment below. There can be heard on appeal only those who are actually appellants. Lawrence v. Burris, 12 La. Ann.

846. Therefore the question of repairs is reduced to the issue presented by the appeal against those called upon to collate.

Usufruct. One of the defendants files an objection on the ground that the survivor in community has no right to renounce her usufruct in favor of one of the heirs. The waiver was made in favor of plaintiff, who is one of the owners. If, after the partition, or even before, the usufructuary waives her right as to an heir, this gives no valid objection to the partition of the property. She has the right to waive the whole; she therefore can waive a part. Totum in toto et totum in qualibet parte.

The movable property must be collated by taking less at its appraised value at the time of the donation. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1283. The value was correctly fixed, we think. The wear and decay since they were purchased and presented to the donees should not be taken into account in establishing the rights of the parties, for the donee of movables is bound to collate their value at the time of donation. We agree with the learned judge of the district court that plaintiff has received no property from her father, and owes no debts for which she is bound to collate. The claims made, if proven, come within the exemption stated in article 1244 of the Revised Civil Code.

One of the defendants claim that certain real estate in Mississippi should be brought into the settlement of the succession. The question was not passed upon by the court a qua. Neither in the reason for judgment nor in the judgment is there anything stated about real estate, in which the succession has interest, in another state. In the absence of any decision as to this property, by the court below, this court will not decide any issue affecting it.

In the second place, the claim is made by one of the appellees against her coappellees. The judgment cannot be amended as between them. We see no reason, however, not to add that immovable property in another state, belonging to heirs, must be administered under its laws. Abercrombie v. Caffray, 3 Mart. (N. S.) 1; Cole's Widow v. His Executors, 7 Mart. (N. S.) 44; Succession of Packwood, 12 Rob. (La.) 366; Packwood v. Packwood, 9 Rob. (La.) 438; Dunbar v. Dunbar, 5 La. Ann. 158; King v. Neely, 14 La. Ann. 165. We will not alter the judgment. The decree does substantial justice. Judgment affirmed, at appellants' costs.

ON REHEARING.

(April 4, 1892.)

Our attention on rehearing is directed to an error committed by the draughtsman of the judgment in the district court. It was evidently an oversight on his part. It escaped our attention. The district judge, in his reasons for judgment, says: "In this case, if Mrs. Maginnis collates in kind, she owes rent, which the evidence proves to be $80 a month, from the date of the opening of the succession, from which must be deducted all necessary repairs." In our opinion a paragraph is headed with "reference to the expenses on the immovable property in the case the donor elects to collate in kind," and we ordered that the donees be charged with the rental of the property from the opening of the succession, and fixed the amount due by Mrs. Maginnis for rent at $80 a month on immovable property donated to her; and that the necessary repairs, taxes, and insurance paid during the time rent is charged on the property be deducted, should the donors elect to collate in kind. It happens by the said inadvertence that the decree reads: "If the parties elect to collate said immovable by taking less, the rent of the Magazine street property is hereby fixed at eighty dollars," etc. This inadvertence we now correct by substituting for said words the following, viz.: "Should said defendant elect to collate said immovables in kind, the rent of the Jackson street property, donated to the defendant Mrs. Maginnis, is fixed at eighty dollars a month." The judgment having been amended and made to comply with the records for judgment in the district court and with the decision of this court, as amended it is affirmed, without granting a rehearing, all parties in interest having been heard; the appellees to pay costs of appeal.

Rehearing refused.

BONIEL v. BLOCK. (No. 10,864.)[1]

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. March 21, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—ILLEGAL EJECTION OF TENANT—DAMAGES.

1. A house owner, who has served the notice provided by Act 96 of 1888, and has followed it by ejectment proceedings provided therein, acknowledges that the party so proceeded against and occupying his house is a tenant, and is estopped from subsequently denying it.

2. Where a landlord, instead of resorting to the means provided by law, takes upon himself, without authority, to remove the property of his tenant, and to turn him out, he will be liable in damages, though the ejectment was effected without personal violence, in the tenant's absence.

3. It is no defense that the business conducted by the tenant was illegal, or that the latter was claimed to be in default in payment of his rent. The law provides remedies for such wrongs, and does not sanction private redress.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; NICHOLAS H. RIGHTOR, Judge.

Action by Moses A. Boniel against Henry Block to recover certain damages. From a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified. Rehearing refused.

Moise & Titche, for appellant. Lionel Adams, Gus A. Breaux, and Henry L. Lazarus, for appellee.

FENNER, J. The allegations which constitute the cause of action may be briefly stated as follows: (1) That plaintiff had rented a house from the defendant, and occupied the same as a tenant, and was conducting a grocery business therein, with a stock of groceries. (2) That one Edwards, acting under the authority and direction of the defendant, forcibly entered the house in his absence, removed his goods, and took possession of the premises. (3) That said acts were illegal, and occasioned him damage, for which the defendant is responsible. The defense is a general denial. The case was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for $1,500, from which the defendant appeals.

[1] Rehearing refused April 18, 1892.

It cannot be denied that the petition sets forth a good cause of action, if the allegations are proved.

1. The defendant is conclusively estopped from denying that plaintiff occupied the house under a contract of lease from him by the following notice, signed by himself and served on plaintiff: "New Orleans, April 12th, 1889. Mr. Boniel: You are hereby notified to vacate the property now occupied by you at the corner of Munroe and Newton streets for failing to comply with the verbal lease entered into by you. This notice is in conformity with Act 96 of 1888." This notice was followed by a suit brought under the act referred to, which was a judicial admission of the relation of landlord and tenant, under the very terms of the act.

2. It is proved to our entire satisfaction that Edwards, claiming to act by defendant's authority, had gone to Boniel, and demanded the key and possession of the property, which Boniel refused; that Edwards then told him that he intended to take possession, and that Boniel warned him that, if he did, he and Mr. Block would be held responsible; that Edwards then went to a locksmith, and had a key so filed as to fit the lock of the house; that subsequently, in plaintiff's absence, leaving the house locked up, Edwards returned, unlocked the door with a false key, entered, removed the plaintiff's counter and goods, and took possession. When plaintiff returned, and found what had been done, he caused Edwards to be arrested for trespass. When plaintiff resumed possession of the premises, he was called upon by one Levy, an employe of the defendant, who was sent by the latter again to demand the keys, and the interview resulted in an altercation, in which plaintiff was knocked down and severely beaten. After this he concluded to abandon the premises, and rented and moved into another house. It is not pretended that defendant is responsible for this assault, and it is unnecessary to determine who was in fault. It was only admitted, and is referred to, to explain plaintiff's final abandonment.

3. The evidence is, to our minds, equally clear that, in all that he did, Edwards acted under the authority and direction of defendant. Edwards' statements, in connection with his acts themselves, though properly admitted as part of the res gestæ, to prove rem ipsam, would not operate as proof of authority when made out of defendant's presence; but there is other testimony of statements by Edwards in the presence of defendant, and of defendant's own statements, to sustain the authority, particularly in view of the significant fact that the defendant, though testifying as a witness, does not even intimate a denial of Edwards' authority.

The foregoing findings are sufficient to sustain the action of plaintiff. It is no defense to say that the business conducted by plaintiff was illegal, being the kind of business described in State v. Boneil, 42 La. Ann. 1110, 8 South. Rep. 298. Defendant was not charged with any function as an officer of the law, and if, as a citizen, he desired to vindicate the law, the course pointed out was entirely different from that here pursued. Neither is the charge that Boniel had not complied with the terms of his lease of any avail. There was a dispute as to whether Boniel was bound, under his lease, to pay his rent in advance. Even if he were so bound, and had failed to comply, defendant's remedy was at law, and not by such proceedings as those here taken. Counsel for defendant has quoted some common-law authorities which are no doubt of great weight in the cases to which they apply; but, so far as this case is concerned, we prefer to rest it upon the memorable case of Thayer v. Littlejohn, (decided by this court,) 1 Rob. (La.) 140, in which the doctrine, ever since followed by this court, was laid down, that, "where a landlord, instead of resorting to the means provided by law for obtaining payment of his rent and possession of his premises, takes upon himself, without authority, to remove the property and turn out the family of his tenant, he will be liable in damages; and it will be no excuse that such removal was effected without violence or injury." See, also, Van Wren v. Flynn, 34 La. Ann. 1158.

We have observed the stress laid by counsel upon his numerous bills of exception to the admission and rejecting of evidence, and have considered them all carefully. We need not review them. Several of them are disposed of by our ruling that defendant was estopped from denying the fact of a lease. Others are eliminated by other views above expressed. The only one sufficiently important to require special notice is that excluding the evidence of Edwards, taken by defendant's counsel at his office, and out of the presence of opposite counsel, but in alleged compliance with Act 84 of 1868. Mere reference to that act will show that the testimony was not taken in compliance with the requirements of that act, and that it would be inadmissible, unless compliance with those requirements had been waived by consent of counsel. There was no agreement in writing, and the counsel disagree in their statement of the facts. Plaintiff's counsel states that, when he received a verbal notice from defendant's counsel that he wanted to take Edwards' testimony, he sent back the message that "he did not desire to be present at the taking of the testimony, that he reserved all legal objections, and reserved the right to cross-examine the witness." This was certainly not a waiver of any requirements of the statute. Defendant's counsel gives a different statement. This court declines to decide such delicate differences, and requires that "all agreements of counsel on which the court is to act must be in writing." Rule 9, § 3. The testimony, therefore, stands as not taken according to the statute and without any waiver. Although the particular objection on which the court acted may not have been sound, the testimony was objected to, and was not legally admissible. The testimony was not brought up with the bill, and we know nothing of its nature or importance. We cannot remand the case on this ground.

The damages allowed by the jury are excessive. In the case of Thayer v. Littlejohn, above referred to, the damages allowed, in absence of proof of direct pecuniary injury, were $300. We think that $200 additional will cover the actual pecuniary loss of this plaintiff. It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the verdict and judgment appealed from be amended by reducing the amount thereof to $500, and that as thus amended the same be now affirmed; appellee to pay costs of appeal.

CARONDELET CANAL NAV. CO. v. CITY OF NEW ORLEANS. (No. 10,884.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. Jan. 18, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

FINAL JUDGMENT—FAILURE TO SIGN—DEFECTIVE RECORD—TAXATION—EXEMPTIONS—CONSIDERATION—PUBLIC BENEFITS.

1. A judgment which makes an injunction perpetual, and passes on the points at issue, after trial on the merits, is a final judgment.
2. A final judgment is incomplete until signed.
3. The court will notice ex officio that the judgment is not signed.

ON REHEARING.

Our former decree, dismissing this appeal because it appeared from the record that the judgment appealed from was unsigned, was correct; but under the showing now made, that the judgment had been duly signed, and that the omission from the record of the signed judgment was an error of the clerk, which had escaped the notice of the city's counsel, the public interests represented by the city justify us, under precedents of this court, in extending a more liberal relief than could be claimed by merely private litigants.

ON THE MERITS.

1. The Carondelet Canal Navigation Company was exempted from taxation by an amendment to its charter approved March 10, 1858.
2. The immunity was not repealed by article 207 of the constitution of 1879.
3. The public benefit anticipated from the corporation is sufficient consideration for the exemption. None other need be shown.
4. The plaintiff admits ownership on the part of the state.
5. The property, being a constituent part of the canal, incident thereto, and serving the purpose of the company by maintaining its navigation, is exempt from taxation.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge.

Suit by the Carondelet Canal Navigation Company against the city of New Orleans, to enjoin the collection of certain taxes. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Sommerville, Asst. City Atty., and Carleton Hunt, City Atty., for appellant. Charles Louque, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiff sued out an injunction, claiming exemption from taxation on the property described in the petition. The defendant presented the plea of general denial. The case was tried. The judgment appealed from, making the injunction perpetual and decreeing the exemption of the property, is not signed, nor is there any evidence that it has been actually signed. It was intended to be definitive, and to decide all the points in controversy. A judgment is incomplete until signed. That it may be appealed from, it must be signed. Saloy v. Collins, 30 La. Ann. 63; Jacob v. Preston, 31 La. Ann. 514. The court will notice, ex officio, that the judgment is not signed. Chartier v. Police Jury, 9 La. Ann. 42. Appeal is dismissed, at defendant's costs.

ON REHEARING.

FENNER, J. Finding, on the face of the record, that the judgment appealed from had not been signed, we only followed the settled precedents of this court in dismissing the appeal; and no one can question the correctness of our action. Now, however, the city of New Orleans shows, under certiorari, that the judgment was regularly rendered and signed in the lower court; that the clerk, in making up the transcript, had erroneously copied only the judgment entered on the minutes, instead of the signed judgment, and that the counsel of the city, misled by the complete certificate of the clerk, had, through inadvertence, omitted to notice the defect. Were ordinary litigants and private interests alone concerned, it would doubtless be too late to obtain relief; but we cannot permit the public interests represented by the city of New Orleans to suffer injury by such an inadvertence of counsel. Precedents justify us in extending such protection to municipal corporations with a more liberal allowance than in the case of private litigants. Millaudon v. First Municipality, 1 La. Ann. 215; Delabigarre v. Second Municipality, 3 La. Ann. 280; Police Jury v. McDonogh, 4 La. Ann. 352; Hassard v. Municipality No. Two, 7 La. Ann. 495. It is therefore ordered that a rehearing be granted, and, acting thereon, that our former decree herein be set aside, and that the case be reinstated, under submission for decision, in due course, on the merits.

ON THE MERITS.

BREAUX, J. Certain property fronting on Bayou St. John, near its mouth, was assessed for the year 1888 as the property of the plaintiff company. It is described as a lot of ground near the mouth of Bayou St. John, on its east bank, measuring 188 feet front on the bayou by 540 feet in depth. The collection of the taxes was being enforced by seizure and sale, when an injunction was sued out on the grounds that plaintiff is the lessee of the said property, and is entitled to the franchises of its predecessor, the Orleans Navigation Company, and that the property, being owned by the state, will revert to the state at the expiration of its charter, and that by section 9 of Act 74 of 1858 the canal is exempt from taxation. The court maintained plaintiff's injunction. From the judgment the defendant appeals.

The history of the plaintiff company has been so often made the subject of comments in different suits that we deem it proper only to refer briefly to the fact that the Bayou St. John was a natural stream, and that Canal Carondelet is known as the work of the Spanish governor whose name it bears. As public property, it became a part of the public domain at the cession of Louisiana. In 1805 the territorial legislature incorporated the Orleans Navigation Company, and made it the duty and gave the authority to that company to improve the canal and bayou. The company was authorized to buy and hold other property. The company, having violated its charter by not complying with its conditions, was dissolved. State v. Navigation Co., 7 La. Ann. 680. The New Orleans Canal & Navigation Company, its successor, having failed to comply with its obligations, the present company, the Carondelet Canal & Navigation Company, was incorporated, (Act No. 160 of 1857;) and the New Orleans Canal & Navigation Company transferred to it all their interests. This includes the lot of ground seized in this case. The said act limited the duration of the charter to 25 years, and provided that the state might at the expiration of that term become the owner on paying the corporation for its improvements and other property of which the plaintiff company has the enjoyment. In the event of an extension of 25 years the state reserved the right, without compensation, of becoming the absolute owner of the said property. Another act was passed in 1858. The corporate succession was extended 50 years from that time, and the property is to revert to the state on due compensation. Certain privileges and immunities were granted to the company,—among them, exemption from taxation until the expiration of the charter. The canal is under the control of the state. City of New Orleans v. Carondelet Canal & Nav. Co., 36 La. Ann. 396. The land on which taxes are claimed, plaintiff admits in its petition and in its brief, belongs to the state. It was donated by congress on April 18, 1814. The act exempting the plaintiff has not been repealed.

The case falls within the doctrine laid down in Home of the Friendless v. Rouse, 8 Wall. 430, and Asylum v. New Orleans, 105 U. S. 362. Act 74 of 1858 amends and is a component part of Act 160 of 1857. The act of exemption establishes a consideration. In several decisions the benefits to accrue to the community are specially set forth. State v. New Orleans Nav Co., 11 Mart. (La.) 309. In one of the decisions, it is even found that an additional harbor has been created. Navigation Co. v. Parker, 29 La. Ann. 434. Benefits anticipated from the corporation is sufficient consideration for the exemption. None other need be shown. Cooley, Tax'n, p. 54.

It is contended that the property cannot be regarded as within the intent of the exemption; that the legislature intended to exempt only the property used for the improvement of the bayou as a navigable water way, and no other. The admission for the trial states that the property is situate on "the right-hand side of the Carondelet canal, and that the same is improved; that the improvements consist of a house rented for a restaurant to third persons, and the other improvements are used by the canal for the storage of their utensils."

In the case heretofore decided, with reference to exempting this company, the court says: "The legislative intent was clearly to exonerate the property of the company, represented by its stock and the machinery used for the contemplated improvement of the canal and bayou." 36 La. Ann. 396. The machinery being exempt, the place on the bank of the stream selected to store it and other materials, to protect them from loss and decay, is also exempt. That buildings of some sort are required, cannot be doubted. It is a constituent part of the canal, necessarily incident thereto. In Schuylkill Nav. Co. v. Commissioners of Berks Co., 11 Pa. St. 202, it was admitted that a canal was exempt from taxation. It was decided by the court: "Where a canal is exempt from taxation, the tollhouse is not taxable," being necessarily appurtenant to the canal. In addition in the pending case the state reserved the right to become the owner at the expiration of the charter, and declared the canal exempt. This property is appurtenant to the canal. The exemption was maintained on similar grounds in Railroad Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 267. That one of the buildings is occupied as a restaurant does not defeat the exemption. Burroughs, Tax'n, p. 140, § 74, "Corporations." The question relates to exemption on this lot, vel non. The immunity, having been granted many years prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1879, is not defeated by an admission that one of the buildings yields a revenue as rental, without proof of its amount. It is not shown how little or how much is collected for rent. The exemption and the right to resume possession being expressed in one act of the legislature, we conclude that the legislative intent was to exempt the canal and the property appurtenant to it, and serving the purpose of the company in maintaining its navigation. The sovereign authority having the right of becoming the owner of this property on the forfeiture or at the expiration of the term of the charter, we construe the exception with reference to that right.

Judgment affirmed, at appellant's cost.

(44 La. Ann. 433)

Succession of SALOY. (No. 10,906.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

VACATING APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATOR — ILLEGITIMACY OF HEIRS — PROCEEDING BY PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR — EVIDENCE — CHILDREN BORN DURING COVERTURE.

1. The public administrator has no standing in court to ask the nullity of the appointment of administrators, made after observance of all the forms of law, and seek his own appointment instead, because the deceased was an adulterous bastard, who left no issue, no surviving husband, and no will, and the parties claiming the estate are adulterous collaterals, who cannot inherit.

2. The state has a right to institute judicial proceedings to revendicate the succession of a person who dies without heir. The action arises under express provisions of law.

3. The state would have such right, in the case of a succession of an adulterous bastard, leaving no legitimate or natural issue, no surviving husband, and no will, which is claimed by adulterous collaterals, upon legal proof of the adulterous relationship of the parties.

4. The only evidence which the law allows to be introduced in such a case is a valid judgment, upon proper proceedings, obtained by the husband, or, in his default, his heirs, under the circumstances and within the period prescribed by law.

5. The right to institute an action en desaveu, to repudiate children born during the marriage, is exclusively personal to the husband, who is the sole judge of his honor, and of the propriety of bringing it.

6. Where the husband or his heirs fail to institute such suit, the door for the contestation is forever closed; the status is irrevocably recognized and fixed, so that it can be thereafter questioned by no one.

7. The state, whatever her governmental prerogatives or police powers be, has no right, in the absence of a formal expression of the legislative will declaratory of the same, to any action to vindicate laws enacted for the preservation of public order or of good morals.

8. The state has not been declared by the legislature to be vested with the right of bringing the "public action." Such right cannot be exercised unless formally recognized and announced by law, and then only for the purpose designated and in the cases specified. In the mean time it is a dormant attribute.

9. In an action brought by the state to exclude adulterous bastards from a succession, where the persons represented to be such were born during marriage, it is essential to allege and prove that their adulterous character (adulterinite) has been judicially pronounced by a competent court, and that the judgment has acquired the force of sovereignty.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; NICHOLAS H. RIGHTOR, Judge.

Bertrand Saloy having died intestate, two administrators were appointed. After they had taken possession of her estate, the public administrator sued to have the appointments vacated and himself appointed, to which the succession excepted. From a judgment denying his petition, the public administrator appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Chretien & Suthon, for public administrator, appellant. W. H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., (Girault Farrar and Wynne Rogers, special counsel,) for the State. Thomas J. Semmes, Drolla & Augustin, and Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for succession, appellee. Benjamin C. Elliott, for absent heirs, appellees.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. The transcript contains several judgments which are brought up for review.

1. The widow of Saloy having died intestate, a contest arose for the administration of her succession, and two administrators were appointed, who took the oath and furnished the bond required by law. After these administrators had taken possession of the estate, and entered upon the discharge of their functions, the public administrator brought suit to have the appointments vacated, and himself appointed administrator of the succession. The grounds upon which he relied are that Widow Saloy died intestate, leaving no legal heirs; that the parties who claim to have inherited her estate are adulterous collaterals, who are disqualified by law; that the appointments were obtained in fraud of the law After hearing on an exception of no cause of action, the petition of the public administrator was denied. From the judgment thus rendered, he appeals.

In Succession of Winn, 26 La. Ann. 162, the then court held that the public administrator has no right to interfere in a succession not vacant, in which the executrix had qualified, and had not been removed, and no creditor had asked for her destitution. In Succession of Burnside, 34 La. Ann. 728, (732,) the right of the public administrator to ask the removal of an executor for the reasons charged was considered, and the court held that he had no authority to provoke the removal of the executor, who was discharging his duties. It said: "His power to act arises only in cases provided by the law which created his office. The utility of his office arises according to law, and his services are required only when a succession is not being administered at all. His office was intended to fill a vacancy, but he had no power to provoke a vacancy. * * * This right can be exercised only by heirs, legatees, or creditors." Code Prac. art. 1018. The ruling in Succession of Winn, 26 La. Ann. 162, is referred to with approval. It does, moreover, appear that, even if the public administrator could have raised lawful aspirations to the administration of a succession like the present one, he should have made them known, asserted them, after the publication of the first application had been made, and engaged with the others in the contest for the administration. It was surely too late after the appointments had been conferred and the appointees qualified. The lower court ruled correctly.

2. It appears that certain parties claiming to be the nearest collateral relatives and the only heirs of Widow Saloy were recognized as such by the court, and ordered to be put in possession of the property left by her. The state of Louisiana then instituted proceedings to have the judgment annulled, on the ground that it had been fraudulently obtained; that the deceased left no legal heirs; and that, in the absence of such, her succession accrues to the fisc. The grave charge is propounded that Widow Saloy was an adulterous bastard, and that the parties in question are adulterous relations, incapable of inheriting. The specific allegation is made that the mother of Mrs. Saloy, Dolores Morales, was the legitimate wife of Juan Gestal, of Cuba, whence she eloped with one Antonio Carcagno, settling in New Orleans, where they had three children,—Marie Madeleine, Carmelite, and Antonio,—who were conceived and born during the existence of said Gestal, who died only in 1842.

Several decrees and judgments rendered in the succession proceedings are complained of, and their annulment is prayed for. The parties appointed administrators, and those recognized as the sole heirs of Mrs. Saloy, whose status and right of inheritance are assailed, as well as the attorney of absent heirs, are asked to be cited. The petition concludes with the prayer that the judgment attacked, recognizing the alleged heirs, be annulled, and that the state of Louisiana be declared to be the sole legal heir of Carmelite Carcagno, widow of Bertrand Saloy, and, as such, entitled to the residue of her estate, after payment of debts and charges. To this petition the defendants filed an exception of no cause of action. After hearing, that defense was sustained, and the claim of the state was rejected, with judgment in favor of the defendants. The state appeals.

The exception of no cause of action was considered as putting at issue the right of action of the state to institute the suit, and it was dealt with accordingly. There can be no doubt that, under express textual provisions of the law, the state has the right, in certain cases, to claim the succession of parties who die without heirs, or whose estates are not claimed by those having a right to them. Article 485, Rev. Civil Code, is formal on the subject. It reads: "The succession of persons who die without heirs, or which are not claimed by those having a right to them, belong to the state." In the same sense is article 917, which reads: "When the deceased has left neither lawful descendants nor collateral relations, the law calls to his inheritance either the surviving husband or wife, or his or her natural children, or the state." To same effect is a following article,—No. 929: "In defect of lawful relations, or of a surviving husband or wife, or acknowledged natural children, the succession belongs to the state." It may not be out of place to observe that under the provisions of article 923 it has been held that when the father and mother of a natural child have died before him, the estate passes to the natural brothers and sisters, or to their descendants. Laclotte's Heirs v. Labarre, 11 La. 181; Layre v. Pasco, 5 Rob. (La.) 9. Being made an heir in certain contingencies, it is clear that the state has a right to demand a judicial enforcement of the law in her favor. This right has been admitted in more than one instance, but notably in the well-known case of Succession of Fletcher, 11 La. Ann. 59, in which the state successfully opposed the claim of a daughter of the deceased, on the ground that she was his adulterous child, and could not inherit from him. Vide, also, Succession of Mager, 12 Rob. (La.) 584; Berens v. Dupre, 6 La. Ann. 494. This right is so well recognized that the state, in a proper case, may be allowed to institute even the action in disavowal, (action en desaveu.) Toullier, vol. 2, No. 127. It is enough that the state has a pecuniary interest to revendicate, to authorize the institution of the suit. Had that interest no existence, the state would have no standing in court, in the absence of declaratory legislation, to assert a governmental privilege or police power for the prevention or suppression of the violation of civil laws enacted for the preservation of public order and good morals. The right thus to interfere must have previously been expressly announced and formulated. No doubt the state inherently possesses the prerogative, as a dormant attribute of sovereignty; but her official representatives have no authority to assert and enforce it when there exists no solemn expression of the legislative will directing or sanctioning its exercise. It is not self-operative, and needs legislation to be put in motion. The French authorities referred to in support of the proposition have no application here, where the power has not been announced by the legislative will; but they are of significance in France, where the right to institute as censor morum the "action publique" is formally thus recognized. Vide Pandectes Francaises, verbo, "Action Publique." Also, Repertoire J. P., Suppl. Comp. Id. There is to be found in France, however, no case that we know of, in which the state has sought to exclude adulterous relations from a succession, and was permitted to prove their status as such, otherwise than by a judgment obtained by the proper party, and seasonably declaratory of the fact.

The dominant question nevertheless arises whether the state can assert the bastardy of the pretended heirs and claim the succession of the adulterous deceased bastard without alleging that she possesses such evidence, for that is the case presented here, as, under the exception, the facts averred in the petition are taken for true, and that fact is not therein set forth. Adulterous bastards are considered as having no relatives. Nec genus, nec gentem habent. Domat says, (Loix Civiles, pt. 2, preface No. 12:) "The successions of bastards who die without legitimate children, and without having disposed of their estates, must be placed in the rank of those which accrue to the prince, for, under our usage, no one succeeds them ab intestato, except their children, if they are legitimate, and they themselves succeed to others by testament only." Dealing with the subject, Laurent (volume 9, p. 181, No. 153) says: "The Code does not speak of the succession of adulterous or incestuous children. The question must be decided according to general principles. The adulterous or incestuous child cannot be acknowledged, and has therefore no natural relative,—no father, no mother, no brother, no sister. * * * He can have, as his legitimate relatives, the children born of his marriage, for, however maculated be his own birth, it cannot affect the condition of children born of a legitimate union. From this it is very easy to determine the order in which the estate left by an adulterous or incestuous bastard descends. It passes at first to his legitimate issue. * * * If there are only natural children, they take the inheritance, under article 758, Code Nap. In default of posterity, there are neither natural nor legitimate relatives. It was proposed to defer the succession to the father and mother; but it was not remembered that the unfortunate are legally without father or mother, as they have no filiation. * * * For the same reason they have neither natural brothers nor sisters, and there is no reversion or succession for their benefit. Remains the surviving spouse, and, in his or her default, the state." See Zacharie, (Aubry & Rau Ed.,) vol. 4 p. 266, No. 10; Demolombe, vol. 14, p. 211, Nos. 136-138. It is therefore apparent that the estate of an adulterous child who dies leaving no issue, legitimate or natural, and without having disposed of it by will, accrues to the state. But is it enough that the crude fact exist to entitle the sovereign to take? Is he not bound to prove it by legal evidence, establishing it beyond all peradventure? If so, what should that evidence be? The exception of no cause of action does not say how and why the petition discloses no valid claim. The state did not demand any specification, and it was tried on the face of the papers. Exceptions of that description tend to the rejection of a petition, not only because the facts alleged, if true, would not warrant the judgment sought, but because the averments are insufficient. From the manner in which the case was presented and argued it is manifest that the purpose of this exception was not so much to deny the right of the state to obtain the judgment sought as it was to deny that for want of allegations which were not and could not be made the state could not adduce legal evidence to substantiate them. Had not the exception been filed, the defendants, after joining issue by answer, could, on the trial, have successfully objected to the introduction of any evidence in support of the averments which would not have been strictly warranted by law. The defendants, by their exception, may be viewed as having told the state: "You say that the three children were born from the adulterous connection of Dolores Morales with Antonio Carcagno while her marriage with Juan Gestal was in existence; that, one of them—Carmelite—having died without issue, and ab intestato, the other, Marie Madeleine, who is Mrs. Pons, and the representatives of Antonio, being adulterous collaterals, cannot inherit, and that you therefore are called to her succession, which belongs to you. You do not allege that those three children have, in an action brought by Juan Gestal, under proper averments and seasonably instituted, been judicially declared to be adulterous bastards. Not having made that allegation, because the fact does not exist, you cannot force us to a trial on the merits of the suit. You cannot prove your averment of adulterinity; and, failing in that, you cannot recover the judgment of heirship which you seek." To this the state answers: "It was unnecessary to make the allegation, because this is an action in contestation of legitimacy, on a charge of adulterous bastardy, which can be proved otherwise than by a judgment bastardizing the children at the instance of the husband of their mother or of his heirs. The deceased was an adulterous bastard, and you are her adulterous collaterals. She has died leaving no issue, no surviving husband, no will. You cannot and do not inherit her estate, which therefore accrues and belongs to me, and I ask that it be so adjudged."

It would be cumbersome, and subserve no useful purpose, to enter into any elaborate inquisition to establish clearly what are actions in disavowal, actions in contestation of legitimacy, actions in reclamation, and actions in contestation of status, and to enumerate the cases in which they may successfully be brought. The commentators and the courts which have hazarded a disquisition on the subject have ventured on a perilous enterprise, and engaged in a labyrinth, from which it has been difficult sometimes for them to extricate themselves. Insatiable aspirants, after exhaustion of legal knowledge on those thorny subjects, may be assisted in collecting notes to serve as landmarks by referring to the authorities alluded to by the able counsel engaged in this controversy in their elaborate briefs, and to those on which the ravenous commentators themselves, more or less, rely. It will suffice to say that every action brought to contest the status of a person is an action en contestation d'etat, which is of three kinds: (1) That by which one maintains that the presumption, "is pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant," invoked for a child born or conceived during the marriage, is, as to him, contrary to truth. (2) That by which one maintains that the child is not legitimate, because his birth and his conception did not take place during the marriage of his mother, or because his mother was not married. (3) That by which one contests either the delivery of the mother or the identity of the child. The action en desaveu belongs only to certain persons exactly determined; that is, the husband and his heirs. It belongs neither to the mother nor to her heirs. This action is limited to a fatal delay, and very short, after which it is extinguished by the renunciation, express or tacit, which is made by the husband or his heirs. While the action en contestation de legitimite accrues to all persons interested, and consequently to the heirs of the mother and to the child himself, this action lasts always. It subsists notwithstanding any contrary renunciation. Mourlon, vol. 1, p. 438, No. 867 et seq. It is unnecessary to enter into any discussion as to whether the suit brought by the state is an action en desaveu, or one en contestation de legitimite, because it has the complexion of neither, and the state expressly disclaims that it is either, contending merely that it is one en contestation d'etat. Whatever its character be, it is clearly an action which has for its object to have it judicially declared that the deceased was an adulterous bastard, and that the defendants, her sister, nephews, and nieces, are adulterous bastards; that the deceased having left no issue, no husband and no will, the defendants do not inherit, and her succession belongs to the state.

The only question presented, after all, is one which relates to the nature of the proof or evidence of which the case is susceptible. Can the state be permitted to resort to any evidence save the judgment in a case of disavowal? That is the question. We have been referred to no authority showing that evidence of such a character was ever allowed in order to bastardize children born during marriage, and we know of none. In Succession of Fletcher, 11 La. Ann. 59, in which the state had charged the adulterinity of the daughter claiming the estate, the court allowed the state to introduce usual evidence other than a judgment; but this was done because the daughter was the child of the deceased, a married man, by an unmarried woman and a slave. So there is no parity between the two cases.

The state takes the further position that parties who pretend to be the sole heirs of the deceased, being plaintiffs, must make out their claim, as was required in the Fletcher Case, and that, as they have shown themselves to be Carcagnos, and not Gestals, they have established their status as adulterous connections, and therefore debarred themselves from inheritance. This is a fallacy. Those parties are not plaintiffs, as was Marie Louise, in the Fletcher Case. The court there was particular in premising that she was not a defendant, but a plaintiff, on whom the burden of proof rested. In the present instance the parties are not asking or claiming anything, and have nothing to prove. Whatever their status be, the state by the suit has forced them into the attitude of defendants, as she attacks them. They are in possession of a judgment, which is their property, emanating from a competent court, which recognizes them as the sole heirs of the deceased. The onus is on the state to show by strictly legal proof that they have procured it by fraudulent representations and practices, and the question reduces itself as to whether the state has at her command the evidence exclusively permitted in such cases, in which children born during marriage are gravely charged with being adulterous bastards, incapable of inheriting under the law. The two cases—that of Fletcher and the instant one—are, therefore, in this further respect, entirely dissimilar. There is no doubt that a husband, although he be presumed by law to be the father of the children born from his wife during the existence of their marriage, has the indisputable right to repudiate them, when they have not been begotten by him, and are the spurious fruits of the adulterous intercourse of his wife with another man; but the cases in which he is permitted to go into the scandalous doings of his depraved consort, reeking with the odor of adultery, are specified with precision, and his action, and, in his default, that of his heirs, are to be asserted within a limited delay. Rev. Civil Code, arts. 184–192, inclusive. The proceedings must be conducted contradictorily with the wife and with the child or children whose character and status are involved. The law has made him the sole judge of the propriety of engaging in such a course, with a reserve of a right to his heirs of doing so in the event of his death within the delay. He is the only one who, perhaps, can know that he is not the father. Where, aware of the circumstances under which he might have exercised the right of repudiation, the husband, who is the sovereign arbiter of his honor, fails to do so, the door is forever closed, and no one can afterwards assert a right strictly personal to him. Permitting such thing would be to strike a heavy blow at the sacredness of family ties, keep the honor of the wife and of the children in a condition of constant trepidation, and allow the foundation of society to be at all times exposed to tottering and upturning. Status hominum in perpetua incertitudine fluctuaret. The sanctity with which the law surrounds marital relations and the reputation and good fame of the spouse and of the children born during their marriage is of such inviolability that the mother and the children can never brand themselves with declarations of adultery, illegitimacy, and bastardy, and their character is not permitted lightly to be thus aspersed, however true in themselves the stern and odious facts may unfortunately be. This doctrine has long ago been recognised in this state. In the two cases of Eloi v. Mader, 1 Rob. (La.) 583, and of Dejol, 12 La. Ann. 854, the then supreme courts expressly recognized and applied it, holding that, where the husband has failed to institute the action en desaveu, under the circumstances and within the period specified, the right to assail the legitimacy of the children born during marriage having become extinct and lapsed, it could be subsequently exercised by no one, and those asserting it were debarred from all action. See, also, Tate v. Penne, 7 Mart. (N. S.) 553; Vernon v. Vernon's Heirs, 6 La. Ann. 242. But the converse of the proposition is true, that, if the husband or his heirs have brought proceedings to bastardize children born during marriage, and have established the facts of the adulterinity propounded, and a judgment has accordingly been rendered, and has become final and executory, sovereign and absolute, to all ends and purposes, any one having an interest to promote, growing out of the fact judicially established and proclaimed, may use the proceeding and the judgment successfully for the purpose of establishing the adulterinity. Had, therefore, such judgment been procured in this instance, the state could have used it, and by its operation would have silenced the voice of the blood which the defendants have raised to possess themselves of property left by a collateral, whose forehead has not been branded with infamy. From the fact that such judgment has not been alleged, that its existence is not even whispered, the unavoidable conclusion is that it has no being, and therefore that the state is unprovided with the only legal evidence by which her case was susceptible of proof, and that she must fail in her action. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from, rejecting the application of the public administrator and the demand of the state, be affirmed, with costs; and, considering that the state has no interest in contesting the validity of the other judgments from which she has appealed, it is ordered that said appeals be dismissed.

Succession of GLIDDEN. (No. 10,934.)

SUBSTITUTION—VALIDITY.

A substitution prohibited by our law is the disposition of a donation inter vivos or mortis causa, which vests the property of the testator in a person named, during the lifetime of such person, who has not the power of alienation; and at his death the same property is to vest in another person named, but who takes title directly from the testator, but by a title which only springs into existence on the death of the first donee.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge.

Suit by Benjamin F. Auld and Hugh Wilson Auld against the succession of Ann E. Auld, wife of George Glidden, to annul the will. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Rice & Armstrong, for executor, appellant, and F. S. Drolla, special tutor, in pro. per. Thos. J. Semmes, for appellees.

WATKINS, J. Alleging themselves to be the brothers and sole heirs at law of the deceased testatrix, who died without ascendants or descendants, Benjamin F. Auld and Hugh Wilson Auld instituted this suit for the revocation and annulment of the last will of Ann E. Auld, who died in the city of New Orleans, state of Louisiana, on the 27th of January, 1891, possessed of property of the aggregate value of $50,267.52, which consisted, almost exclusively, of United States bonds and currency, state and city bonds, stocks of corporations, and rights and credits generally. Of this, George Glidden, surviving husband of the testatrix, laid claim to some $13,000 or $14,000, as his individual property. The last will of the testatrix is in olographic form, bearing date "New Orleans, July 1, 1884." It was duly proved and admitted to probate, and the surviving husband alone, of three persons named in the will as executors, qualified, and undertook the administration of the decedent's estate. The principal averment on which the charge of nullity is grounded, is that, "except the appointment of an executor," the provisions of the will "are null and void, and substitutions prohibited by law." The following is the full text of the will, viz.: "New Orleans, July 1st, 1884. I declare this to be my last will and testament. I wish my money to be invested in ground rents and real estate in the city of Baltimore, state of Maryland. Should I die possessed of and good stocks or securities that shall remain until called in, (that is, if they should be found to be United States securities;) other stocks, if doubtful, should be sold, and the proceeds invested as above mentioned. After my means are invested as above directed, I give to my dear husband, George Glidden, of New Orleans, state of Louisiana, one thousand dollars annually out of the income of my estate. The income to be used and divided equally between my nieces of the city of Baltimore and daughters of my brother Benjamin F. Auld, to be used for their benefit. At my husband's death, the property shall be held in trust by my nieces, and all the income, including that left by my husband, shall inure to their benefit during their lifetime, and at their death to be divided equally between their daughters. Should there be any opposition on the part of heirs to this instrument, my husband shall have the whole of the interest during his lifetime, and they to receive the interest only after his death, without the power of disposing of any part thereof. I appoint George Glidden, William A. Gault, and Peter M. Peterson my executors. ANN GLIDDEN."

For the purposes of precision and careful analysis, we will reproduce the article of the Code which prohibits substitutions, viz.: "Substitutions and fidei commissa are and remain prohibited. Every disposition by which the donee, the heir, or legatee is charged to preserve for or return to a third person is null, even with regard to the donee, the instituted heir, or the legatee," etc. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1520. In order that the nullity of the will, on the ground that its provisions are prohibited substitutions, be made plainly and clearly to appear, it is essential that language be pointed out which charges an heir or legatee to preserve an inheritance for, or to return an inheritance to, some third person named in the will. There must plainly and clearly appear to be named and designated in the testament two absolute takers of one and the same inheritance, to constitute any provision of the will a prohibited substitution, within the intent and meaning of the law. This view is fully substantiated by the succeeding article of the Code, which declares that a disposition, by which two persons are designated as takers of the same thing alternately, is not a prohibited substitution. For says the article: "The disposition by which a third person is called to take the gift, the inheritance, or the legacy, in case the donee, the heir, or the legatee does not take it, shall not be considered a substitution, and shall be valid." (Our italics.) Rev. Civil Code, art. 1521. It is equally true that the reprobated disposition must be of property of the testator, and not of income or revenue to subsequently accrue from the use of property, after the testator's death, and the consequent devolution of property in esse, upon the beneficiaries under the will. This appears from the succeeding article of the Code, which declares that "the same [i. e., the observation made in the preceding article in reference to the validity of alternative dispositions] shall be observed as to the disposition inter vivos or mortis causa, by which the usufruct is given to one and the naked ownership to another." Rev. Civil Code, art. 1522.

From those three articles, taken and construed together, we have the three following propositions, distinctly announced, viz.: First, there must be named in the will two absolute takers of one and the same inheritance; second, a third person may be legally called to take an inheritance in case an heir or legatee does not; third, it is permissible for the testator to donate or bequeath the usufruct of the property to one, and the naked ownership to another.

Keeping these three propositions in view, we must determine whether the will of the decedent violates the first, or is compatible with the remaining two, because it cannot be compatible with all three of them. In order to ascertain the incompatibility vel non of the will with the first of the foregoing propositions, it may be paraphrased and restated as follows, viz.: In the first paragraph she declares that her wish is that her money shall be invested in ground rents and real estate in Baltimore, Md., and that any good securities of which she may die possessed should remain until called in, and that all doubtful securities should be sold, and the proceeds thereof likewise invested. The second paragraph declares that, after her means are invested, her husband was to receive $1,000 annually out of the income of her estate; and the remainder of the income was to be equally divided between her nieces of the city of Baltimore, and the daughters of her brother Benjamin F. Auld, to be used for their benefit. The third paragraph declares that, at her husband's death, the property shall be held in trust by her nieces, to whose benefit all the income shall inure during their lifetime, and, at their death, the property shall be divided equally between their daughters. The fourth paragraph declares that, if there shall be any opposition on the part of the heirs to the testament, her husband shall have the whole of the interest during his lifetime, they to receive the interest only after his death, without the power of disposing of any part thereof. It is conspicuously observable that no disposition whatever is made by the testatrix of her property, save and except what is contained in the third preceding paragraph; and, if that be differently construed, it is quite certain that the testatrix made no disposition of her property at all. Reiterating the foregoing, it is quite clear that the testatrix merely expressed a wish that her money, in possession at her death, should be invested in Baltimore, and doubtful securities should be sold, and likewise invested. She then directs in what manner the income of investments thus made shall be distributed between her husband and nieces. Having thus disposed of the income during her husband's lifetime, she declares it to be her desire that, after his death, her "property shall be held in trust by [her] nieces," and that "all the income shall inure to their benefit during their lifetime." And just here the solitary doubt arises, and that one is in reference to the phrase, "and at their death to be divided equally between their daughters." Argument is presented to the effect that the words "to be divided equally" refer to the income, and not to the property. If this be a correct interpretation, then the question arises as to the disposition of the property. The will declares, emphatically, that "the property shall be held in trust by [her] nieces." For whom were they directed to hold the property in trust if not for their daughters? No one else is mentioned. When was the trust to expire? At the death of the trustees, the testatrix's nieces.

If such be the true construction to be placed upon this paragraph of the will, then the conclusion is irresistible that the words "to be divided equally" refer to the property, and not to the income. They could not have reasonably referred to the income, for the plain reason that the immediately preceding declaration of the will is that "all the income, including that left by my husband, shall inure to their benefit [i. e., the nieces' benefit] during their lifetime;" and, conceding it to have been the intention of the testatrix that "at their death" the property should "be divided equally between their daughters," it would have been supererogatory and vain for the testatrix to have made any different distribution of the income of the property, after it had become irrevocably vested in the donees. Plaintiffs' suit necessarily admits that the will of the testatrix disposed of the property, and that the disposition of the will was necessarily in favor of the daughters of the testatrix's nieces. Otherwise there could be no prohibited substitution in the will against which plaintiffs could inveigh. Conceding this to be true,—and it necessarily is,—then it seems to be perfectly clear that there are no two absolute takers of the property as an inheritance, made mention of in the will; because the nieces, by whom the property was to be held in trust, were only and exclusively entitled to its income "during their lifetime." Death only was to terminate their trust, and their right to the income as well. Upon the happening of that event, the property, in fee simple, is to devolve upon the daughters of the testatrix's nieces, in equal and determined portions.

It is equally clear to our minds that this will presents a case wherein the testatrix, unmistakably, bequeathed the usufruct of her property to her husband and her nieces, in determined proportions, and during their respective lifetimes, and, at their death, the naked ownership to the daughters of those nieces. In confirmation of what we regard as a necessary implication, to be drawn from the character of this action, we refer to the brief of plaintiff's counsel, (pages 3 and 4,) viz.: "In no part of the will does she pretend to dispose of the corpus of the property; it is always the income which is in her mind, and it is only the income which she bestows on any one. So prominent is this feature of the will, the court will notice she gives nothing until her money is invested. The language is: 'After my moneys are invested, as above directed, I give to my husband, George Glidden, $1,000 annually out of the income of my estate. The balance of the income to be used and equally divided between my nieces of the city of Baltimore and daughters of my brother Benjamin F. Auld, to be used for their benefit.' No one was to get a cent until the investments were made. Her mind was bent on tying up her money by its investment in lands and ground rents in Baltimore, to be held in trust so that the income, and the income alone, could be expended. Will this court compel the executor of this estate to invest the moneys of the deceased in ground rents and real estate in Baltimore, in his own name as trustee, and to hold it as trustee so that it may devolve at his death on the nieces of the deceased, as trustees under her will?" It must be observed that counsel starts out with the statement that "in no part of the will does the testatrix pretend to dispose of the corpus of the property;" but that statement is answered and refuted by the concluding sentence, in which it is declared that the evident intention of the testatrix was that her means should be invested in real estate in Baltimore by the executor, "in his own name, as trustee, and to hold it as trustee, so that it may devolve, at his death, on the nieces of the deceased, as trustees under the will." Evidently the trust estate is the property. That the trust was created necessarily implies that there is some beneciiary. The will distinctly and exclusively deals with and disposes of the income of her property up to and inclusive of the date of her niece's death. It is only after their death that their daughters are to participate in the estate at all; and, upon the happening of that event, the daughters of those nieces, and no one else, is entitled to any participation in the estate. Antecedent to the death of the husband of the testatrix, no trust is created or apparently contemplated. While it is true the will announces the wish of the testatrix to be that her money shall be invested in Baltimore ground rents and real estate, the duty of making that investment is imposed upon no one. The duty was not imposed upon either of the executors named in the will. At present, we are dealing with the testament alone, and must determine its validity by an examination and comparison of all its parts; and our decision must depend upon its ascertained susceptibility of execution in futuro. If, then, the moneys of the testatrix shall be invested in Baltimore real estate, according to the terms of the testament, would there be any legal impediment to its further execution? Such investments being made as contemplated, could the income and property be disposed of, in pursuance of the provisions of the will, without violating the prohibition of the statute in regard to prohibited substitutions? Our investigation has led us to the conclusion that the income and property of the testatrix could be so disposed of validly and legally.

Counsel's argument proceeds upon the hypothesis that the testatrix gave nothing until after the money was invested, and that no one was to get a cent until the investments were made. Hence it is necessary that the court should compel the executor to make the contemplated investments, and by this means create a trust estate, of which the executor should be trustee, until the date of his (the executor's) death, in order that the property might devolve on the nieces of the testatrix. This argument is entirely without any foundation in point of fact, because (1) there is no provision in the will that the executor shall make the investments; (2) it contains no provision to the effect that any one shall continue to be executor so long as he shall live; (3) and no provision that the trust of the nieces shall begin upon the death or expiration of an executor's term of service. On the contrary, the commencement of the trust of the nieces is fixed at the date of the death of the husband of the testatrix, who, as it turned out, was the only one of three who qualified. The only trust mentioned in the will is that of the nieces. That is not a prohibited substitution, but a naked trust, which does not convey any present or eventual interest in the property to the trustees. It is fully shown that there were in esse, at the date of the death of the testatrix, both nieces, and the daughters of the said nieces, who are beneficiaries under said testament, and who aver and claim that all of the provisions thereof are valid and legal. On this discussion and statement of facts the questions of law raised are few and simple. We think it quite sufficient for us to cite Marshall v. Pearce, 34 La. Ann. 557, as the whole scope of prohibited substitution was gone into, and the fullest discussion of the authorities bearing on the question had. While it is true that the court was not unanimous in its opinion on the particular application of the law of prohibited substitution to the will there under consideration, yet we find the opinions of the judges pro et con in perfect agreement as to what is the vital and essential element of a prohibited substitution. For in the opinion of the court it is said: "The simplest test of the substitution prohibited by our law is that it vests the property in one person, * * * and at the death of such person vests the same property in another person, who takes the same directly from the testator, but by a title which only springs into existence on the death of the first donee. Such a disposition destroys the power of alienation of the property by the first donee, because he is bound to hold it until his death, in order that the person then called to take the title may take it. At the same time, no power of alienation exists in the second donee during the life of the first, because his title only comes into being at the death of the latter." Differing from the majority only with reference to what was a proper construction of the will of Joshua Pearce, but not with regard to what was the proper legal definition of a "prohibited substitution," the chief justice, dissenting, said "To my mind it is apparent that when he bequeathed to his wife his plantation and movable effects, 'to have and to hold during her natural life,' he merely intended to give her the usufruct of that property," etc. Both opinions proceed, necessarily, upon the idea that the corpus of the property was disposed of, and that in order that such a disposition should come under the nullifying ban of the prohibited substitution of the Code, there must be, at least, two absolute takers of the title of the property of the testator; that is to say, that a title vests in one person, who is to keep the property during his life, without possessing the power of alienation, and, at his death, the same property is to vest in another person named. We are of opinion that the will under consideration, in terms, gave to the nieces of the testatrix named as trustees the income of the property or the usufruct, but not the title. This is a mere naked trust, uncoupled with any interest in the trustee, save that of a usufructuary, which is permitted under our law. Under this view, the will contains no prohibited substitution, and is valid. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled and reversed, and it is further ordered and decreed that the demand of the plaintiffs be rejected, at their cost in both courts.

CALHOUN v. PIERSON. (No. 10,988.) SAME v. TEAL. (No. 10,988.) SAME v. THORPE. (No. 10,988.)

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—ACCEPTANCE OF SUCCESSION—TITLE FROM ANOTHER SOURCE—ESTOPPEL.

1. An act of sale, executed, by the testator to his sister, of his undivided interest and share in the succession and property of his deceased mother, will operate as an estoppel against a claim made by his child to an interest in the estate and property of the grandmother, through the father and testator, as an heir.

2. The admissibility of a private writing of any kind must be tested and determined before it is admitted and filed in evidence; and until proof of its execution is first administered, if such proof be required by the adverse party, it cannot be introduced and filed in evidence, it matters not what may be the object that is expected to be accomplished thereby.

3. After a son has unconditionally accepted the succession of the father, and has accepted and used, as unconditional heir, certain 12-months bonds that had been executed by adjudicatees of his succession property, such son and heir is conclusively barred and estopped from setting up an antecedent title derived from another source, as against the adjudicatees of the property, and their assignees and transferees.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Grant; WILBER F. BLACKMAN, Judge.

Petitory action by Mrs. Cora E. P. Calhoun, executrix of William S. Calhoun, deceased, and tutrix of his minor child, against Charles E. Pierson, who claims ownership of the property by mesne conveyance from the succession of said William S. Calhoun's father, Meredith Calhoun, deceased. Same plaintiff against Charles H. Teal. Same plaintiff against Andrew Thorpe. The three cases were consolidated, and separate judgments rendered for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hunter & Hunter, for appellant. T. H. Thorpe and Andrew Thorpe, for appellees.

WATKINS, J. These three consolidated causes are petitory actions instituted by the widow of William S. Calhoun, suing in the double capacity of executrix of his last will, and of tutrix of his minor child, against the several defendants, claiming ownership, severally, by mesne conveyances from the succession of said William S. Calhoun's father, Meredith Calhoun, deceased. The claim of title is further supported by the averment that the lands in controversy were illegally inventoried as property of the succession of Meredith Calhoun, and therefore illegally sold to the various adjudicatees thereof at probate sales made by Howard McKnight, administrator, in 1882 and 1883; and prayer is made for the nullity of said sales to be judicially decreed, and a cloud on the title removed. The lands claimed aggregate in quantity 1,160 acres, of which it is alleged that William S. Calhoun entered from the government, as will be shown by patent certificates, 720 acres, and that Mrs. Mary S. Calhoun entered the remaining 440 acres, likewise evidenced by patent certificates.

Properly refined, plaintiff's claim and pretension are (1) that the minor of William S. Calhoun, whom she personates as tutrix, inherited the entire property from her father at his death; and (2) that her father acquired 720 acres of the land by the purchases made in his own right from the government, and the remaining 440 acres by inheritance from his mother, Mary S. Calhoun, deceased. Contra, the claim made by the defendants is that at the aforesaid succession sales, made in 1882 and 1883, as the property of Meredith Calhoun, deceased, the property was adjudicated in subdivisions to various persons, upon terms of credit, who executed their several and respective 12-months bonds for the purchase prices thereof, with security of mortgage recognized upon same; that subsequently William S. Calhoun unconditionally accepted the succession of his father, Meredith Calhoun, and received said bonds as part of the assets thereof, and gave them in payment to his wife, the present plaintiff; that being a judgment creditor of the father, Meredith Calhoun, the defendant Pierson proceeded by attachment and garnishment against William S. Calhoun, the son and unconditional heir, as his personal debtor, and subjected said bonds to the payment of his judgment, and, on the execution thereof, he became the purchaser of the said lands, in part, and Teal, another defendant, became a purchaser of part, and subsequently he (Pierson) conveyed a portion of those he acquired to the defendant Thorpe, and he in turn conveyed same to Teal. Independently of mere averment, the mooted and principal question is whether the property really belonged to the succession of Meredith Calhoun at the dates of the sales made in 1882 and 1883, for on that the title of defendants depends. Therefore, they averred in their answer various matters of estoppel in pais and by deed, as well as by conduct, the effect of which are to preclude William S. Calhoun, as well as persons claiming under him, from ever disputing the title of Meredith Calhoun as their author. Without enumerating them, we will dispose of them seriatim as stated in plaintiff's brief.

1. The first estoppel is averred to exist in an act of sale executed by William S. Calhoun to his sister, Miss M. M. Ada Calhoun, on the 27th of May, 1873, conveying to her all his interest in and to the property of the succession of their mother, Mary Smith Calhoun. If, in point of fact, such a sale was made, the interest of the plaintiff in that portion of the land which William S. Calhoun is alleged to have acquired from the succession of his mother, Mary Smith Calhoun, passed thereby to his sister, and therefore could not have been inherited by his child.

The record discloses the existence of an act of sale, notarial in form, that was executed, as stated in defendant's plea, by William Smith Calhoun, in favor of his sister, Miss Marie Marguerite Ada Calhoun, whereby he sold, conveyed, and delivered to her "all and singular his undivided one-half interest, and all his right, title, interest, claim, and demand, of every nature and kind whatsoever, in and to the succession and estate of his deceased mother, the late Mary Smith Taylor, deceased, widow of Meredith Calhoun, late of the parish of Rapides, deceased, without exception or reservation, * * * and also in and to all the real estate, property, rights, credits, and effects belonging to the estate or succession of his deceased mother, the said Mrs. Mary S. Calhoun, or in which it may appear that said succession or estate is or may be entitled or interested." The consideration for this sale is stated to be the sum of $35,000 in cash; and the act of sale appears to have been duly recorded in the book of conveyances in the parish of Grant, wherein the property is situated, on the 3d of June, 1873. To this deed the plaintiff offered, in explanation and contradiction, what her counsel terms a "counter letter," in rebuttal. The only signature which it purports to have is that of the sister, Miss M. M. Ada Calhoun, who is named as vendee in the deed under consideration. It does not bear the signature of the vendor, W. S. Calhoun. Among other things, it contains the following recital, viz.: "Whereas, on the 27th of May, 1873, by notarial act, William Smith Calhoun did sell, transfer, and assign all and singular his right, title, and interest in and to the succession of his mother, Mrs. Mary Smith Calhoun, * * * now, I, M. M. A. Calhoun, for and in consideration of the above, do by these presents promise and bind and obligate myself to pay and deliver over one half of the entire net proceeds of the succession of our mother, Mary Smith Calhoun, deceased, upon the final settlement thereof," etc. It then concludes with this pertinent and significant phrase, viz.: "Said William Smith Calhoun is to have and receive one hundred dollars during each and every month, on account, and in advance of his share in said succession." This document bears date July 5, 1873, only a few weeks subsequent to the execution and registry of the act of sale in question. On the trial no proof was offered of its execution, even by Miss Ada Calhoun, or of its authenticity; and it was only offered and filed in evidence in this case on October 3, 1891, after the party to be affected thereby, beneficially, had, evidently, been dead for many years, and long since the rights of the defendants had been acquired in the premises; and this document was admitted in evidence by the judge a qua without any evidence of its execution, and over the objection of defendants' counsel. On this subject, plaintiff's counsel makes this statement, viz.: "The plaintiff offered in rebuttal the counter letter of Mrs. Lane. To this offer, counsel for the defendants interposed the objection that it was a document under private signature, and no proof of the signature had been made. The court admitted the document, and a bill was reserved on the record. If the suit had been one to enforce the agreement contained in the counter letter, the objection would be good; but when the document was offered merely to show that there was a counter letter, and that the sale was not real, but fictitious, we do not deem that the proof was required. Or if the objection had come in the shape of an exception to plaintiff's right to sue, because W. S. Calhoun had parted with his interest in his mother's succession, it might have required proof of the signature. The answer pleads the sale as an estoppel, and a defense which might have been good if pleaded otherwise does not necessarily operate as an estoppel." We are clearly of opinion that counsel's argument is not sound, and that the judge's ruling was erroneous. The question raised was one of the admissibility of the document to be filed in evidence. Until proof of the execution of a private writing is first administered, if such proof be insisted upon by the adverse party, it cannot be introduced in evidence, it matters not what may be the object intended to be accomplished by its introduction. This is elementary. Code Pr. art. 483; Rev. Civil Code, art. 2245. We must decline to consider that paper, thus denuded of all proof of its verity or authenticity, as having any effect upon the act in question. Disregarding that paper, the estoppel of the act is full and complete.

The second and third estoppels which are urged may be considered as one. They are to the effect that subsequent to the unconditional acceptance of the succession of Meredith Calhoun by his son and heir, William S. Calhoun, in 1887, he received the 12-months bonds that the various adjudicatees had executed for lands purchased at the succession sales made in the estate of Meredith Calhoun in 1882 and 1883, and gave them to his wife, the present plaintiff, in part satisfaction of her claims against him, in the month of February, 1888. The estoppel predicated upon the aforesaid acts is that because W. S. Calhoun had, as heir of his father, received and used the proceeds and avails of the property which had been sold as that of the father's succession, he, and those claiming through him, are precluded from setting up an antecedent title as against the adjudicatees, and their transferees and assignees, of the property. Admitting the facts to have been substantially as stated, counsel makes the subjoined explanatory statement on pages 9 and 10 of his brief, viz.: "C. A. Pierson had a judgment for $1,000 against the succession of M. Calhoun. W. S. Calhoun did take the bonds from Mrs. McKnight. Pierson garnished the parties who had given those bonds, and obtained judgment against him, and seized and sold out the lands for which they had given the bonds; some of them being the lands now sued for in these cases. The proceeds were credited on his judgment. This 1,160 acres, and a lot more of the lands not included in this suit, were sold under his judgment; and, after paying enormous costs, there was still a balance due on his judgment. W. S. Calhoun had meanwhile made a dation en paiement of the bonds to his wife, and that had been recorded, and is offered in evidence here by him, and forms the basis of his next plea of estoppel. Neither he nor the sheriff ever had possession of the bonds; and how he could have found any sanction in law for his extraordinary legal proceedings, or any court to give him judgments, under the circumstances, is a mystery we cannot fathom. Neither W. S. Calhoun nor Mrs. Calhoun ever derived any benefit from the bonds, except so far as they may have been benefited by the ruinous credits on his judgment. He is sued here for the return of 520 acres of land, which is admitted to be worth $10 an acre, or $5,200, which he bought at one of those sales under his judgment; and in his answer he asks that, if he is evicted, plaintiff be required to return him the purchase price, which he fixes at $540,—a little more than $1 per acre. And yet he comes into court, and has the hardihood to urge that because W. S. Calhoun took the bare pieces of paper called 'twelve-months bonds,' and transferred them to his wife, they are equitably estopped from recovering the lands of which he has despoiled them under the bare forms of law; and he himself offers in this record the evidence upon which the foregoing statements are made." Giving the plaintiff the full benefit of her counsel's statement, and it is quite impossible to give her any relief in this action against strangers, and, to all appearances, innocent third persons. That W. S. Calboun did receive the bonds is a fact confessed. That he had previously unconditionally accepted the succession of Meredith Calhoun, as heir, is also a fact admitted. And it is also admitted that he subsequently transferred said bonds to his wife. The hardship and injury complained of might be appropriately considered if the plaintiff were claiming any right under the succession of Meredith Calhoun; but claiming, as she does, under the succession of Mary Smith Calhoun, to which she avers the property belonged, and from which the deceased testator, William S. Calhoun, inherited it at her death, these questions are res inter alios acta, and impertinent to the issue of estoppel pleaded as destructive of William S. Calhoun's claim of title.

The judge a qua decided the consolidated causes in favor of defendants, and signed three several judgments. Being of opinion that he decided the causes correctly, they are respectively affirmed.

Succession of SPARROW. (No. 10,997.)

SUCCESSION REPRESENTATIVE—ADVANCES TO MINOR HEIRS—REIMBURSEMENT—SUCCESSION SETTLEMENT—CHARGES.

1. In case a right has been reserved to a succession representative, to claim reimbursement for sums by him already advanced to minor heirs having an interest in the property under administration, such representative, making further advances to said minors, in order to supply them with necessaries for their support and education, which the tutor did not possess adequate means to supply them with, occupies towards such minors quasi contract relations, entitling him to reimbursement of such sums since furnished also.

2. Settlement thereof is clearly contemplated to take place in due course of the administration of the ancestor's estate from which the advances were made. To such case article 850 of the Revised Civil Code does not apply.

3. A final succession settlement having been postponed for a number of years, on account of numerous complications and unavoidable causes, for which the administrator is not responsible, and in the mean time the mules and working cattle attached to the succession plantations having been annually leased therewith, the losses sustained by the death of any of said animals are rather to be attributed to natural causes, such as work, overage, and ordinary use will bring about, than to dereliction of duty on the part of the administrator, in failing to obtain a decree for their sale, or to damage resulting from his misconduct.

4. Charges against a succession, of whatever character they may be, such as funeral charges, law charges, lawyer's fees for settling the succession, and generally all claims against the succession, originating after the death of the person whose succession is under administration, are to be paid before the debts contracted by the deceased.

5. Among such succession charges may be included claims of the administrator against minors for moneys to their tutor advanced for their support and education, and before the shares of said minors have been segregated from the mass of the succession, and reduced to dominion and control by their tutor.

Appeal from district court, parish of East Carroll; FIELD F. MONTGOMERY, Judge.

Application by the administrator of Minerva Sparrow, deceased, to homologate his final account, and to be permitted to sell enough of the succession property to pay its established debts, and enough of the property of the interests of the heirs to pay their indebtedness to the administrator. The account was opposed, and the sale was enjoined. A judgment was rendered homologating the account, perpetuating the injunction, and holding the administrator liable to the minor heirs for one third the value of certain personal property lost. All parties appealed, but the claims of the major heirs were discontinued. Judgment modified and affirmed.

Joseph E. Ransdell, for appellant. Charles S. Wyly and Felix P. Poche, for minor heirs, appellees.

WATKINS, J. This record presents the fourth appeal to this court in this succession. In obedience to a previous decree of this court, in April, 1890, as reported in 42 La. Ann. 500, 7 South. Rep. 611, the administrator prepared and caused to be filed a final account of his gestion of the succession of Minerva Sparrow, and attempted to sell a sufficiency of succession property to pay its established debts, and a sufficiency of the property of the respective interests of the heirs to pay their respective indebtedness to the administrator. The account was opposed, and the sale was enjoined by all of the heirs, on sundry grounds, the principal one being that the administrator had neglected to make sale of the perishable property of the estate, and had allowed it to deteriorate and perish while in his hands, under administration, and for the value of which property he became responsible. The opposition on the part of the two minors, representing one third of the estate, makes the additional point that, by a decree of this court made in this succession, they had been put in possession of their inheritance, and that no claim could be enforced against it as succession property, nor otherwise than by proceedings had contradictorily with their tutor; and that no claim against them for moneys advanced to their tutor for their account can be ingrafted on proceedings had in their grandmother's mortuaria. 40 La. Ann. 497, 4 South. Rep. 513. The opposition to the account and the injunction were consolidated and tried together, resulting in a judgment which homologated the account, including the sum of $3,287.50 claimed from the minors for moneys advanced to their tutor for their account; perpetuating the injunction against the probate sale; and holding the administrator liable to the minors for one-third of the value of personal property lost or destroyed during the accountant's administration, extending from the 20th of July, 1883, to the 25th of June, 1887, and fixing their interest in said valuation at $2,419.37. From this judgment all parties appealed, but in this court a statement was made to the effect that the major heirs had discontinued their claim, thus leaving the controversy to be decided between the administrator and the minors. Counsel for the minors submits the following propositions, viz.: "Under its present status, the case presents for discussion and decision three points, which are as follows: (1) Can the administrator of the succession of Mrs. Minerva Sparrow obtain a judgment, through a final account of administration, against the minor heirs, Mary and Kate Decker, for moneys advanced by him to their tutor for their account? (2) Can the administrator be held legally liable for the loss of mules and other property of a perishable character, for having failed to sell the same immediately after his appointment? (3) Can an administrator be allowed to sell succession property to pay debts when the debts are shown to be claims which he propounds against the heirs individually, some being minors in possession of their share of the succession property under judicial authority?"

1. The first item of opposition that presents itself is the debit of $3,287.50, entered on the tableau of debts which accompanies the account against the minors, Mary and Kate Decker. That sum is the aggregate of two separate and distinct items of indebtedness, which are therein separately stated thus, viz.: Item 1. "Balance due by minors, Kate and Mary Decker, as per judgment above mentioned, which decreed them to owe the administrator $4,018.84, and ordered him to prorate as above mentioned; thus making his collection from them $2,531.34, and leaving a balance due by them of $1,487.50." Item 2. "Amounts advanced to C. S. Wyley, tutor for minors, Mary and Kate Decker, since filing the fourth provisional account as per Exhibit A and vouchers attached, numbered from one to twenty, inclusive, $1,800." The former is explained by referring to the first preceding item on the tableau, which specifically refers to the "judgment on the fourth provisional account, which decreed," etc., and which evidently is "the judgment above mentioned," as therein referred to. This explanation is further supplemented at the foot of the tableau thus: "The items of $1,660.87, due by Mrs. Foster; of $679.03, due by Mrs. Ashbridge; and of $1,487.50, due by the minors, Mary and Kate Decker, —were approved on the fourth provisional account, and are placed hereon for the sole purpose of showing the exact amount due by the said persons after making the pro rata distribution ordered by the judgment on said account."

Reference to the report of our decision in this succession, to be found in 42 La. Ann., at pages 500 et seq., 7 South. Rep. 611, will show that we dealt with and disposed of the administrator's fourth provisional account, and three tableaux of debts, the second of which was made up "of debts due by the heirs to the administrator of the succession," which was opposed by the tutor of the minors, Mary and Kate Decker, on various grounds. That opinion further shows that upon that second tableaux there appeared but three items, one of which was the amount advanced to the minors Decker, $4,018.84, which is the identical sum and the exact amount that is described and dealt with on the tableau under present consideration. 42 La. Ann. 505, 7 South. Rep. 611. Our opinion thus states the controversy, viz.: "Neither of the major heirs opposed the amounts charged to them, respectively, and hence the only question is with regard to the charges against the two minors, Mary and Kate Decker. The tutor insists that it is not competent for the settlement to be made in the succession of their grandmother, on an administrator's account, but that it should be referred to him as tutor for allowance or rejection, and settlement thereof, in the tutorship. He further contends that, as no debts can be made against minors in excess of their revenues without the authority of a family meeting, (Rev. Civil Code, art. 350,) there is no legal reason for the enforcement of the administrator's demand against them." But we made reference to what had been said in our opinion (39 La. Ann. 706, 2 South. Rep. 507) on the subject, to the effect that the administrator's advances to the minors "were manifestly prompted by laudable feelings, and considerations of fairness and humanity, for which [he] should not be made to suffer, if by any legal means he can obtain reimbursement," and that "we therefore deem it our duty to reserve the right of the administrator to demand reimbursement of all sums advanced by him to the two heirs aforesaid, as well as for similiar advances made to the minors, Mary and Kate Decker," (42 La. Ann. 506, 7 South. Rep. 613,) and said: "Hence it is clear that the whole question is remitted to this succession settlement, and that it is narrowed to the amount of money the administrator expended for their account. We can perceive no objection to this mode of proceeding, as the account and two of the tableaux concern the minors, and their interests are still united with those of the major heirs in the succession; and it is quite as much a matter of justice to the administrator that their liability to him for advance payments made on their inheritance should be adjusted in the succession as payments so made to the major heirs," (42 La. Ann. 506, 7 South. Rep. 613;) and affirmed the judgment of the lower court homologating those tableaux.

This citation is sufficient to show that in so far as the allowance of the item, supra, of $1,487.50 is concerned, it is fully covered by our judgment on last appeal, and that the present tableau cannot be disturbed in that respect. It is also quite sufficient authority for the settlement and judicial determination in the succession of the amounts that the administrator has advanced to the tutor of the minors "since filing of the fourth provisional account" of administration, and aggregating $1,800; for to that theory this court stands committed in two opinions rendered in this succession, and it was doubtless on the faith of them that the administrator acted—as he undoubtedly had a legal right to do—in furnishing the minors the means of subsistence from the funds in his hands subject to their demands, under the exceptional circumstances stated. It is therefore quite sufficient to state that it is our deliberate conviction that the judgment of the court homologating the tableau was jurisdictionally well grounded, in respect to the demand of the administrator against the minors. In respect to the amount of the claim of the administrator against the minors being in excess of their revenues, those two opinions (39 La. Ann. 706, 2 South. Rep. 507, and 42 La. Ann. 506, 7 South. Rep. 613) appear to be quite as conclusive as they are on the previous question, because we said of the administrator's claim that, while "all of these proceedings were irregular, and were carried on outside of the law, * * * [he] should not be made to suffer, if by any legal means he can obtain reimbursement. * * * We therefore deem it our duty to reserve the rights of * * * the present administrator to enforce their respective rights against the two heirs of age * * * by proper proceedings, in due course of administration, and we also reserve the rights of the administrator to demand reimbursement of all sums advanced by him to the two heirs aforesaid, as well as for similar advances made to the two minors, Mary and Kate Decker." 39 La. Ann. 706, 2 South. Rep. 507. When further litigation, in connection with the reserve in our previous decree, brought this succession before us a second time, (40 La. Ann. 484, 4 South. Rep. 513,) there was question made with reference to the right of the two minors to be put in possession of their interests in the succession, and it was objected on the part of the administrator that it was a condition precedent to their entering into possession that the amounts they owed him should be first paid; but this view did not obtain, the court declaring: "Besides, even if the law did not provide adequate powers to enforce any claim the administrator might have against the minor heirs, it is evident that the administrator already has in his hands funds that can be applied to the satisfaction of any demands against them." 40 La. Ann. 496, 4 South. Rep. 520. Thus we say, in one opinion, that the administrator's right to demand of the minors reimbursement of the sums paid is reserved "by proper proceedings in due course of administration," (39 La. Ann. 706, 2 South. Rep. 507;) in another, that he has in his hands funds that can be "applied to the satisfaction of any demand against them," (40 La. Ann. 496, 4 South. Rep. 520;) and in a third, "that the whole question is remitted to this succession settlement," (42 La. Ann. 506, 7 South. Rep. 613;) and, in the last case, we examined and approved the claims of the administrator against the minors, and adjudged "the shares or interests of the minors [to be] liable therefor." It is quite true that we also employed the expression, "there being no proof in the record to show that the sum expended exceeded their revenues," (42 La. Ann 507, 7 South. Rep. 613;) yet, on careful reflection, we are of the opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, the provisions of article 350 of the Revised Civil Code are not controlling. That article is found in the particular section of the Code which treats "of the administration of the tutor," and it provides a rule of action for the tutor. But in this case it is apparent that, while the succession of Mrs. Sparrow has been judicially terminated quoad the minors' interests, yet there has been no separation of their patrimony from the mass of the succession, or from the interests of their coheirs, and it is from the funds and property thus bound up that advances to the minors have been made, antecedent to the commencement of the tutor's actual administration of the minor's property. Inasmuch as settlement is clearly contemplated to take place, "in due course of administration," of the estate of Mrs. Minerva Sparrow, it seems to be indisputable that such settlement must be made in pursuance of the law governing successions, and not the law governing tutorships. Indeed, the Code puts upon the act of one who furnishes a minor with the necessaries of life the stamp of a contract by which the latter is bound, because it says: "When the minor has no tutor, or one who neglects to supply him with necessaries for his support or education, a contract or quasi contract for providing him with what is necessary for those purposes is valid." Rev. Civil Code, art. 1785. The act of the administrator was in strict keeping with the provisions of that article. As this is the sole ground of objection that is urged to the administrator's claims against the minors, in our opinion they were correctly allowed.

2. In respect to the claim made by the opposing minors of the alleged maladministration of the administrator, resulting in a loss of about 75 mules out of a total of 106 that were included in the inventory of 1883, under which he went into possession, and which were appraised and listed thereon at $100 each, making up an aggregate valuation of $10,600, it appears that the judge below regarded it as the basis of the administrator's liability, and he gave judgment accordingly. It is on this theory that the argument of the minors' counsel proceeds; insisting that, immediately upon qualification in July of 1883, the administrator took charge, and managed, operated, and cultivated the succession plantations, upon his individual account, and continued to do so until the 1st of January, 1888, (39 La. Ann. 702, 2 South. Rep. 501;) that, in the cultivation of said plantations, the administrator used and employed the mules in question. Thereupon the insistence of the counsel for the minors is that, as administrator, it was his plain legal duty to have caused a sale to be made of the mules within 10 days after his qualification, in pursuance of the terms of Rev. Civil Code, arts. 1051, 1163. To this claim the administrator's counsel replies that it is a fact, that has been ascertained by this court, that the succession was not only perfectly solvent when opened, but owed no debts, and, consequently, there was no occasion for the sale of the mules. The further answer is made that during the years since 1883 the mules were used and worked on the succession plantations, to which they were attached, and with which they were leased annually; and that Chaffe was condemned personally to pay a rental of $4,000 per annum therefor, from July, 1883, to January 1, 1888, and that the minors enjoyed their proportionate share of the revenues of the plantations and the mules, and are equitably estopped from urging any complaint of such use and enjoyment, or of the consequent loss sustained.

Referring to the first article cited, (article 1051,) it appears to point out the steps to be taken as a conservative measure, pending the acceptance or renunciation of a succession by the heirs, for it is prefaced by the declaration that "the administrator cannot sell the immovables of the succession committed to his charge until the term for deliberation has expired;" and then it directs that "if there be any [movables] liable to be wasted, or expensive to keep, he can sell them, on the special authorization of the judge," etc. Surely, no such condition existed in this case. The mules were neither liable to be wasted, nor expensive to keep, because they were attached to the plantations, and leased and used therewith; and besides, all the heirs, minors as well as majors, have long since accepted the succession; and the law imposed no duty on the administrator to sell, but gave him permission to do so, upon first securing the special authorization of the judge. We fail to find in the other article mentioned (article 1163) any more definite duty imposed upon the administrator, though it is quite true it says, viz.: "The curator is bound, in ten days after his appointment, to demand that all the remaining movable effects * * * be sold." But the word "remaining" connects that article with the one preceding it, which declares, viz.: "When there are, in a vacant succession, in which the heirs, or a part of them, are absent from and not represented in the state, movable effects which are perishable or costly to keep, the judge can, * * * before the succession is opened, order the sale of them," etc. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1163. By no means can these articles be extended to a solvent and accepted succession, to which there are no absent heirs. Even if they are to be taken as strictly applicable, they denounce, against the curator or administrator failing to observe their requirements, no penalty of any kind, and, in the absence of such provisions, it is manifestly our province to judge of the dereliction, and of its consequences. The rule of conduct which the Code prescribes for a curator or administrator is that "every curator of a vacant succession, or of absent heirs, is bound to take care of the effects intrusted to him, as a prudent administrator, * * * He is responsible for all damages caused by his misconduct." Rev. Civil Code, art. 1147. It is not alleged, proved, or argued that the administrator did not take care of the property intrusted to him, as a faithful administrator. It is not pretended that any damage happened to the mules through any misconduct of his. On the contrary, his administration has been admittedly clean, fair, and faithful; and the loss of the mules seems rather to have been occasioned by natural causes, such as work, overage, and ordinary use will bring about. For such losses the administrator cannot be made liable on the score of misconduct. It is evident to our minds that the allowance made on this score was erroneous, and must be disallowed and rejected.

3. While, technically speaking, the debts and charges that are marshaled by the administrator upon the final account and accompanying tableau are not debts of the deceased, yet they are evidently debts of the succession, and as such they are debts of high privilege, for the Code says: "The charges against a succession, such as funeral charges, law charges, lawyers' fees for settling the succession, * * * and all claims against the succession, originating after the death of the person whose succession is under administration, are to be paid before the debts contracted by the deceased," etc., (Rev. Civil Code, art. 3276;) and those in question are of that character. It is therefore evident that the following argument of counsel fails to support the theory he has advanced, viz.: "Hence it follows that the debts for which the administrator seeks to sell the property of the succession, with the exception, possibly, of his commission, are not even charged as debts of the succession, inherent to it as acts of the deceased, but they are avowedly debts of the heirs individually, contracted by them since the death of their ancestor, since the opening of her succession, and growing out of causes and transactions entirely independent of, and foreign to, the succession." (Our italics.)

4. In so far as the unmatured note for the sum of $4,000 balance due on plantation rents is concerned, we see no occasion to prolong an administration already too greatly protracted. That note may be quite as well surrendered into the possession of the heirs as any other asset of the succession, and collected by them. In our opinion the district judge erroneously sustained and perpetuated the injunction against the probate sale, and his judgment ought to be amended. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be so amended as to dissolve the opponents' injunction against the sale proceedings, at their cost, and so as to reject and disallow all of their demands. And, as thus amended, it is ordered and decreed that the judgment homologating the administrator's final account, and the accompanying tableau of debts, be affirmed, and the administrator be authorized and directed to proceed with the sale to pay the debts and charges thereon placed. And it is finally ordered that, upon due compliance with the decree of the lower court in the premises, he be finally discharged.

STATE v. CHAMBERS et al. (No. 11,021.)

CRIMINAL LAW — CONTINUANCE — DEPOSITIONS — PUBLIC TRIAL.

1. Continuances are largely within the discretion of the trial judge, and his rulings in matters of this kind will not be disturbed unless manifestly erroneous.

2. It is error for a district judge to grant an order in chambers, out of the presence of the accused, for the sheriff to take him to another parish, to be present at the taking of the deposition to be used in the trial against him of a witness who is physically unable to attend the session of the court. Such an order violates article 8 of the constitution, which contemplates a public trial, in the course of which the accused has the right to be confronted with witnesses against him.

Appeal from district court, parish of St. Martin; JAMES E. MOULTON, Judge.

Conviction of Lewis Chambers, Louis Michel, and Paul Comier of murder, without capital punishment. A new trial was granted Chambers. Defendant Michel was sentenced in accordance with the verdict, and appeals. Reversed.

Edward Simon, for appellant. Walter H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MCENERY, J. The accused were indicted for and convicted of murder without capital punishment. A new trial was granted to Lewis Chambers. The defendant Michel was sentenced in accordance with the verdict, and has appealed. There are two bills of exception in the record.

1. The first is to the refusal of the trial judge to grant a continuance. As repeatedly stated by this court, the matters of continuance are largely within the discretion of the trial judge, and the discretion vested in him will not be disturbed unless it is manifestly erroneous and arbitrary. The record does not show that this discretion has been abused by the trial judge in refusing a continuance to the defendant.

2. The second bill is to an order granted by the district judge to take the testimony of a witness, who was sick, in the parish of Iberia, and unable to be present at the trial and testify in the case. The district attorney presented a petition to the district judge, alleging that the witness was sick, "at the point of death, and would be unable to attend court, and give her evidence." It is stated by him in the petition that he visited the sick witness; found her in such a condition that she "would be unable to attend, and obey the summons of this court," which had been duly served on her; and the materiality of her evidence is stated at length. He "moved and prayed that your honor grant an order directed to the sheriff of St. Martin commanding him to take charge of and convey to the residence of Marie Abrams the accused, so that the district attorney may, in their presence, take the depositions and answers of the said Maria Abrams, under oath, to be used in evidence on the trial of this case, fixed for Tuesday, the 16th February, 1892." The district judge granted the prayer of the district attorney in the following order: "The foregoing petition considered, it is ordered that the sheriff of this parish forthwith take and convey to the residence of Marie Abrams, in Iberia parish, the accused Chambers and Michel; that the state attorney and the attorney for the defendant be notified of this, and requested to attend the examination of said Marie Abrams as a state witness in this case, before some justice of the peace, the deposition and testimony of said witness to be used on the trial of said cause now fixed for the 16th instant." The order was granted in chambers, out of the presence of the accused. There is no provision made by the laws of this state for the taking of the deposition of a witness for the state in a criminal proceeding. The order rendered by the trial judge, the taking of the deposition of the witness, and its use in the trial of the accused, violate article 8 of the constitution of the state, which contemplates a public trial, or preliminary examination, in the course of which the accused has the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him. The evidence against the accused must be delivered personally and orally before the jury, who are to pronounce him guilty or not guilty. 1 Bish. Crim Proc. par. 1194. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the verdict and judgment appealed from be set aside, annulled, and reversed, and the case be remanded to be proceeded with according to law and the views herein expressed.

STATE v. ALFRED et al. (No. 11,023.)

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—VERDICT—DANGEROUS WEAPON.

1. A charge made in an indictment that the accused, "with a certain dangerous weapon, to wit, a large piece of timber, one A. B., feloniously, willfully, and of his malice aforethought, did strike, with intent then and thereby him, the said A. B., to kill and murder," is responsive to Acts 43 and 44 of 1890.

2. A verdict rendered, finding the accused guilty of "striking with a dangerous weapon, with intent to kill," is responsive to the charge of such an indictment, and to the provisions of Act 44 of 1890.

3. "A large piece of timber" is a dangerous weapon, within the intendment of each one of those statutes.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of St. Martin; JAMES E. MOUTON, Judge.

Indictment of Adam Gaudi, Jean Baptiste, and Noel, Toussaint, and Eugene Alfred for assault with intent to kill. A nolle prosequi was entered as to Gaudi. On the trial, Jean Baptiste and Noel Alfred were acquitted, while Toussaint and Eugene Alfred were convicted, and appeal. Affirmed.

Edward Simon and Robert Martin, for appellants. Walter H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

WATKINS, J. The charge of the indictment is that the several defendants, "with a certain dangerous weapon, to wit, a large piece of timber, * * * one Francois Gaudi, * * * feloniously, willfully, and of his malice aforethought, did strike, with intent then and thereby him, the said Francois Gaudi, to kill and murder," etc. In limine the district attorney entered a nolle prosequi as to the defendant Adam Gaudi; and upon the trial the two defendants Jean Baptiste and Noel Alfred were acquitted, and Toussaint and Eugene Alfred were convicted of the crime of "striking with a dangerous weapon, with intent to kill." Thereupon the two convicted parties were sentenced "to imprisonment in the parish jail of the parish of [St. Martin] for a period of six months." After trial and conviction, but previous to sentence, counsel for the convicted parties presented and filed a motion in arrest of judgment upon the grounds—First, that the charge of the indictment does not respond to any law of the state; second, that the verdict of the jury does not respond to the charge of the indictment; and, third, that "a large piece of timber" is not a dangerous weapon, within the intendment of the statute under which the indictment was framed. This motion was overruled, and the counsel for the accused reserved a bill.

Looking into the acts of the legislature under which the indictment was found and the conviction secured, (Acts 43 and 44 of 1890,) it appears that the former declares that "whoever shall shoot, stab, cut, strike, or thrust any person with a dangerous weapon, with intent to commit murder, on conviction," etc. Section 1, Act 43 of 1890. The provisions of Act 44 of 1890 are of similar phraseology and import; the phrase of the former, to wit, "with intent to commit murder," being replaced by the phrase in the latter, to wit, "with intent to kill." It is therefore evident that the indictment was found under the provision of the former act, though the conviction was secured under those of the latter act,—a verdict permissible in law. It is equally evident that the indictment is responsive to Act 43 of 1890, and the verdict is responsive to Act 44 of 1890. That "a large piece of timber" is, in the sense of those statutes, "a dangerous weapon," we are of opinion, is not open to doubt. In State v. Lowry, 33 La. Ann. 1224, like phraseology occurring in a similar statute was thus interpreted and applied. The accused in that case was indicted under Rev. St. § 790, which declares that "if any person lying in wait * * * shall shoot, stab, or thrust any person with a dangerous weapon, with the intent to commit the crime of murder, he shall," etc.; and the charge was that the accused "did thrust or strike with a dangerous weapon, namely, an iron bolt, rod, or pin," etc.; and this court held that "such an instrument may well be a dangerous weapon." That decision is correct, and is conclusive of the question here.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE ex rel. CHANDLER v. KRUTTSCHNITT, Judge. (No. 11,030.)

CERTIORARI AND PROHIBITION—REMEDY BY APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF TRANSCRIPT.

1. Writs of certiorari and prohibition cannot be allowed in an appealable case to revise interlocutory decrees and a final judgment rendered therein. Such decrees and judgment may be reviewed and corrected on appeal.

2. A relator is the less entitled to the summary relief asked through the writs, where he has applied for an appeal and one has been allowed him.

3. An order granting an appeal would be irregular if it directed the insertion into the transcript of records filed in evidence. The direction would be a superfluity.

4. It is the duty of the clerk, without any instruction from the court, to copy into the transcript all the evidence adduced on the trial of the case.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by the state, on relation of J. B. Chandler, against E. B. Kruttschnitt, judge ad hoc., for writs of certiorari and prohibition. Refused.

The Relator, in pro. per. The Respondent, in pro. per.

BERMUDEZ, C. J. This is an application for writs of certiorari and prohibition. The relator complains that, in the course of the trial of a suit brought by him before the civil district court for the parish of Orleans, for the nullity of a judgment rendered in the Succession of Emily Glover, the judge ad hoc has, in a number of instances, which are elaborately specified, made erroneous and arbitrary rulings, and has finally decided the controversy by a judgment unwarranted by the evidence and the law, rejecting the demand; that he has applied for a suspensive appeal, which was denied him. The prayer is for a writ of certiorari, directing the judge ad hoc to send up the record in the case, together with others filed in evidence therein. It asks that the judge ad hoc be restrained from proceeding in said case until otherwise ordered by this court, and that, after hearing, all the acts complained of be declared nullities and invalidated, and that the judge ad hoc be ordered to proceed in the case according to law. The judge ad hoc returns that the relator has applied for and has been allowed a suspensive appeal, in manner and form set forth in the certified copy of the minutes of the court a qua, annexed to and made part of the answer; that it is untrue that this defendant refused plaintiff a suspensive appeal; but that defendant did refuse in the order for said suspensive appeal to render further orders not germane, and in no manner relevant to, said motion of appeal. The suit instituted by the relator is appealable, judging from the description given of it by him in his application for relief in this court, and from the fact that he has moved for an appeal from the judgment rendered in it. Owing to its appealability, and to the circumstance that an appeal has been asked and allowed, it is clear that the relator cannot have the rulings and the judgment on the merits, complained of, reviewed by this court in these proceedings. When the transcript will have been filed, and the case submitted, it will become the duty of the court to consider and determine the complaints of the relator, redressing his grievances, if he has sustained any. The relator does not ask for a mandamus to compel the judge ad hoc to grant him an appeal in the form in which he says it should have been allowed. Nevertheless, as the judge ad hoc has put the matter at issue, and appended to his return an extract from the minutes of the court, which shows the nature of the motion for an appeal, and the action of the judge upon it, the complaint may as well be determined. The motion states that three original records designated by numbers, and four printed statements or briefs filed therein, are necessary for an intelligent review of the fraudulent practices of defendant and attorneys, and that there is error to the prejudice of the mover in the final judgment rendered dismissing the suit, and that mover desires to appeal therefrom. On this motion the judge ad hoc ordered that the mover be allowed a suspensive appeal from the judgment returnable to this court on the 3d Monday in March, 1892, the bond being fixed at $250. The motion does not ask that the three records be copied in the transcript, and, had it done so, it would have been a surplusage, as, if they were filed in evidence, it would be the duty of the clerk to transcribe them. The order of appeal granted is in the usual proper form, and would have been irregular had it directed the insertion of the records in the transcript. It is therefore ordered that the application herein be refused, with costs.

CANAL & C. R. CO. v. CRESCENT CITY R. CO. et al. (No. 10,846.)

STREET RAILWAYS—GRANT BY CITY—ELECTRIC MOTORS—USE OF ANOTHER'S TRACK—INJUNCTION.

1. The city government of New Orleans has the right to grant the privilege of the use of a part of the tracks of a street railway to another company. It can continue the use of a different car, propelled by a different motor than the one in use on the track.

2. The permission to use the electric motor is one of the means of using the public streets, and is granted for the public convenience, and is the exercise of the police power of the city over public places.

3. A company desiring to use the roadbed and material in place of another company must first make compensation. But where an injunction is granted, without the prayer for compensation, before using the track, but a prohibition for the use of the track for any and all cars, it will be dissolved.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; NICHOLAS H. RIGHTOR, Judge.

Suit by the Canal & Claiborne Railroad Company against the Crescent City Railroad Company and the Electric Traction & Manufacturing Company to enjoin defendants from running additional cars over plaintiff's tracks, etc. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. R. Beckwith and Felix P. Poche for appellant. John M. Bonner, for appellee Crescent City Railroad Company. Farrar, Jonas & Kruttschnitt, for appellee Electric Traction & Manufacturing Company.

MCENERY, J. The petition avers that the Canal & Claiborne Railroad Company is a corporation. That in the year 1887 the Canal & Claiborne Streets Railroad Company, another corporation, acquired from the city of New Orleans, for itself and its assigns, in due form, a lawful grant to own and operate a street railway for the term of 25 years on and over Canal street and the other streets described in the petition and in a copy of the grant annexed to the petition. The term of the grant commenced to run from the 8th of May, 1887. This grant was not only a legislative act of the city of New Orleans, but was in due form, and by due authority, embodied in a solemn contract by notarial act, made a part of the petition by copy. That during the month of July, 1888, for a valuable consideration, the plaintiff, by purchase, acquired an assignment of the grant, and from that date has been the full owner of all the rights and franchises contained in said grant, and still owns the same, having acquired all the rights of its vendor, the Canal & Claiborne Streets Railroad Company, the original grantee. Among other property so purchased and acquired is the track or railway on Canal street, running from the intersection of St. Charles street with Canal to the terminus at Wells street, near the river, and back by another track or railway, on the lower side of Canal street, to the intersection of Bourbon street with Canal street. That the Crescent City Railroad Company is carrying on a street railway, and operates two lines of railway,—one commonly known as the "Annunciation Line," running through Tchoupitoulas, Annunciation, and other streets, having its lower terminus on Canal street, in the middle ground, near the intersection of Camp with Canal streets; and another line, which it claims to have acquired from some alleged grantee for a street railway, commencing at the junction of Camp and Prytania streets, running along the streets named in the petition, but coming back for its final or lower terminus to the point of commencement, that is, to the intersection of Camp and Prytania streets; and defendants claim that this grant, originally made to one Seymour and his associates, was by some subsequent action of the city authorities expanded so as to give the grantee and his assigns a right to extend a line to Canal street. This line is known as the "Coliseum Line." That, after the Crescent City Railroad Company got possession of this supposed grant and its extension, they commenced running cars on this Coliseum line over the line and tracks of plaintiff on Canal street, without its consent, and unlawfully, from the intersection of St. Charles street with the upper side of Canal street to Wells street, and back on the lower side of Canal street, on petitioner's track, to the intersection of Bourbon street with Canal. That this act was unlawful, without the consent of plaintiff, and without any right or warrant of law. This first invasion of the tracks and rights of plaintiff was with mule or horse cars of the ordinary construction and weight. That the right of action to demand indemnity or damages arising from this first invasion of plaintiff's rights by the use of said mule or horse cars is reserved in the petition. That, not contented with the wrong done by running its Coliseum cars over the track of plaintiff, defendants now attempt a further outrage and invasion of plaintiff's rights, and are engaged in constructing a new railway through Erato street, so planned as to connect the Annunciation street line, whose cars could not, without such junction, run over plaintiff's tracks, with the Coliseum street line, of which line the cars had the unlawful use of plaintiff's tracks, so that additional cars from the Annunciation line, that prior to said action could not reach plaintiff's line or tracks on Canal street, can be diverted from the Annunciation street line, taken through the Erato connecting link, sent over the Coliseum line, and thence on and over plaintiff's tracks on Canal street. That they threaten and intend to run many, if not all, of their Annunciation street cars through said Erato street connection over the Coliseum line over the Canal street tracks of plaintiff, increasing the number of cars running on plaintiff's track over the number formerly running from the Coliseum track over the plaintiff's line by at least 15 additional cars, making trips over the lines at intervals not exceeding 10 or 15 minutes during the entire day. That this is not the only wrong that is contemplated by the defendants, but that the Crescent City Railroad Company has entered into a combination with the other defendant, the Electric Traction & Manufacturing Company, by which the said Electric Traction & Manufacturing Company is to operate or provide the rolling stock for the Crescent City Railroad Company on its lines, to be propelled over plaintiff's track on Canal street, the new rolling stock to involve a change of motive power from car or mule propulsion to some form of electric propulsion by electric motor and storage batteries, with a construction giving the cars a weight of at least 8,000 pounds, independent of any passenger load. That the Electric Traction Company intend to stock the road with these heavy cars, and join the defendant railroad company in its assault upon the plaintiff's rights and property. That the railway of plaintiff on Canal street was constructed and designed in accordance with the specifications and obligations contained in its contract with the city for the use of cars propelled by mules or horses, of not over 3,800 pounds in weight, and is not constructed to bear the heavy rolling stock threatened to be put upon the structure, and is not adequate to bear and sustain a traffic carried on in cars of a character that without load weigh over 4 tons. That the additional cars thrown on plaintiff's tracks by the Erato street connection from the Annunciation line will crowd petitioner's tracks on Canal street, so that, in the event that they do endure the additional cars and additional traffic without destruction, there will be practical eviction of plaintiff from the use of its own property in its tracks for its own legitimate use in the management and operation of its own lines for its own business. The relief demanded is an injunction prohibiting the defendants from running any cars coming through the new roadway on Erato street, connecting the Annunciation street line with the Coliseum line, and from any unlawful use, meddling, or interference with the plaintiff's line on Canal street by any additional cars running through Erato street from Annunciation street over the Coliseum line and over plaintiff's tracks, and from running any electric motor cars of heavy weight, and from meddling and interfering in any manner with plaintiff's rights in the complete dominion, control, and use of its street railway line and property on Canal street.

The Crescent City Railroad Company, after pleading the general issue, averred that all the matters and things set up in the petition relative to the right of the plaintiff to that part of the track on Canal street, and relative to the right of the Crescent City Railroad Company to use the same, were in issue between said Canal & Claiborne Streets Railroad Company and this defendant in suit, (Claiborne Railroad Company vs. Crescent City Railroad Company,) and that a final judgment has been rendered therein in favor of the Crescent City Railroad Company, and which final judgment was affirmed on appeal to the supreme court;[1] and this defendant pleads said record and said judgment as res adjudicata, and makes the record of said suit a part of this answer for reference and proof. That all that portion of the track on Canal street, claimed as being the exclusive property of the plaintiff, was originally constructed for a common trunk line, which all the railroads running cars on Canal street had the right to use under the conditions of the city ordinance providing for the construction of said trunk line. That the pretended new grant of 1887, set up by the plaintiff, was necessarily obtained subject to the conditions of the old grant, and subject to the rights acquired under the provisions of the old grant by the Crescent City Railroad Company in pursuance of certain ordinances from the city of New Orleans; and that, under the provisions of said old grant, and the right acquired from the city of New Orleans, the Crescent City Railroad Company is as much the owner of said line, and has as great a right to run cars upon said line, as the Canal & Claiborne Railroad Company has; the only obligation upon the Crescent City Railroad Company or the city of New Orleans being to reimburse to the plaintiff a fair and reasonable proportion of the value of the portion or portions of the road to be so used. That the grant of 1887 was obtained from the city of New Orleans under the present charter, which provides that the council shall have power to compel all railways on any one street to run on and use one and the same track. That the defendant has been lawfully and peaceably running its cars over the trunk tracks on Canal street since 1881, and that its right so to run its cars has been adjudged in the suit above set forth. That this defendant has obtained permission from the city of New Orleans to use electricity in propelling its cars, and that the plaintiff has no right to say what kind of cars, or what number of cars, or what weight of cars, this defendant, under authority from the city of New Orleans, shall run in the streets, over its own tracks, in accordance with its franchises. That for more than a year it has operated one of said motor cars over the said common track, without injury of any kind thereto. That the ordinance No. 4,348, approved March 17, 1890, is not a new grant to this defendant, but is simply a modification of a grant made in the year 1880, and not a substantial change thereof. That, even if it were a new grant, it is clearly within the police power of the city of New Orleans over its streets. That the defendant has constructed tracks through Erato street in accordance with the provisions of the ordinance approved March 17, 1890, and that it intends to run a portion of its Coliseum cars through the said street and over the Annunciation street tracks, and that it intends to run some of the Annunciation street cars through said connection, as the exigencies of travel and the requirements of business may demand; and defendant says it clearly has the right so to do under its various grants from the city of New Orleans. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants in the lower court, and the plaintiff has brought the case here on appeal.

The right of the defendant to run cars belonging to the Coliseum & Upper Magazine line has already been definitively settled in the decree in the case of Canal & C. St. R. Co. v. Crescent City R. Co., 41 La. Ann. 561, 6 South. Rep. 849. It is claimed, however, that the Crescent City Railroad Company is operating two lines of railroad,—one known as the "Annunciation Line," which was extended through certain streets, so as to bring its cars over plaintiff's track on Canal street, thus increasing the number of cars run by defendants over the track of plaintiff, which is recognized as a trunk line. The defendants had the permission of the city government to run over this line and over plaintiff's track. It is immaterial to consider the question raised whether this was a new franchise, as the city had the undoubted authority to permit any company to use the track of plaintiff. Id. In the occupation and use of plaintiff's track there can be no interference with the right of the plaintiff to run its cars on schedule time, in accordance with its contract with the city. To permit this would be to practically evict plaintiff from the use of its roadbed, and in the management and operation of its business. There is no evidence, however, that such an eviction has taken place.

It appears from the record that the co-defendant the Electric Traction & Manufacturing Company placed its cars on the track of plaintiff, under the franchise enjoyed by the defendants, and in accordance with a contract entered into between them They were manufacturers of a certain description of car, which the defendants placed on their line, and ran over plaintiff's track. That the track was originally constructed for horse cars, and was not strong enough to bear the weight of electric cars, is no reason why they should not be placed on the track. There are constant improvements in the mode of travel. New and improved conveyances are daily coming into use. Public convenience and necessity require the adoption of the most improved methods. The streets belong to the public. Their use for the public cannot be abridged. Hence, when the municipal government in its discretion sees the necessity of permitting the use of the streets by improved cars, driven at greater speed by a new motor, no one can complain, as no franchise can be granted over a street exclusively to any one for the continued use of any particular kind of conveyance. The electric motor is but one means of using the streets, and the permission to use the electric car is established for the public convenience, and is the exercise of the police power of the city over its public places. It cannot be questioned, unless, as stated above, its use evicts the company which owns the roadbed and material in place from its property. The principle has been announced by this court that before one company can avail itself of the use of the roadbed and material in place of another the road so desiring to enter upon the part of the track of another must first make compensation. Canal & C. Co. v. Orleans R. Co., 43 La. Ann. ——.[1] This question is not presented in this case. The relief asked is an absolute prohibition to the putting of any and all cars on plaintiff's track by the defendant. The defendant has used the track of plaintiff. It has its cars of the Annunciation line now on plaintiff's track. It is true the injunction was bonded, but there is no prayer in the petition that compensation be made to the plaintiff before use of its tracks. The relief is now one of damages. Judgment affirmed, with reservation of the right of plaintiff to sue defendants for damages for use of its tracks.

CONNOR v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Florida. May 2, 1892.)

OBTAINING PROPERTY UNDER FALSE PRETENSES—INFORMATION—CONSTRUCTION OF ALLEGATIONS—VENUE.

1. The receipt or obtaining of property obtained under false pretenses is the consummation of the offense; and when the pretenses are made in one jurisdiction, and the property is obtained by the offender in another jurisdiction, the prosecution can be instituted only in the latter jurisdiction, unless there is a valid statute permitting it elsewhere.

2. An allegation that the party defrauded "then and there, by reason of said false pretenses" (they having been previously set forth in the information) "of the said defendants, and fully relying upon and believing in the truth thereof, were then and there induced to part with their ownership of and in said thirty-two hundred dollars to the said" defendants, "and did then and there part with their ownership in said thirty-two hundred dollars to said defendants," is not tantamount to an allegation that the defendants obtained the money.

3. An allegation that the defendants "obtained" by false pretenses, previously described, certain money, but not indicating where they obtained it, and one that the party defrauded, then and there relying upon the pretenses, and believing in their truth, were then and there induced to part with their ownership of and in the money, and did then and there part with their ownership in the same to the defendants, do not show where the money was obtained by defendants, or that it was obtained in the county or jurisdiction where the pretenses were, as previously alleged, made.

4. An information charging the crime of obtaining property under false pretenses is uncertain as to the venue or jurisdictional locality of the offense where, having previously named two or more places, it simply uses the word "there" (in the expression "then and there") in charging the obtaining of the property; and it is consequently insufficient, and should be quashed.

5. An information for obtaining property under false pretenses, which, by reason of its uncertainty, does not make it appear that the property was obtained in the county where the pretenses were made, nor elsewhere in the state of Florida, does not show that a court of the county where the pretenses are alleged to have been made has jurisdiction of the offense; and this even under a statute (section 4, p. 446, McClel. Dig.) which provides that in all cases where an indictable offense shall be perpetrated in Florida, and the same shall commence in one county and terminate in another, the person offending shall be liable to indictment in either county.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to criminal court of record, Marion county; W. S. BULLOCK, Judge.

Information against Claude E. Connor for obtaining property under false pretenses. Defendant's motion to quash the information was overruled, and he brings error. Reversed, with directions to quash the information.

R. L. Anderson and R. W. Davis, for plaintiff in error. W. B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

RANEY, C. J. The information is for obtaining property under false pretenses. There was a motion made in the trial court to quash the information, but the motion was overruled, and error has been assigned on this action. The first ground of the motion to be noticed is the one asserting that the information does not show jurisdiction of the court to try the cause. The principle of law relied upon in support of this contention is that the receipt of money or other property obtained under false pretenses is the consummation of the offense, and the place of its receipt by the offender is the locality of jurisdiction. The receipt or obtaining of the property is the consummation of the offense, and in the absence of a valid qualifying statute the place of its receipt is the sole locality of jurisdiction. If the false pretenses are made in one jurisdiction, but the property is obtained in another, the prosecution must, in the absence of such a statute, be instituted in the latter jurisdiction. 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 758, 762. In State v. House, 55 Iowa, 466, 8 N. W. Rep. 307, where the property alleged to have been fraudulently obtained consisted of promissory notes and a mortgage securing the notes, the false pretenses were made, and an agreement of settlement providing for the execution and delivery of the notes and mortgage was executed in Wright county, and afterwards the notes and mortgage were made and delivered to the defendant in Polk county, where he was indicted, tried, and convicted, and it was held that the false pretenses made in Wright county were not a crime; that an indictment would not lie there, because the notes were not obtained there; and that as the crime was consummated in Polk county, by the delivery of the papers in that county, the indictment was properly found there, no matter where the false representations which induced their delivery were made. In Skiff v. People, 2 Parker, Crim. R. 139, the county of the delivery of the property was held to be the proper county for the trial of the offense, though the note for the property was not made and delivered until subsequently, and in another county. Norris v. State, 25 Ohio St. 217, decides that where one, by false pretenses contained in a letter sent by mail, procures the owner of goods to deliver them to a designated common carrier in one county, consigned to the writer in another county, the offense of obtaining goods by false pretenses is complete in the former county, and the offense must be prosecuted therein; the delivery of the goods to the common carrier being a delivery to the defendant's agent, and hence in law a delivery to the defendant. In People v. Adams, 3 Denio, 190, Adams and another were indicted in the city of New York for obtaining money from a firm of commission merchants in that city by exhibiting to them fictitious receipts signed by the other defendant in Ohio, falsely acknowledging the delivery to such other defendant of a quantity of produce for the use of, and subject to the order of, the firm; and Adams pleaded that he was a natural-born citizen of Ohio, and had always resided there, and had never been in the state of New York; that the receipts were drawn and signed in Ohio; and that the offense was committed by the receipts being presented in New York to the firm by innocent agents there, employed by the defendant in Ohio,—and the plea was adjudged to be bad, and the indictment to have been properly found in New York. And, in entire consistency with this decision, it was held in Stewart v. Jessup, 51 Ind. 413, that a person is not liable to conviction and punishment in Indiana for obtaining property under false pretenses, where the property has been obtained outside of that state, although the false pretenses may have been made within it. See, also, In re Carr, 28 Kan. 1; State v. Round, 82 Mo. 679; State v. Shaeffer, 89 Mo. 271, 1 S. W. Rep. 293; Com. v. Taylor, 105 Mass. 172; Com. v. Wood, 142 Mass. 459, 8 N. E. Rep. 432; Com. v. Van Tuyl, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 1.

We will defer any consideration of the statutory provision that in all cases where an indictable offense shall be perpetrated in this state, and the same shall commence in any one county and terminate in another, the person offending shall be liable to indictment in either county, (section 4, p. 446, McClel. Dig.,) and will test the information, upon the point of venue, by the rules of law laid down above.

The allegations of the first count, as to obtaining the money, are, substituting figures for words, as follows: "And the said Connor, Chambliss, and Vogt, by means of the said false pretenses, obtained from the said bank, and the said Rollins, Morgan, and Greeley, as its managing agents and directors, certain moneys, to wit, $3,200, of the value of $3,200, the property of said bank. And the said bank, and the said Rollins, Morgan, and Greeley, as its directors and managing agents, then and there, by reason of the said false pretenses of the said defendants, and fully relying upon and believing in the truth thereof, were then and there induced to part with their ownership of and in the said $3,200 to the said Connor, Chambliss, and Vogt, and did then and there part with their ownership in said $3,200 to said defendants." It is apparent that there is nothing said in the first of the above-quoted sentences as to place, and hence no express statement as to where the defendants obtained the money. Assuming, as we will, for the purpose of the point under discussion, that the venue of the pretenses, as previously laid in the count, is in Marion county, still such distinctive allegation of venue cannot be invoked to show that the defendants did obtain the money in the same locality or jurisdiction, in the absence of apt words connecting the obtaining of the money with it. The first sentence, then, fails altogether to show where the money was obtained, or where, in the light of the above authorities, the offense was consummated or is indictable; and consequently the count must be held to be insufficient unless we can find from the succeeding or second sentence of the quoted words that the money was obtained by the defendants in Marion county. We will admit it was the intention of the pleader that the word "there," as used in the second sentence, should refer to the county of Marion, in this state, when mentioned in the preceding parts of the information, in designating the venue of the pretenses. Still this sentence, if it is not in substance and effect an allegation that the defendants obtained the money, will not save the count under consideration. Giving the word "there" the effect and meaning of the words "in the county of Marion, in the state of Florida," has the sentence the meaning and effect suggested? We do not think that the allegation that the person defrauded, or owner of the property, or his agent, was by reason of, and in reliance upon, false pretenses of a defendant, induced to part with, and did part with, his ownership of and in certain moneys or other property to the defendants, is the equivalent of an allegation that the defendants obtained the money by or through such pretenses, or at all. This is not a prosecution for obtaining under false pretenses a signature to any written instrument, the false making whereof would be punished as forgery, but it is for obtaining or getting the possession of the money itself. The ownership of the bank in the money could have passed to the defendants without the defendants obtaining the money or the bank having parted with the money itself, or having delivered it to the defendants, or to any one. To "obtain," as defined by Webster, means "to get hold of by effort; to gain possession of; to acquire." The two former definitions give more accurately than the third the meaning of the word as used in the statute. In State v. Lewis, 26 Kan. 123, the information charged that, upon certain false pretenses of Lewis, one Burton "paid" to him the stated sum of $330, the money, property, and effects of certain parties, but it was not alleged that Lewis obtained any money or any other property of any one; and the question was whether the word "paid" was the equivalent of the word "obtained." "The crime defined by the statute," says the opinion, "is not that of making a false pretense; but the provision is directed against one who obtains something, or who, in other words, gets possession of something purposely by effort,—that is, by false pretenses. This being true, the information does not describe the offense either in the exact words of the statute, or by adoption of other words of substantially the same meaning with the words of the statute." Kennedy v. State, 34 Ohio St. 310; Com. v. Lannan, 1 Allen, 500; People v. Court, 13 Hun, 395. The bank and its agents might have been induced by the defendants to part with the bank's ownership of and in the money to the defendants, and might have actually parted with the bank's ownership of and in the money to the defendants, and all this might have been in Marion county; and still the defendants may not have obtained possession of the money in that county, or even at all. This count does not show that the defendants obtained the money in Marion county, and hence it, when judged in the light of the law as it is set forth above, is insufficient.

Proceeding now to consider the amenability of the second count to the objection that it does not show the jurisdiction of the court, or, in other words, does not show that the money was obtained or the offense committed in Marion county, it is proper to state that the averment of this count as to the defendants' obtaining the money is that the defendants, by means of the said false pretenses, and said false and privy tokens, did then and there obtain from the said Land Mortgage Bank of Florida, Limited, of England, as aforesaid, and the said John F. Rollins, Morgan, and Greeley, as its agents, certain property, to wit, the sum of $2,993, and a check and order for the payment of money, of the value of $2,993, of the property, goods, and effects of the said Land Mortgage Bank of Florida, Limited, of England; and the said Rollins, Morgan, and Greeley, as its directors and managing agents, as aforesaid, and the said bank and the said Rollins, Morgan, and Greeley, as its directors and managing agents, aforesaid, relying upon and fully believing in the truth of the said false pretenses, and said false and privy tokens and paper writings, of the said defendants, were then and there induced, by reason of same, to part with the said money, and the said check and order for money, and the ownership therein of the said bank, and the said Rollins, Morgan, and Greeley, directors and agents, aforesaid, to said defendants.

It is a settled rule that if the indictment or information is uncertain or repugnant to itself, as to the county or other jurisdictional locality of the commission of the offense, or, in other words, as to the venue of the offense, it will be held insufficient. 2 Hale, P. C. 180; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. (3d Ed.) § 379; 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 160. In Cain v. State, 18 Tex. 391, the indictment, after "State of Texas, county of Fayette," and the usual commencement, charged that James Cain, late of Travis county aforesaid, yeoman, with force and arms, in the county aforesaid, on, etc., did then and there feloniously steal, take, and carry away, etc., it was held that there was manifest repugnancy as to the place or county where the offense was committed, and that it was good ground in arrest of judgment. And in Bell v. Com., 8 Grat. 600, Campbell county, the county in which the indictment was found, was mentioned in the caption, and in the body of the indictment it was charged "that Alonzo G. Bell, late of the county of Roanoke, in the state of Virginia, laborer, on the 10th day of March, A. D. 1850, with force and arms, at the parish of Russell, in the county aforesaid," one bay mare, of the value, etc.; and the indictment was held bad, as not showing with sufficient certainty that the offense was committed in Campbell county. It is observed in State v. McCracken, 20 Mo. 411, where two different counties were named, and the indictment was quashed, that when two different times and two different places are mentioned in an indictment, and a material fact is afterwards averred, it will not be sufficient to give venue to such fact by stating "then and there" only; for it will not do to say that, grammatically, "then and there" refer to the last antecedent time and place. See, also, Reg. v. Rhodes, 2 Ld. Raym. 886; King v. Inhabitants, 2 East, 65; Rex v. Kilderby, 1 Saund. 308; Queen v. Gunn, 11 Mod. 66.

In view of what appears in the second count, in its averments of the pretenses, and preceding what is quoted above, it is impossible to say that the word "there," as used in the quotation, this count, refers only to Marion county, or locates the obtaining the money and check in that county. Though at the outset of the count it is alleged that it was in such county the defendants designedly and fraudulently pretended, still such pretending or pretenses are charged to have been made to the Land Mortgage Bank of Florida, Limited, of England; and though afterwards, but preceding the above quotation, it is charged that certain false and fraudulent papers were made in Marion county, yet, in connection with these allegations the bank, the party alleged to have been defrauded, is again, and more than once, described as "of England;" and in one place it, in designating a draft or order as one of the false pretenses used in obtaining the money or check, is designated as "of England, Jacksonville, Fla." If it be that the absence of the word "city" before the word "Jacksonville" will prevent our taking judicial notice that the city of Jacksonville, in Duval county,—a city, we may observe, which is incorporated by special statute, (chapter 3775, approved May 31, 1887, and chapter 3776, approved June 2, 1887, and chapter 3952, approved May 16, 1889, and chapter 3953, approved May 31, 1889, and chapter 4039, approved June 9, 1891,)—is the place meant by the words "Jacksonville, Florida," still we think the word "there," in the expression "then and there," in the averment as to the obtaining the money or check, is, in view of the preceding statement of the two jurisdictions, Marion county and England, entirely insufficient to show where the defendants obtained the money or check, and hence that the count is entirely uncertain as to the venue or jurisdiction of the obtaining of the things mentioned. It cannot be held to refer any more to Marion county than to England.

Tested by the rule laid down in the first paragraph of this opinion, neither of the two counts is sufficient, and for the reasons indicated as to each count; yet, without saying that the first is not subject also to the criticism made of the second, the information must be quashed, unless the statute first referred to above (section 4, p. 446, McClel. Dig.) will save it. This statute cannot be invoked as aiding a case of this character unless the information or indictment shows a consummation of the offense in Florida. There has been no crime committed in Florida unless the money or the check was obtained here, and this is not shown by either count. If the information duly represented that the things were obtained in Marion county, the information would be good upon its face as against the objections considered; or if it represented that the pretenses were in Marion county, and the money and check were obtained in another county in the state, it would also be good, under the above statute, unless there is something in the nature of cases of this kind which has not been suggested. If there is nothing of such kind in the nature of the case, and an information should lay both the pretenses and the obtaining in the same county, when in fact they are in different counties, a question of variance might arise, rendering it necessary to decide the question of the proper way of pleading offenses which the statute last cited was intended to apply to. The authorities cannot be held to be in harmony. Mr. Bishop approves a statement of them as they occurred, (2 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 381; 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 195;) and certainly this is fairest to the accused. People v. Dougherty, 7 Cal. 395.

The information should have been quashed; and, in view of the jurisdictional reasons leading to this conclusion, we cannot be expected to consider the numerous other objections made to the information.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to quash the information.

SMITH v. STATE.

FORGERY—INDICTMENT—ADMISSIONS—MOTION IN ARREST OF JUDGMENT—EXCEPTIONS—QUALIFICATIONS OF JURORS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

1. Section 1, c. 4015, Laws Fla., providing that grand and petit jurors shall be taken from the registered voters who have paid their last assessed capitation tax in their respective counties, does not contemplate that said tax shall be paid before it becomes due and payable under section 44, c. 4010, Acts 1891; and where a grand jury was duly organized for a term of court on the 13th day of October, A. D. 1891, it is held that a failure to pay the capitation tax for that year does not disqualify them to serve as jurors.

2. The act supra, c. 4015, is not in conflict with article 3, § 16, Const. 1885.

3. When an indictment for forgery undertakes to set forth the instrument alleged to be forged according to its tenor, great particularity is required, and any variance as to the words of such instrument, unless the same be mere fault of spelling, will be fatal; but, in an indictment for forgery of an order for the payment of money, the words and figures in the margin of the order, and which constitute no part of the instrument, need not be set out, unless they constitute an essential description of the order.

4. Where the ground of the objection to the introduction of a paper in evidence is not stated, and no exception is taken at the time to the decision of the court overruling the objection, the party cannot avail himself of an exception to such decision in a motion for a new trial.

5. The voluntary statement of an accused, in reference to his connection with an offense, may be shown by the state to be untrue.

6. An order drawn by a county board of public instruction, as an allowance for an account approved by the board, and directed to the county treasurer for the payment of money, is such an instrument, within the meaning of our statute, as can be the subject of forgery.

7. In an indictment for forgery of a check, promissory note, or order for the payment of money, it is sufficient to set out in the indictment the alleged instrument in haec verba, with the names of the makers and payees on it, together with proper averments that the accused falsely made, forged, and counterfeited said instrument with the intent to defraud.

8. Motions in arrest of judgment reach only such errors as are apparent upon the record, and the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict cannot be considered on such motion.

9. Evidence of venue in a criminal prosecution need not exclude every reasonable doubt, but where the evidence raises a violent presumption that the offense was committed within the jurisdiction alleged, or if this can be reasonably inferred from the evidence, it will be sufficient.

10. A general exception to an entire charge that contains a correct proposition of law is not good, but, under our practice, it devolves upon the party to properly except in the trial court to the portion of the charge supposed to be erroneous.

11. Held, that the testimony, as shown by the record, fails to connect the accused with the act of forgery, or with the instrument in its altered condition, or with the proceeds thereof, or with the person to whom it as altered was paid, and, though showing circumstances of suspicion, was insufficient to sustain a conviction. MABRY, J., dissenting, held that the testimony was sufficient to connect the accused with the alteration, and sustain the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Madison county; JOHN F. WHITE, Judge.

Indictment against Henry C. Smith for forgery. He was convicted, and, his motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial being overruled, he brings error. Reversed.

W. C. McCall, for plaintiff in error. W. B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MABRY, J. On the 15th day of October, A. D. 1891, the plaintiff in error was indicted in the circuit court for Madison county. The indictment, leaving out some of its formalities, is as follows:

"The grand jurors for the state of Florida, duly chosen, impaneled, and sworn diligently to inquire and true presentment make, in and for the body of the county of Madison and third judicial circuit of said state, upon their oaths present that Henry C. Smith, late of said county, laborer, on the first day of June, A. D. 1891, at and in the county, circuit, and state aforesaid, with force and arms, with intent unlawfully, willfully, and wickedly to injure and defraud the board of public instruction of Madison county, state of Florida, of moneys held by said board for the use of the common schools of said county, then and there in the hands of the county treasurer of said county, one order given by the said board as aforesaid, payable to the order of one R. L. Williams, for the sum of three dollars, said order being in writing, and having the words 'three dollars' and the figures '$3.00' written thereon, and being directed to and drawn on the county treasurer of said county for payment, and signed by J. E. Pound, chairman of the board of public instruction of said county, and R. L. Williams, superintendent of public instruction of said county, which said order is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"'$3.00. Office of Board of Public Instruction of Madison Co., Fla.

"'To the Treasurer of Madison Co.: Please pay to the order of R. L. Williams the sum of three dollars, and charge to account of board of public instruction of Madison Co., Fla.; account approved by board of public instruction, May 26, 1891. No. 388.

"'J. E. POUND,
"'Chmn. Bd. Publ. Inst.
"'R. L. WILLIAMS,
"'Supt. Publ. Inst.

"'Not intended as a circulating medium.' —Did then and there forge, by altering the words 'three dollars,' and the figures '$3.00,' and changing them from 'three dollars' into 'thirty dollars,' and from '$3.00,' into '$30.00,' and which said forged order is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"'$30.00. Office of Board of Public Instruction of Madison Co., Fla.

"'To the Treasurer of Madison Co.: Please pay to the order of R. L. Williams the sum of thirty dollars, and charge to account of board of public instruction of Madison Co., Fla.; account approved by board of public instruction, May 26, 1891. No. 388.

"'J. E. POUND,
"'Chrm. Bd. Publ. Inst.
"'R. L. WILLIAMS,
"'Supt. Publ. Inst.

"'Not intended as a circulating medium.' —Contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided."

At the same term the accused was arraigned upon this indictment, and, after plea of not guilty, was tried and convicted of the offense therein charged. Motions in arrest of judgment and for a new trial were made and overruled, and the case is before us by writ of error. The grounds of the motion in arrest of judgment are: (1) "Because there is no crime charged; the instrument alleged to be forged not being included in the statutes of this state, and as such could be forged." (2) "The indictment does not allege that J. E. Pound, as chairman, and R. L. Williams, as superintendent, had authority to sign, and did sign, said forged paper; it does not allege that they were such officers." (3) "The indictment does not charge that the offense was committed in two years before the finding of the indictment, and the evidence does not show the offense was committed on the day alleged." (4) "The evidence does not establish the guilt of the prisoner, and the forging and intent to defraud does not appear therefrom."

The grounds for new trial are: (1) "The prosecution failed to prove the venue." (2) "The verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence." (3) "The verdict of the jury is contrary to the charge of the court." (4) "The court erred in admitting in evidence school warrant No. 378." (5) "The court erred in defining to the jury what a reasonable doubt is." (6) "The indictment does not allege the offense was committed in two years before the filing of the indictment." (7) "The court erred in admitting school warrant No. 388, over the objection of defendant, because it was not the paper alleged to have been forged and set forth in the indictment."

We will dispose of the assignments of error in the order in which they are made here. The first and second are that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the first and third pleas in abatement, and in adjudging the second insufficient.

It appears from the record that before arraignment the accused filed a plea in abatement, alleging that the indictment was found by an illegal grand jury—First, because an act entitled "An act relating to jurors," approved June 8, 1891, under which said grand jury was summoned, impaneled, and organized, was and is in violation of article 3, § 16, of the constitution of the state, and is void; second, because, if said act should be held by the court to be constitutional, no member of said grand jury, at the time of the organization thereof, had paid the last capitation tax which had been assessed against him in said county of Madison for the year 1891, before the summoning, impaneling, and organization of said grand jury, and which said tax was assessed on the 1st day of October, A. D. 1891, and the same is still unpaid; third, because the act of June 8, 1891, does not go into effect until January 1, 1892. It appears that the state attorney joined issue on the first and third grounds of defendant's plea, and demurred to the second. The demurrer was sustained, and the record recites that the court adjudged the first and third insufficient. We assume from the recital in the record that a trial was had by the court on the issues tendered as to the first and third grounds of the plea. A demurrer to all the grounds of the plea would have presented a proper issue, because whatever questions they sought to present were of a legal nature, and to be settled by the court. It appears that the legal sufficiency of the entire plea was passed upon by the court, and we will examine it to see if there are any merits in it. The court during which the indictment was found was organized on the 13th day of October, A. D. 1891. Upon its appearing to the court that no grand jury had been drawn and summoned as provided by law, by special order of the court the jurors for the term were summoned from the body of the county at large.

The second ground of the plea, the one demurred to, attempts to set up the nonpayment of the capitation tax for the year 1891 as a disqualification of the jurors who found the indictment. The act of the legislature approved June 8, 1891, (chapter 4015, Laws Fla.,) in the first section provides that "grand and petit jurors shall be taken from the registered voters who have paid their last assessed capitation tax in their respective counties." Section 14, c. 4010, passed at the same session of the legislature, provides a "poll tax of one dollar shall be levied upon each male person over the age of twenty-one years, which tax shall be paid into the county school fund, and shall be collected when taxes on property are collected." Section 44 of this act provides that all taxes shall be due and payable after the first Monday in November of each and every year. It is evident that the capitation tax for the year 1891 was not due when the indictment was returned against the accused, as this was on the 15th day of October, A. D. 1891. It is true that the county assessor regularly, between the 1st day of January and the 1st day of July of each year, shall make out an assessment roll of all the taxable property in the county, including the names of all persons subject to pay the capitation tax, and return it to the board of county commissioners at their meeting in July. This roll, after being examined and equalized by the county commissioners under certain proceedings extending to the 1st of October, shall then be certified by them as having been examined and found correct. The assessor after this annexes, to one of the rolls required to be made, the warrant provided by the statute, and delivers it to the collector of revenue. Taxes then become due and collectible after the first Monday in November of each year. If for any cause a delay has occurred in preparing the assessment rolls, provision is made for an extension of time. The statute of 1891, in providing that jurors shall be taken from the registered voters who have paid their last assessed capitation tax in their respective counties, does not, in our opinion, contemplate the payment of this tax before it becomes due. Within the meaning of this statute, the terms "last assessed capitation tax" refers to a tax that is due and payable. The jurors in the present case were summoned and impaneled in October, before the tax became due, and the failure to pay the poll tax for that year did not disqualify them as jurors. Under the revenue act, taxes shall be due and payable after the first Monday in November of each year, and the collector is required to collect, by levy and sale of the goods and chattels assessed, all taxes that remain unpaid on the 1st day of March of each year. Whether or not a juror would be so in default in not paying his capitation tax as to disqualify him, before the expiration of the time allowed to pay without coercion, it is not necessary here to say. The facts of this case only make it necessary for us to decide that, within the meaning of the jury act, the last assessed capitation taxes do not include those not payable.

The first ground of the plea in abatement is that the act of 1891, c. 4015, under which the grand jury was organized, is in violation of article 3, § 16, Const. 1885. It is claimed, in the first place, that the title of the act is not broad enough to include the provisions of the act. The title of the act is "An act in relation to jurors." The constitution provides that each law shall embrace but one subject, and matter properly connected therewith. The subject of the act in question is "jurors," and it becomes apparent, from a reading of this statute, that all of its provisions are germane to the subject, and properly connected therewith. Gibson v. State, 16 Fla. 291. In the second place, it is contended that this act repeals or revises a law without setting forth the law repealed or revised. There is nothing in this contention. The constitution provides that "no law shall be amended or revised by reference to its title only; but, in such case, the act as revised or section as amended shall be reenacted and published at length." The statute before us does not undertake to revise or amend any former law. The effect of it may be to repeal portions of former laws, but this would not render it invalid because the portions repealed were not specially mentioned and set out. As to the other ground, that the act did not take effect until January, 1892, it is only necessary to say it was approved June 8, A. D. 1891, and no provision is therein made when it shall take effect. The constitution provides that "no law shall take effect until sixty days from the final adjournment of the session of the legislature at which it may have been enacted, unless otherwise specially provided in such law." Our conclusion is that the plea in abatement presented no valid objection to the indictment.

The third and fourth assignments of error are that the court erred in admitting in evidence the two school orders, one numbered 378, and the other numbered 388. The indictment shows that the accused was charged with forging order No. 388. The objection to the introduction of this order is that there is a variance between it and the paper set out in the indictment, and alleged to have been forged. The variance alleged consists in the omission from the top of the paper set out in the indictment the words, "Not intended as a circulating medium." It seems that the order in question had printed or written at the top, and also at the bottom, the words, "Not intended as a circulating medium," and in the copy set out in the indictment the words at the top were omitted. The indictment undertakes to set out the alleged forged order in words and figures. Great particularity is required of the pleader in such cases. Mr. Wharton says: "When an indictment undertakes to set forth, as in forgery or libel, a document 'according to its tenor,' or 'as follows,' then any variance as to the words of the document, unless such variance be mere fault of spelling, is fatal." Whart. Crim. Ev. § 114. The authorities cited by this author fully sustain the rule he announces. Ex parte Rogers, 10 Tex. App. 655; State v. Townsend, 86 N. C. 676. On the other hand, an indictment for forgery of a promissory note, or order for the payment of money, need not set out any matter written upon the same paper, constituting no part of the obligation, and not entering into an essential description of it. While a strict recital of the very words of the forged order is required, the numbers, vignettes, and devices, or the words and figures in the margin, which constitute no part of the contract of the instrument, need not necessarily be given. Of course, such marginal characters can be made descriptive of the instrument, and then the same strictness will be required of them as any part of the paper. The forgery alleged in the present indictment consists in raising the amount of a school order or warrant. We have not the original before us, but from the record it appears that the words omitted are written or printed in the margin above the date and body of the order. The same words appear in the margin at the bottom, and they are accurately set out in the indictment. It has been held that where the counterfeit bill offered in evidence contained the word "three" six times on the margin at the top of the bill, and also close upon the margin the words and figures, "Capital stock $100,000, secured by pledge of $100,000 Pennsylvania 6 per cent. bonds," and no mention was made of such words and figures in the copy set forth in the indictment, there was no variance, because what was omitted constituted no part of the bill. The same view was taken where the forged note offered in evidence had upon its face the words, "Countersigned and registered in the bank department," with the signature of the register. And so the words "School order" on the face of an instrument, constituting no part of the contract, but being the trade-mark of the printer of the order, may be omitted on the copy in the indictment. Our judgment is that the omitted words in the margin of the order in question constituted no part of the forged order, and there was no essential variance between the order recited in the indictment and the one introduced in evidence. The following authorities on this point are referred to: Langdale v. People, 100 Ill. 263; State v. Wheeler, 35 Vt. 261; Wilson v. People, 5 Parker, Crim. R. 178; Perkins v. Com., 7 Grat. 651; Com. v. Bailey, 1 Mass. 62; Com. v. Stevens, Id. 203; Com. v. Taylor, 5 Cush. 605; State v. Carr, 5 N. H. 367; Griffin v. State, 14 Ohio St. 55; People v. Franklin, 3 Johns. Cas. 299; Miller v. People, 52 N. Y. 304; Mee v. State, 23 Tex. App. 566, 5 S. W. Rep. 243; State v. Grant, 74 Mo. 33.

Objection was made to the introduction in evidence of school order No. 378. This order, as introduced in evidence, was for $30.80, payable to the order of H. C. Smith. The state proved by the superintendent and the chairman of the board of public instruction of Madison county that this school order was issued and delivered to the accused for $3.80, and that it had been altered to the larger sum. The ground of the objection to the introduction of this order in evidence is not stated, nor was any exception taken to the decision of the court in overruling the objection. The two forged school orders were issued at the same time, one to Williams, and indorsed to the accused, and the other directly to him. A fraudulent intent is a material and essential ingredient in the crime of forgery. If the accused fraudulently altered the school order No. 378, it would afford legitimate evidence tending to prove a fraudulent intent in altering, if he did, the order upon which the indictment was based. Whart. Crim. Ev. § 38 et seq.; Hennessy v. State, 23 Tex. App. 340, 5 S. W. Rep. 215. It is true that he could not be convicted on the indictment in question for forging school order No. 378, and the only legitimate purpose for which it could be admitted in evidence was to throw light upon his motives in altering the other order, if he did alter it. The state having shown that both orders went into the hands of the accused in their original state, and were subsequently changed, in the absence of rebutting testimony on his part, a presumption arises that he fraudulently altered the order upon which the indictment is based. It was the right of the accused, however, to have the evidence submitted to the jury in its legal bearing, and, if he had made the proper objections, he could have availed himself of this right. This he did not do, and no further discussion is necessary on this point.

The fifth error assigned is that the court erred in admitting in evidence what the accused said before the school board about school order No. 378. It seems that the accused appeared before a meeting of the school board in September, 1891, and asked permission to remain in the room during its session. While there the order No. 378, which had been returned by the treasurer to the board as paid, was examined and found to be changed. The accused stated to the board that he gave the order to Mrs. Morrison, and had no more to do with it, and that he was not guilty. Mrs. Morrison testified that the accused did not give her the order. We perceive no error in the ruling of the court admitting this statement of the accused in evidence. It was a voluntary statement, made at the time the forgery was detected, and it was competent for the state to put in evidence this statement, and then show that it was not true.

It is alleged that the court erred in overruling the motion in arrest of judgment. The first ground of the motion is that the indictment does not charge any crime, because the instrument alleged to have been forged is not one embraced within the forgery statutes of this state. Among other instruments of writing which are the subjects of forgery under our statute, it is provided that "whoever falsely makes, alters, forges, or counterfeits a * * * bill of exchange or promissory note, or an order, acquittance, or discharge for money or other property, or an acceptance of a bill of exchange, or indorsement or assignment of a bill of exchange or promissory note, for the payment of money, or an accountable receipt for money, goods, or other property, with intent to injure or defraud any person, shall be punished," etc. The position of counsel for plaintiff in error is that there is no law authorizing the issuance of the order alleged to have been forged, and the same is void, and not the subject of forgery. It is conceded that if the paper on its face does not appear to have any legal validity, and is in its essence void, and incapable of effecting a fraud, no forgery can be predicated upon its alteration. Mr. Bishop says: "Forgery, at the common law, is the false making, or materially altering, with intent to defraud, of any writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy, or the foundation of a legal liability." 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 523. Under our statutes, county treasurers are the custodians of the county school funds, and the county boards of public instruction, which are made bodies corporate, have control and management of county school interests. A chairman of the board is elected, and the county superintendent is made, by statute, secretary of the board. This board is authorized, among other things, to purchase school sites and premises, and to employ teachers for the education of the youth of the county, and also to audit and pay all accounts due by the board of public instruction. The order alleged to have been forged shows on its face to be an allowance for an account approved by the board of public instruction as a proper charge against said board. It is an order directed to the treasurer to pay the sum mentioned therein for an account approved as a valid demand against the county board of public instruction, and in our judgment is such an instrument, within the meaning of our statute, as can be the subject of forgery. It is a writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy or the foundation of a legal liability against the board of public instruction of Madison county, and, within the light of the authorities, is such an instrument as can be forged. Crain v. State, 45 Ark. 450; Ball v. State, 48 Ark. 94, 2 S. W. Rep. 462; State v. Fenly, 18 Mo. 445; Rembert v. State, 53 Ala. 467; Arnold v. Cost, 3 Gill & J. 219, 22 Amer. Dec. 302, note; Hendricks v. State, 26 Tex. App. 176, 9 S. W. Rep. 555, 557, 8 Amer. State Rep. 463, note; Langdale v. People, supra.

The second ground of the motion in arrest of judgment is that the indictment does not allege that J. E. Pound, as chairman, and R. L. Williams, as superintendent, had authority to sign, and did sign, said forged paper, and does not allege that they were such officers. The authorities hold that, where a party is charged with forging a check, promissory note, or order for the payment of money, it is sufficient to allege in the indictment that he falsely made, forged, and counterfeited the writing with intent to defraud some person, setting out the instrument in haec verba, with the names of the makers, indorsers, and payees on it. By pursuing this course, it is made to appear to the court that the forging was of an instrument in writing, being, or purporting to be, the act of another, by which rights or property are liable to be affected, and the court can see and judge for itself what is the nature and extent of the obligation contained in the paper. Cross v. People, 47 Ill. 152; State v. Fenly, supra; Rembert v. State, supra; State v. Johnson, 26 Iowa, 407. The order before us shows that it was signed by J. E. Pound, chairman board of public instruction, and R. L. Williams, superintendent of public instruction. The testimony showed that these parties were, respectively, the officers mentioned, and that they acted for the board in issuing the order in question. The indictment was sufficient in this respect.

The third ground of the motion in arrest of judgment, that the indictment does not charge that the offense was committed within two years before the finding of the indictment, has no foundation in the record. The indictment distinctly alleges that the offense was committed on the 1st day of June, A. D. 1891. The other grounds of this motion need not be noticed. Motions in arrest of judgment reach only such errors as are apparent upon the record, and we cannot consider, on such motion, the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury. Bacon v. State, 22 Fla. 51; Jordan v. State, Id. 528.

The overruling of the motion for a new trial is also assigned as error. The first ground of this motion is that the prosecution failed to prove the venue. It is essential that the state should prove the venue alleged, but this need not be done to the exclusion of every reasonable doubt. If the evidence raises a violent presumption that the offense was committed within the county named, or if this can be reasonably inferred from the evidence, it is sufficient. Andrews v. State, 21 Fla. 598; Warrace v. State, 27 Fla. 362, 8 South. Rep. 748. The evidence shows that the school order was issued in Madison county, Fla., in June, 1891, and was delivered to the accused, in said county, the day it was issued. He lived in Madison county, and was teaching school there. Within the liberal rule applicable in proving venue, we think enough is shown in the record from which the jury could reasonably have inferred that the offense was committed, if at all, in Madison county.

The fourth and seventh grounds of the motion for new trial, in reference to the admission in evidence of the school orders, have already been considered.

The fifth ground is that the court erred in defining a "reasonable doubt." The particular portion of the charge supposed by counsel to be erroneous is not pointed out. In one portion of the charge the judge instructed the jury that the evidence should satisfy them of the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt. This portion is certainly correct. There is more of the charge on the subject of a reasonable doubt. A general exception to an entire charge that contains a correct proposition of law is not good. The good and the bad, if any be bad, cannot, under such an exception, be separated. Under our practice, it devolves upon the party to properly except in the trial court to the portion of the charge supposed to be erroneous. Metzger v. State, 18 Fla. 481; Baker v. Chatfield, 23 Fla. 540, 2 South. Rep. 822; Pinson v. State, 28 Fla. —, 9 South. Rep. 706.

The following is substantially the testimony introduced on the trial of this cause:

R. L. Williams, a witness for the state, superintendent of public instruction and secretary of the board of public instruction of that county, testified that J. E. Pound is chairman of the board, and, on being handed the warrant or order in question, No. 388, stated, in substance: "It was issued by the board to the order of witness, and was given by him to the defendant, it being then an order for $3, but having since been altered to $30. The account was approved by the board, May 26, 1891, and issued June 6, 1891. The way in which I came to give this order to Smith was this: I owed Smith three dollars, and offered to pay him cash, but Smith said 'scrip would do him as well; he could use it dollar for dollar.' School scrip was then at a discount from ten to fifteen per cent. The county treasurer returns all the school scrip paid by him to the board of public instruction once a year, when the board meets to verify his accounts. Among the warrants returned by him was one No. 388. That the board met on the 22d of September last. The object of the meeting was to verify the orders returned by the county treasurer. Smith came in and presented to Mr. Pound his recommendation from the patrons of the school he had been teaching as principal thereof. Mr. Pound told him it was all right as far as it went, but was not indorsed by the supervisor of the school, and that, as the board required that, he could not consider it. Smith then asked permission to remain in the room during the meeting of the board. No other teachers were present. In verifying the orders we came to No. 378, payable to the order of H. C. Smith, and found it was raised from $3.80 to $30.80. As soon as we found it out, Smith got up and explained that he knew nothing about it, and that he gave the order as a $3.80 order to Mrs. Morrison. In about ten or twenty minutes we reached warrant No. 388, the one I gave Smith for what I owed him. Smith said I did not give it to him; that I paid him in cash; and that he knew nothing about the forgery of either of these warrants. Warrant No. 388, when returned to the board by the county treasurer, was changed from $3 to $30."

Cross-examination: "The change in warrant 388 is not in Smith's ordinary handwriting. I stated on the preliminary examination that I was not certain that I gave Smith this warrant, but since then I have had occasion to examine my stub books, and found that this is the only $3 warrant issued to my order during the whole year, and, as I am positive I gave Smith a $3 warrant payable to myself, therefore I am positive this is the warrant I gave Smith. He has taught school here ever since I have been superintendent of public instruction, about three years."

The warrant was put in evidence, as was the stub to the warrant, which was identified by the preceding witness. Warrant No. 378, payable to the order of defendant, was also put in evidence, it purporting at the time to be for $30.80.

J. E. Pound, a witness for the state, testified, in substance: "I was present on September 22d last, at the meeting of the board of public instruction." He makes about the same statement as that of Williams as to Smith's coming in and presenting his certificate of election as teacher, and the defect in the same, remarking, however, that Smith said the supervisor was away; and then says: "Smith asked permission to remain in the room during the sitting of the board. I told him there would be no objection, if he would not disturb us. We proceeded with the work, and, when the scrip which was issued to him was reached, he arose and stated that he gave that scrip to Mrs. Morrison, and had no more to do with it, and was not guilty. After talking about it a few minutes, we proceeded, and came to the scrip issued to R. L. Williams. Williams said to Smith, 'That is the scrip I let you have.' Smith said, 'You paid me the money for what you owed me. I did not get that scrip from you. You paid me the cash.'" William McDaniel, the county treasurer, testified that he paid warrants 378 and 388 as warrants for $30.80 and $30, but stated, on cross-examination, that he never paid either of them to H. C. Smith, defendant, and never paid him any money on any warrants during the year 1891.

Mary M. Morrison, a witness for the state, testified that Smith never gave her either of these two warrants; and that she had been convicted of forgery at this term of the court, but had not been sentenced.

A. M. Michelson, a state witness, testified that defendant told witness that warrants 388 and 378 were delivered to defendant by R. L. Williams, and given by defendant to Mary M. Morrison, and that he had nothing to do with the forgery of them.

Lula Carter, a witness for defendant, testified that she saw defendant deliver warrant payable to R. L. Williams for $3 to Mary M. Morrison; that she remembered it because they were in Mr. Parramore's store in Madison; that Smith first handed it to witness, when she noticed it was for $3, and payable to R. L. Williams; that witness saw his name on it, and handed it back to Smith, and told him it was not hers, (witness.') He then handed it to Mrs. Morrison, and gave witness hers, which was for $22. This happened at Mr. Parramore's store about the 1st of June, in this town, at the corner at Parramore's store. On cross-examination she stated that she was assistant teacher in Academy No. 2; that her feeling towards Smith is that of any other common friend; was not engaged to be married to him; that the ring on her finger was not given to her by Smith, and is not an engagement ring; that she taught with him for three terms, and they are both single.

Chandler H Smith testified he had known Smith for four years, and knew his reputation for honesty and truthfulness. Never heard any one say anything against him; that his character is good, so far as witness knows. Cabel Carter, a witness for defendant, and father of Lula Carter, also testified that he had known defendant for two or three years, and that he had borne a good character all that time, and witness had never heard anybody say anything against him; and stating, upon cross-examination, that he had no special good feeling for him; that he had a good feeling for all good preachers and teachers; that witness asked Tom McLeary if he would go on Smith's bond, who said he would go on it for $50; witness was willing to go on it for $250; the bond was for $500; that H. J. McCall, attorney for Smith, asked witness to go on the bond, and aid him in getting it up for Smith.

The statement made by Smith on the trial is as follows: "I gave warrant No. 388 to Mrs. Morrison. When I gave it, it was then a $3 warrant. It was at Mr. Parramore's store, on the 6th day of June, 1891. I had nothing to do with the forgery. I got nothing out of it. I asked the board permission to stay while it was in session, because I did not want to be where I was not wanted. I wanted to see how the board conducted its business."

R. L. Williams, recalled, testified that the school commenced October 1st, and lasted eight school months. A school month is 20 days. The school was out some time in May, 1891. "The last scrip I issued to Lula Carter was issued May 16, 1891. The account was approved April 28, 1891. The scrip was issued in Madison county, Fla. There was no school taught in June last. I delivered the scrip to Smith the day it was issued."

As will appear in what is stated by the majority of the court in the sequel of this opinion, the conclusion reached is that the testimony fails to sustain the verdict. In this conclusion I have not been able to concur. The forgery of the paper is clearly shown. That it went into the hands of the accused in an unaltered condition is also established. The conclusion of the majority of the court is that the testimony fails to connect the accused with the forgery of the instrument, or with the instrument in a forged condition. I concede that it is necessary for the testimony to connect the defendant with the forgery, and, if there is no testimony to establish this fact, the verdict should be set aside. I concede, further, that the testimony connecting the accused with the forgery must be sufficient to satisfy the minds of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt; but, where there is pertinent testimony bearing upon the guilt of the accused, its sufficiency for this purpose is a question for the jury. It is not controverted that the criminal connection of the accused with the forgery can be shown by circumstantial evidence, and that this character of evidence, if enough, can establish guilt. Let us see what are the facts and circumstances bearing upon the guilt of the accused in the case before us. First, he had an opportunity to commit the forgery, as the instrument, in its unforged condition, went into his hands. The indictment is based upon the paper issued to R. L. Williams, and delivered by him to the defendant. Williams owed Smith three dollars, and offered to pay him cash, but Smith said scrip would do as well, as he could use it dollar for dollar. Scrip at that time was at a discount of from 10 to 15 per cent. He elects to take scrip instead of cash, when he could only use the scrip at par. These are the circumstances under which he received the order. We next find Smith before the school board, at a meeting held to verify the orders of the county treasurer. It is true that he presented at this time to the chairman of the school board a recommendation from the patrons of a school as a teacher, but, after doing this, he asks permission to remain in the room during the meeting of the board. The scrip issued to Smith was reached by the board, and found to be forged, and he stated that he knew nothing about it, but gave it to Mrs. Morrison as a $3.80 order. When the order issued to Williams, and which he testifies that he delivered to Smith, was reached, and found to be also forged, he denied receiving it, and said Williams paid him cash. This denial was made at the time the forgery was detected. There is no contradiction or explanation of this fact by Smith. As appears from the testimony of A. M. Michelson, Smith admitted receiving both of the orders in question from Williams, and delivered them to Mary Morrison, but stated that he had nothing to do with the forgery. Mary Morrison testified that Smith never gave her either of the two orders. The county treasurer testified that he paid the two orders in their forged condition, but not to Smith. Williams says that the changed portion of the order upon which the indictment is based is not in Smith's ordinary handwriting. Before the school board Smith stated that he delivered order No. 378, the one issued to him, to Mary Morrison, and denied having the one issued to Williams. He admitted to Michelson the possession of this order, and on the trial undertakes to show that he parted with it in an unforged condition to Mary Morrison. In this he is contradicted by her. Lula Carter says that she saw Smith deliver order No. 388 to Mary Morrison about the 1st of June, and at the same time received her order from Smith for $22. She was teaching in the same school with Smith. In Smith's statement he says he delivered the order No. 388 to Mary Morrison on the 6th day of June, 1891. Williams testifies that the last order he issued to Lula Carter was on the 16th day of May, 1891. In considering the effect of the testimony to sustain the verdict, however, we must proceed upon the theory that the jury has the right to disbelieve that offered by the accused, and to base their verdict upon the state's evidence, if that be sufficient to justify the verdict. This is the exclusive province of the jury in weighing testimony. Are the facts and circumstances offered by the state sufficient to connect Smith with the forgery? To my mind they are strong, and amount to more than suspicion. Smith's election to take the order, then at a discount, in lieu of the money; his expressed desire to remain in the room when he knew that the board was checking up warrants; his denial that he ever had the order when its forgery was detected; then his admission of this fact, and his position that he parted with it to a party who denies that he ever did so,—are facts and circumstances showing a guilty connection with this paper, and, if they satisfied the minds of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, (which, from the verdict, we must conclude was the case,) I do not believe the appellate court should disturb their finding. To do so, it seems to me, would be to determine the sufficiency of evidence to produce on the minds of jurors a reasonable doubt, and this, I believe, is a question for the jury. They had before them the living witnesses, and an opportunity to observe their conduct and manner of testifying, all of which we do not have. In the case at bar I think the facts and circumstances tending to connect the accused with the forgery are strong enough to render it improper for the appellate court to disturb the deliberate finding of a jury, and its sanction, on a motion for a new trial, by the presiding judge.

RANEY, C. J., (TAYLOR, J., concurring.) The testimony not only fails to prove that the alteration of the school order No. 388, described in the indictment, is in the handwriting of the prisoner, or to otherwise show directly that he altered it, or procured or assisted in or was present at the alteration thereof, but it does not in any way connect the prisoner with the order after it had been altered. The order is not shown to have been passed or uttered by him in a forged condition, or to have ever been in his possession in that condition. The above observations, we may remark, are also equally true of the testimony as to the order No. 378. Treating as true the testimony of Mrs. Morrison that the prisoner did not deliver the order No. 388 to her, and as false the contrary statement of Lula Carter and of the prisoner, all of which it must be assumed the jury concluded, we still fail to find evidence to sustain the verdict. Not only is it not shown that the order was never in his possession in its altered condition, and that he never had any connection with it in that condition, but it is affirmatively shown, by the uncontradicted testimony of a state witness, that the order was paid, in its forged condition, to some one else than the prisoner. It cannot be inferred, from the mere fact that the prisoner had the order in its honest condition, either that it was changed before it went into the hands of the party to whom it was paid, or that the prisoner was a party to such an alteration; nor is the possession of a forged order by one person, and the payment thereof to that person, evidence that a person in whose possession the order in its legal condition is shown to have previously been, altered such order, or was a party to such alteration; nor is the fact that Smith was willing to take the warrant instead of money, when such warrant was at a discount, or it and the above facts, evidence sufficient to establish his connection with the alteration of the order. The same insufficiency attaches to the fact that the prisoner stated at the meeting of the school board that Williams had not given him the warrant numbered 388, (a fact of which Williams' memory also seems to have been doubtful at one time subsequently.) Here there is nothing to show at what exact time before the presentation of the warrant for payment it was altered, nor anything that connects the defendant with that alteration. This connection cannot be assumed, nor can a time of alteration sufficiently prior to such presentation to connect Smith with the alteration. They must be proved, and proved beyond a reasonable doubt, either directly, or by circumstances inconsistent with any other reasonable hypothesis shown by the testimony. Whart. Crim. Ev. §§ 1, 2; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 13, 13*a*; Costley v. Com., 118 Mass. 1; State v. Porter, 34 Iowa, 131.

Circumstances may often be sufficient to excite suspicion without establishing guilt, (8 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 540;) and we do not say that there are not circumstances of such suspicion shown by this record; but when the state shows, as it does here, that the forged instrument was in the hands of, and was paid to, some other person than the accused, but fails to connect the accused with the act of forgery, or with the instrument in its altered condition, or with the proceeds thereof, or even with the person to whom it was paid, we do not think that the circumstances of suspicion shown by this record are sufficient to establish guilt, within the rule of law as it is laid down by us in this opinion, and where the testimony connects the defendant with the paper only in its honest condition.

The testimony, in our judgment, entirely fails to prove the guilt of the prisoner beyond a reasonable doubt, and cannot be said to establish his guilt to the exclusion of any other reasonable hypothesis shown by the proofs. State v. Morgan, 2 Dev. & B. 348, and Perkins v. Com., 7 Grat. 651, are not inconsistent with this conclusion.

For these reasons we think the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted. It is ordered accordingly.

REEVES v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Florida. April 23, 1892.)

LARCENY—INDICTMENT—PLEA IN ABATEMENT—DEMURRER—SELECTION OF JURY—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A demurrer to a replication to a plea in abatement will reach the plea if defective.

2. The greatest accuracy and precision are required in pleas in abatement merely setting up irregularities in the selection or drawing of jurors, and such pleas must be free from uncertainty or ambiguity.

3. The statute (section 1, c. 3125, Laws 1879) providing a time for the boards of county commissioners to select from the list of registered voters in their respective counties a jury list of persons properly qualified to serve as jurors is directory; and, should said commissioners fail to make the selection at the January meeting mentioned in the statute, it would be competent for them to do so at a subsequent meeting.

4. The provision of the statute, supra, that the boards of county commissioners shall select from the registered voters of their respective counties a list of 300 persons properly qualified to serve as jurors, who shall be such persons only as said commissioners know, or have good reason to believe, are of approved integrity, fair character, sound judgment, and intelligence, provided that if in any counties of this state said commissioners shall not be able to select the number required, they shall be authorized to select a less number, but said number to be the highest possible, invests such boards with authority to pass upon the integrity, character, judgment, and intelligence of the persons to be selected as jurors; and, in the absence of an illegal purpose, fraud, or corruption in the selection of a less number than 300, the discretionary power of the commissioners in such matters will not be disturbed.

5. An objection that the offense charged in the indictment is vague, indefinite, and insufficient to protect the accused against a subsequent prosecution, shall be made in the shape of an attack on the indictment, and not by a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is contrary to law.

6. An accused is entitled to the presumption of innocence until this presumption is overcome by testimony beyond a reasonable doubt, and also to the benefit of a reasonable doubt in his favor arising from the evidence, and to have the court to so charge the jury. It is error to refuse a request in behalf of an accused to so charge when the court has not already fully covered in its charge what is requested.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Wakulla county; JOHN W. MALONE, Judge.

Indictment against Frank Reeves for larceny. Verdict of guilty, and judgment thereon. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Nat. R. Walker and S. C. Miller, for plaintiff in error. W. B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for the State.

MABRY, J. The plaintiff in error was indicted at the November term, A. D. 1891, of the Wakulla circuit court for the larceny of a domestic animal. The averment as to the offense is that said "Frank Reeves, late of the county of Wakulla, aforesaid, in the circuit and state aforesaid, laborer, on the 19th day of June in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, with force and arms, at and in the county of Wakulla, aforesaid, a certain domestic animal, to wit, a hog, of the value of two dollars and fifty cents, of the goods and chattels of Ellen Epps, then and there being found, feloniously did steal, take, and carry away, against the form of the statute," etc. The plaintiff in error, as defendant in the trial court, filed a plea in abatement. It is necessary to set out this plea, and the proceedings on it, in order that the objection sought to be raised by it may be presented.

In this plea it is alleged that said defendant should not be required to plead to the indictment because "the board of county commissioners of said county did not meet on the first week in January, 1891, for the purpose of selecting from the list of registered voters and make out a list of persons qualified to serve as jurors for this term of the circuit court, but did meet thereafter as soon as practicable, to wit, February 22, 1891, and selected the names of two hundred and eighty-five, said list being improperly certified to and signed by the chairman of the board."

(2) "The defendant further asks the court that he should not be required to plead to the indictment, because that there are over six hundred registered voters, as is shown by the records of said county, in said county, and that the said county commissioners, as aforesaid, were able to select more than the number so selected to serve as jurors."

(3) "And defendant further asks not to be required to plead, because that the officers of this court, after the drawing of the grand and petit jurors from said list as aforesaid, which were placed in a box, the names of the registered voters, did draw therefrom the grand and petit jurors who served as such jurors at the last spring term of said court."

(4) "The defendant further says that by instructions of said board of county commissioners, the officers, after drawing from said box the grand and petit jurors for the last spring term of this court, that said commissioners did instruct said officers to throw the names of said persons so selected to serve as grand and petit jurors, as aforesaid, out of said box, and the said officers did obey said instructions; further, that said board of county commissioners did meet on the 6th day of July, 1891, in the clerk's office in said county, without any judicial instructions from said circuit court, and proceeded again to select from the list of registered voters qualified to serve as grand jurors, and did select, the names of two hundred and eighteen out of the number of six hundred and more registered voters of said county, and from said list, which was improperly certified to by the chairman of said board to the clerk of this court, the officers of this court did draw the grand and petit jurors now serving as such jurors for this court, who are serving as such jurors without authority of law; and that at said meeting in July, 1891, the board of commissioners were able to select more than the number of two hundred and eighteen from the registered voters of said county, who are persons of approved integrity, fair character, sound judgment, and intelligence, as is shown by the annexed affidavit from the officers of this court and citizens of this county, and filed as 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this plea."

The affidavit referred to in the plea is signed by the county judge, sheriff, collector of revenue, and two others. It is stated in this affidavit that the affiants had "examined the list of names recorded by the clerk, furnished to him by the board of county commissioners at their July meeting of the year 1891, and recorded on their minutes, and from said list the names of persons who were selected to be placed in a box to be drawn as grand and petit jurors for the fall term of the circuit court," and that said list does not, in their judgment, contain all the qualified registered voters in said county who are qualified to sit as grand and petit jurors; that the names of many persons are omitted who would be qualified jurors; and the names of 10 persons are mentioned.

The state attorney filed the following replication (omitting formal parts) to the plea: "That, notwithstanding anything by the said Frank Reeves above in pleading alleged, this court ought not to be precluded from taking cognisance of the indictment aforesaid, because he says that the court having discharged the jurors at the spring term of said court, for the reason as is made to appear to said court, as set out in said plea of said defendant, the county commissioners had not up to the holding of said spring term caused a proper list of names to be given to the clerk, as required by law, to be placed in the jury box to be drawn from; and therefore, there being no proper jury box for said county at said spring term, the said county commissioners proceeded, as early after the first week in January as practicable, to select names to be placed in the jury box for the county of Wakulla, to wit, on the 6th day of July, 1891, the list of which said names, properly certified to and signed as required by law, was duly recorded, from which said list the clerk put names in said box, on pieces of paper, as required by law, and from which said box the names of the grand jurors and petit jurors for the present term were duly drawn, after due notice as required by law. To all of which said matters and things reference is prayed to the records of this honorable court," etc.

There was a demurrer filed by said accused to this replication. The grounds of the demurrer are that the replication is bad, because "the defendant's pleas do not allege that it was made to appear, as mentioned in the state attorney's replication, that the court discharged the jurors at the spring term of said court for the reason therein set forth, or for other reasons as made to appear by order of the circuit court as alleged; and, further, that the legality of the drawing of the grand and petit jurors by the county commissioners was not determined or considered by said court, as was alleged in defendant's plea."

There was a joinder on the part of the state attorney in the demurrer to the replication, and the record shows that the court overruled the demurrer and overruled the plea, and required the accused to plead to the indictment.

There is copied into the record what purports to be copies of the minutes of the board of county commissioners in reference to the selection of jury lists in February and July, A. D. 1891, but they are not embodied in the bill of exceptions, and there is nothing to show that they or the originals were introduced in evidence before the court, or were in any way used by the court in the disposition of the plea in abatement. Not being incorporated properly into the bill of exceptions, we are unable to refer to them, and hence no further notice will be taken of them.

After the demurrer to the replication was overruled, the accused was, upon arraignment and plea of "not guilty," convicted by the jury, and sentenced by the judgment of the court to four months' imprisonment in the state penitentiary, from which judgment he brings a writ of error to this court.

The action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the replication and setting aside the plea in abatement of the accused is assigned here as error. If either the plea in abatement be bad, or if the replication present a sufficient answer thereto, there is no error in the disposition made of the plea by the court. The demurrer to the replication will reach back to a defective plea, if such be the case, and, should the plea be found good, and the replication to contain a good answer to it, the issue has been properly determined against the sufficiency of the plea. It is true that, where a replication sets up issuable matter in avoidance, issue may be taken on it, and a trial had on this issue. But, in the absence of any such issue tendered on the part of the accused, after demurrer to the replication overruled, and a trial on the plea of "not guilty," it will be taken in the appellate court as a concession on his part that the facts of the replication are true. In construing pleas in abatement setting up simply irregularities in the drawing of jurors great strictness is required. Such pleas, which come under the class of what are known as "dilatory pleas," are not looked upon with favor by the court. In framing such pleas, the authorities hold that no uncertainty or ambiguity should exist, and in fact the greatest accuracy and precision are required, and they must be certain to every intent. Dolan v. People, 64 N. Y. 485; State v. Bryant, 10 Yerg. 527; State v. Brooks, 9 Ala. 9; Hardin v. State, 22 Ind. 347; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 324. The pleas before us do not attempt to question the qualifications of any of the grand jurors who found the indictment. The sole objection is to the manner of selecting them. The rule of strict construction should be applied to such pleas, and, unless they fully comply with the rule, they should not be sustained. The statute provides "that the board of county commissioners, at a meeting to be held the first week in January of each year, or as soon thereafter as practicable, shall select from the list of registered voters in their respective counties and make out a list of three hundred persons properly qualified to serve as jurors, who shall be such persons only as they know or have good reason to believe are of approved integrity, fair character, sound judgment, and intelligence, which list, certified and signed by the chairman of the board, shall be forthwith delivered to the clerk, and by him recorded in the minutes: provided, that if in any counties of the state the county commissioners shall not be able to select the number required by this section, they shall be authorized to select a less number, such number to be the highest possible." Section 1, c. 3125, Laws 1879. As to the time when the board of county commissioners shall meet and select the jury list, the statute must be held to be directory. This is evident from the terms of the act itself, as it provides the list shall be made at the meeting in January, or as soon thereafter as practicable. It is the duty of the county commissioners to act in such matters at the January meeting, and they should perform this duty, in order to provide jurors for any term of court that may be held in the county during the year; but, should they fail to make the selection at the January meeting, it would be competent for them to do so at a subsequent meeting. Burlingame v. Burlingame, 18 Wis. 299; Thomas v. People, 39 Mich. 309; Colt v. Eves, 12 Conn. 248.

The first and fourth pleas allege a selection of a less number than 300 names to serve as jurors. The second plea avers that there were over 600 registered voters in Wakulla county, as shown by the public records, and that the county commissioners were able to select more than the number selected at the first meeting, which was 285. Under the act of 1868 the county commissioners were required to select the names of 300 persons to serve as jurors. In Gladden v. State, 13 Fla. 623, where the commissioners, under this act, furnished to the clerk a list of 302 names, from which the grand and petit jurors were drawn, it was held to be a proper ground of challenge to the array of the petit jury. A plea in abatement will reach the organization of a grand jury from such a list. Id. The act of 1879, supra, contains a proviso that, if the county commissioners shall not be able to select the number of 300, they are authorized to select a less number, such number to be the highest possible. The selection is to be made from the registered voters of the county, and they shall be such persons only as the commissioners know, or have good reason to believe, are of approved integrity, fair character, sound judgment, and intelligence. The commissioners are the judges as to the integrity, character, judgment, and intelligence of the persons to be selected as jurors. The statute has delegated to this board the authority to pass upon such qualifications of persons to be selected as jurors, and, in the absence of an illegal purpose, fraud, or corruption in the selection of the jury list, we think the discretionary power of the commissioners in such matters cannot be set aside. Hardin v. State, supra. Conceding that the affidavit attached as an exhibit to the fourth plea is a part of it, and giving due consideration to its statements, it extends no further than to allege that the list selected by the county commissioners does not, in the judgment of the affiants, contain all the registered voters in said county who are qualified to serve as grand and petit jurors. It is the judgment of the county commissioners, in the absence of fraud or corruption, that controls in such matters; and their determination will not be set aside by the opinion of others that a large number of persons could have been selected who are possessed of the requisite qualifications. We fail to find in the first two pleas any sufficient allegations to constitute any valid objection to the indictment. If the commissioners made the selection at the February meeting instead of the January meeting, there is nothing alleged to show that it was not competent for them to do so, nor is there any sufficient allegation to show that the selection of a less number than 300 was in violation of the statute conferring authority upon the board to do so. But, independent of the question of the sufficiency of the allegations of the pleas, there is no connection between what is therein alleged and the indictment upon which the accused was tried. It is not therein alleged that the indictment was found by a grand jury drawn from the list selected in February, A. D. 1891; and, this being so, there is nothing in said pleas standing alone or in connection with each other which presents any objection to said indictment. It is difficult to ascertain what defense is designed to be set up by the third plea. It may be that something has been omitted which would make its meaning more definite, but, aside from its uncertainty and ambiguity, its failure to allege anything in connection with the indictment in question renders it defective.

In the fourth plea there is an allegation in effect that the officers, after drawing from said box the grand and petit jurors for the last spring term of the court, by instructions of the county commissioners threw the names of said persons so selected to serve as grand and petit jurors aforesaid out of said box, and said officers obeyed said instructions. According to this allegation, the names thrown out of the box were those drawn for the spring term of the court. The pleader's purpose doubtless was to allege that after the spring drawing by instructions from the county commissioners, all the names remaining in the box were thrown out, but this is not stated. The most that can be made of the allegation is that the officers threw out of the box the names of persons drawn to serve as grand and petit jurors for the spring term of the court. The further allegation of this plea, in effect, is that the county commissioners met in July, 1891, and again selected the names of 218 out of the number of 600 and more on the list of registered voters of said county qualified to serve as grand jurors, and from the list of names selected, which was improperly certified to by the chairman of said board to the clerk of the court, the officers of the court did draw the grand and petit jurors serving as such for the court, but without authority of law; and, further, at said July meeting the said county commissioners were able to select more than the number of 218 from the registered voters of said county possessed of the requisite qualifications. If the commissioners had the right to make a selection at all in July, the selection of a less number than 300, as we have already seen, was a matter of discretion with them; and it follows from what we have already said that, if the board of county commissioners had not, prior to the July meeting, 1891, performed the duty of selecting a jury list for that year, they could do so at that meeting. If the fourth plea alleged that the board met in February, A. D. 1891, and selected 285 names, which were properly placed in the jury box, and then caused these names to be thrown out of said box after the spring term of the court, and again, at a meeting in July of the same year, selected 218 names to serve as jurors, and that the grand jury in question was drawn from the last selection, a serious question as to the validity of such a selection and drawing would be presented. But this plea does not allege these facts. The first plea alleges a drawing in February, but there is no reference to this plea in the fourth, nor any such connection between them as to aid one by a reference to the allegations of the other. The fourth plea, depending upon its own allegations, does not show that what the board did at the July meeting was not in compliance with the statute. The mere fact of meeting in July and selecting a jury list does not render that action void, nor does the selection then of only 218 names of qualified persons to serve as jurors accomplish the same thing. The allegation that they met in July, 1891, and proceeded again to select a jury list, does not show that the board had at any previous meeting in that year so acted in the matter of selecting juries as to have exhausted their power in this respect. In fact, to allege that the board met in July, 1891, and proceeded again to select a jury list, does not definitely state that the board had prior to that time, in the same year, made any selection at all. This plea does not negative the conditions necessary to make the alleged July selection illegal.

As stated in the beginning of the discussion of these pleas, the greatest accuracy and precision are required in them, and, in order to be good, they must exclude the idea of a legal selection in July. State v. Brooks, supra. In this respect this plea is defective. The other allegation, that the list was improperly certified by the chairman of the board, is simply a legal conclusion, and does not state any facts upon which the court can determine the sufficiency of the certificate. Tested by the rules applicable to such pleas, we think those before us are defective, and the court did not err in overruling them.

The action of the court in overruling the motion for a new trial is also assigned as error. The grounds of this motion are that the verdict is contrary to law, contrary to the evidence, and contrary to the charge of the court. It is alleged to be contrary to law in this: that the material allegation in the indictment as to the animal alleged to have been stolen is "vague and indefinite, and insufficient to describe its identity, as required by law for the protection of the defendant against a subsequent prosecution for the same offense." No objection was made to the indictment, either by motion to quash or in arrest of judgment. The objection sought to be raised by the ground of the motion for new trial, that the verdict is contrary to law, because the indictment is vague and indefinite, came after trial and conviction. The verdict of the jury is based upon the testimony as applied to the law given by the court, and in the case before us is sufficient, in our judgment, to sustain the finding of the jury. The objection sought to be raised by this ground of the motion should have been presented in the shape of an attack on the indictment. The verdict, it is claimed, is contrary to the evidence, because the ownership of the hog was not sufficiently shown. We think the testimony was sufficient in this respect. The state witness, Johnson, first testified that the hog which he saw the defendant cleaning belonged to witness, but in the same connection he further testified: "I say it is my hog. It is not mine, either; it belongs to Ellen Epps, my wife's mother. I gave it to Ellen Epps when it was a little pig; and it was sure Ellen Epps' hog!" The testimony introduced by the state, if true, is sufficient to sustain the allegation of ownership, and its credibility is exclusively a question for the jury.

It is also contended that the court erred in refusing the first charge asked by the defendant. The instruction refused is as follows: "That the innocence of the defendant must be presumed until the case proved against him is in all its material circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt; that to find him guilty as charged the evidence must be strong and cogent; and, unless it is so strong and cogent as to show defendant's guilt to moral certainty, the jury must acquit." Before this charge was asked the court charged the jury: "If you have any doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, you should give him the benefit of that doubt, and acquit him." It will be seen that the judge did not define in his charge what was a reasonable doubt, or instruct the jury that they should act upon such a doubt. The accused is entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt arising from the evidence in his favor, and to have the court instruct the jury that he is so entitled. He is also entitled to the presumption of innocence until this is overcome by testimony beyond a reasonable doubt. The charge asked contains correct propositions as to the presumption of innocence, and what is a reasonable doubt, and should have been given. The charge given cannot be said to cover fully what was asked and refused. In this respect the court was in error. If an exception had been taken to the charge of the court on the subject of larceny, we would express our views on its accuracy. We doubt its correctness, because of its failure to state that there must be a felonious taking.

MOODY v. ALABAMA G. S. R. CO.†

NEGLIGENCE OF RAILROAD COMPANY—KILLING STOCK—INSTRUCTIONS—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL—DEPOSITIONS.

1. Code, § 2810, which provides that all objections to the admissibility of the entire deposition must be made before entering on the trial, applies not only to depositions taken pursuant to section 2802, but also to depositions irregularly taken, and lacking the preliminary affidavit required by section 2802.

2. In an action against a railroad company for the negligent killing of a cow, an argument of counsel that, if the employes of defendant testified otherwise than they did, they would be discharged, will be excluded, where unsupported by evidence.

3. Where the supreme court held that the jury should have been instructed to find for defendant if they believed the evidence, an instruction by the lower court, on a retrial, that, "in his opinion, the supreme court, by its decision, had settled the case," will not be considered as the expression of an opinion on the credibility of the evidence, where, immediately before and afterwards, he charged that the determination of the case depended on whether the jury believed the evidence.

Appeal from circuit court, Tuscaloosa county; S. H. SPROTT, Judge.

Action by F. S. Moody against the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company for negligently killing a cow. Verdict and judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank S. Moody and J. M. Foster, for appellant. A. G. Smith, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. The statute provides that "all objections to the admissibility of the entire deposition in evidence must be made before entering on the trial, and not afterwards, unless the matter is not disclosed in the deposition, and appears after the commencement of the trial." Code, § 2810. It is insisted for appellant that this statute "means a deposition taken pursuant to section 2802 of the Code," and has no application to or bearing upon a paper filed in the cause as a deposition, and offered on the trial as such, and which is in the form of a deposition, but which appears on its face not to have been regularly taken, in that, for instance, —the present case,—the preliminary affidavit has not been made as required by the section last referred to. This construction, we think, is entirely too narrow. Its adoption would lead to the practical emasculation of the statute quoted first above, since objections to entire depositions are in many, if not most, instances, based upon some infirmity of the deposition resulting from nonconformity to section 2802. We apprehend the true interpretation of the act to be such as to make it applicable to every paper filed in a cause which is in the form of a deposition taken therein, wholly irrespective of the defects it discloses in the manner of taking it. In one sense, no paper in this form, which the court adjudges to be inadmissible, is "a deposition," and the judgment of exclusion is essentially a judgment that it is not a "deposition." But manifestly this is not the sense of the word, as used in section 2810, else the operation of that section would be confined to depositions regularly taken in all respects, but containing no evidence relevant to the issue,—a case which could rarely occur, and in which, when it does occur, the statute, if it applies at all, might be easily avoided by making separate motions to exclude different parts of the deponent's testimony. We are clear that a deposition, the infirmity of which lies in the absence of the affidavit required by section 2802, should not be excluded on a motion made after the commencement of the trial, and hence that the court's action on the objection made by plaintiff, after the trial, had been entered to the deposition of the witness Ham as an entirety, was free from error.

This cause has been twice tried. The evidence on the first trial was substantially that adduced on the last, and which we find in the present record On the first trial the court refused to give the general affirmative charge requested by the defendant, and there was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff. On appeal to this court, it was held that the circuit court erred in its refusal to charge the jury to find in favor of the defendant, if they believed the evidence. Railroad Co. v. Moody, 90 Ala. 46, 8 South. Rep. 57. We see no reason now to depart from the ruling then announced, and we therefore adhere to it, and, of consequence, hold that the court on the last trial properly instructed the jury affirmatively to find for the defendant, if they believed the evidence.

It does not appear of this record that the court prevented any line of argument on the part of plaintiff's counsel, as is here insisted. What was done is thus stated in the bill of exceptions: "Plaintiff's counsel, in addressing the jury in his argument, stated: 'The witnesses whose depositions had been read, and who were employes of the defendant, were bound to testify as they did; that, if they had testified differently, they would have been promptly discharged.' Counsel for defendant objected to this argument, and asked the court to rule it out, which motion the court granted." This action of the court was not with reference to counsel's further argument, but solely upon and with reference to a statement, wholly unsupported by evidence, which had already been made in argument. That this statement was improper, and properly ruled out by the court, we do not doubt. Railroad Co. v. Bayliss, 75 Ala. 471; Railroad Co. v. Orr, 91 Ala. 548, 8 South. Rep. 360. It is not conceivable that this action of the court could have denied to plaintiff the benefit of any legitimate argument his counsel might thereafter have seen proper to advance.

Nor do we discover any ground for a reversal in the remarks of the presiding judge to which an exception was reserved. It is not questioned but that his statements were, in point of fact, entirely in harmony with the history of the case. They involved no tendency to mislead the jury, and they are such statements as trial judges would naturally make, and often do make, under the circumstances. What the presiding judge said to the effect that, "in his opinion, the supreme court, by its decision, had settled the case," obviously had reference, even to the mind of a layman, to the law of the case, as, immediately both before and after this expression, he gave the jury to understand that a settlement of the case as to the facts depended upon whether they should or should not believe the evidence; thus excluding the idea that the court had any purpose to or did in fact express any opinion as to the credibility of the evidence, which was the sole question before the jury. We find no error in the record, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

GOREE v. CLEMENTS.

(Supreme Court of Alabama. Dec. 2, 1891.)[1]

CANCELLATION OF DEED—LACHES.

1. In a suit by a mortgagor to set aside a conveyance of his equity of redemption to the mortgagee on the ground of fraud, complainant testified that when the mortgage became due defendant promised that if he would make a deed to the property he would allow him a reasonable time to repay the debt, and would permit him to collect and hold the rents for the current year. The mortgage debt was $560, and complainant testified that the property was worth $1,200. The bill alleged a long friendship between the parties, and an agreement on the part of defendant to extend the mortgage debt when due, which agreement was denied by defendant. It was not alleged that defendant made any false representations as to the legal effect of the deed. Held, that the evidence failed to show fraud or undue advantage.

2. Conceding that there was fraud, complainant was barred by laches where he failed to file his bill for more than seven years after the execution of the conveyance, and more than six years after he was informed that defendant repudiated the agreement, and refused to permit him to redeem.

3. Where a conveyance of an equity of redemption by a mortgagor to the mortgagee is intended as a conditional sale, the agreement to reconvey must be in writing.

4. In a suit to set aside an absolute conveyance of an equity of redemption by a mortgagor to the mortgagee, which is intended as a mortgage, there is a fatal variance where the bill alleges that defendant promised a "reasonable and convenient time in which to pay the debt," and complainant testifies that he was to pay it when able.

Appeal from chancery court, Tuscaloosa county; THOMAS COBBS, Judge.

Bill by Napoleon D. Goree against N. N. Clements to set aside a conveyance of an equity of redemption, and to be permitted to redeem from a mortgage lien. Decree for defendant. Complainant appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing denied.

The bill in this case was filed by the appellant against the appellee. The purposes and prayer of the bill are sufficiently stated in the opinion. The averments of the answer, which were filed by the respondent, are also shown by the opinion. On the submission of the cause upon the pleadings and proof the chancellor decreed that the complainant was not entitled to the relief prayed, and ordered that the bill be dismissed. Complainant brings this appeal, and assigns as error this final decree of the chancellor.

Hargrove & Vande Graaff, for appellant. Wm. Cochran Fitts and Wood & Wood, for appellee.

CLOPTON, J. On May 5, 1880, appellant executed to John Bowen a mortgage on the land in controversy to secure the payment of a note for $500, payable 8 months after date, with interest. The note not having been paid at maturity, Bowen advertised the land for sale under the mortgage. Appellant applied to appellee to assist him, and thereupon, by arrangement between the parties, appellant drew a bill of exchange, March 14, 1881, for $560, payable at 90 days after date, which was indorsed by appellee, and discounted in bank. The money raised by the discount of the bill was applied to the payment of the note held by Bowen, and on the same day appellant executed to appellee a mortgage on the land to secure him as such indorser. It is true, the mortgage recites that it was executed for the purpose of securing an indebtedness from appellant to appellee, "as evidenced by his promissory note of even date herewith, in the sum of five hundred dollars, payable with interest from date;" but it is undisputed that no such note was given, and that the real object of the mortgage was to secure the liability of appellee by virtue of his indorsement of the bill of exchange. Appellant having failed to provide for the payment of the bill at maturity, appellee paid it, and thereafter advertised the land for sale under the mortgage on the 3d day of September, 1881. After the land was advertised, appellant executed, August 19, 1881, to appellee, a conveyance thereof on the recited consideration of $560. Appellant, who files the bill, seeks to be let in to redeem, notwithstanding the deed. Counsel for the respective parties differ as to the nature and purpose of the bill. Counsel for defendant insist that its object is to have the conveyance, absolute in its terms, declared a conditional sale, and to enforce the right to repurchase; and counsel for complainant contend that the case made by the bill is an attack upon the fairness and validity of a sale and conveyance of the equity of redemption by a mortgagor to the mortgagee. After setting forth the facts above stated, the bill alleges that when complainant met defendant, August 19, 1881, the latter stated, in explanation of his course, that, it having become inconvenient for him to extend the debt, which the bill alleges he originally agreed to do, he had advertised the property in order to bring the complainant to town, not knowing how to get word to him otherwise, and that a new arrangement must be made. The bill further avers: "Your orator being still wholly without any ready money, or other available property than said land, and knowing of no one from whom he could obtain assistance, Clements [the defendant] finally proposed to him that, if orator would make him a deed to the property, he would allow orator a reasonable and convenient time to repay the debt to himself, and would allow orator to collect and hold the rents of the current year." It then avers that complainant, being unversed in such business, and ignorant of the law, and trusting to the representations of defendant, who had long been his friend and attorney at law, that the arrangement would be to his advantage, as saving trouble and expense, accepted the proposal, and executed the deed to defendant without any new consideration. The bill further alleges that defendant agreed, at the time of the arrangement to raise the money to pay Bowen by discounting the bill of exchange, to attend to the extension of the debt when it matured; also that the land was worth not less than $1,200. The special prayer is that the deed be set aside and canceled as having been obtained without consideration, by unfair dealing, and undue advantage taken of the necessitous condition of the complainant, and that the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee be decreed to still subsist. As the allegations and special prayer apparently sustain the contention of appellant as to the structure and purpose of the bill, and as the error insisted on by counsel in argument consists in the denial of the special relief prayed, we will first consider the right of complainant to maintain the bill for the purpose of canceling the conveyance, and thereby restore the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, with the right to redeem.

The well-recognized rule that a mortgagor may, by subsequent contract, make a valid sale or release of the equity of redemption to the mortgagee; and that such sale or release will be maintained in equity, if shown to be free from fraud, oppression, or undue advantage, and supported by a sufficient consideration, is not controverted. The contention is that defendant's acquisition of the equity of redemption cannot stand the test of the principles governing transactions between parties who deal on unequal terms,—between power on the one side and weakness on the other,—if the watchfulness with which courts of equity investigate such cases is observed, and the bill, answer, and evidence are closely and searchingly scrutinized. The principal facts averred in the bill as constituting unfair dealing are the existence of the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, an agreement on the part of defendant to attend to the extension of the debt when the bill of exchange matured, the necessitous condition of the mortgagor, and the inadequacy of the consideration. As to an agreement to attend to the extension of the debt in bank, or to allow complainant any time in which to repurchase or redeem by payment of the debt, and as to the circumstances attending the execution of the conveyance, the testimony of complainant and defendant is in irreconcilable conflict. The necessitous condition of complainant is shown. As is usually the case, the witnesses widely differ as to the value of the property. If the value be determined by the testimony of the witnesses on the part of complainant, the consideration was grossly inadequate; if by the testimony of defendant's witnesses, it was not unreasonable. The expression, sometimes used, that the release must be for an adequate consideration, is thus defined by FIELD, J., in Peugh v. Davis, 96 U. S. 332: "That is to say, it must be for a consideration which would be deemed reasonable if the transaction were between other parties dealing in similar property in its vicinity. Any marked undervaluation of the property in the price paid will vitiate the proceeding." It may be conceded that, though there is the absence of actual fraud and undue advantage, gross inadequacy of consideration, "marked undervaluation of the property," will of itself avoid an absolute and unconditional release. Also, if the circumstances are merely suspicious, casting a shadow over the fairness of the acquisition of the equity of redemption, but not rising to the dignity of proof, a consideration, so unreasonable that a party, not unduly influenced, free to act according to his own volition and judgment, would not surrender the property for the price paid, may suffice to vitiate the release. The averments of the bill make the case of a conveyance of the land to defendant upon condition that complainant should be allowed a reasonable and convenient time to pay the debt,—a deed absolute in form, but intended to operate as a security, or conditional sale. When the sale or release is conditional, the rules as to the inadequacy of consideration sufficient to vitiate it do not apply with the same strictness, or to the same extent, as when absolute. In such case the comparative quantum of the consideration paid and the value of the property become significant and important, because connected with the previously existing relation of mortgagor and mortgagee; but, to be effectual of itself, the inadequacy must be so great as to induce the belief that the power of the mortgagee, growing out of the relation of the parties, has been oppressively exercised, or undue influence exerted, or unconscionable advantage taken. Peagler v. Stabler, 91 Ala. 308, 9 South. Rep. 157; In Stoutz v. Rouse, 84 Ala. 309, 4 South. Rep. 170, it was held that a conveyance of the property to the mortgagee in payment of the mortgage debt, with the right to redeem within two years from the date of the deed, in like manner and upon the same terms and conditions as if the property had been sold under a decree of the chancery court, was a sale with the privilege of repurchase within two years, having the effect to reduce the equity of redemption to a statutory right of redemption; and that mere inadequacy of consideration will not justify the setting aside of such a transaction. In the conclusion of the opinion it is said: "The transaction clearly extinguished the mortgage debt, which amounted to nearly six thousand dollars. Admitting the mortgaged lands to be worth nominally as much as ten thousand dollars, as averred in the bill, the complainant shows, in our opinion, no grounds for relief." Complainant knew, at the time of the transaction, that, if the land was sold under the mortgage, he had the statutory right to redeem within two years. The transaction occurred about two weeks before the day of sale. Being surprised at seeing his land advertised for sale under the mortgage, as averred in the bill, he sought defendant, who, after stating his reasons for advertising the property, said that a new arrangement must be made. The result of the interview was, in view of the fact that complainant had no money or other available property, defendant finally proposed, if complainant would make a deed to the property, he would allow him a reasonable and convenient time to repay the debt, and allow him to collect and retain the rents of the current year, which proposition was accepted, and the deed executed, no consideration other than the mortgage debt being paid. This is the substance of the transaction as averred in the bill. There are averments of long and intimate friendship between the parties, and of an agreement on the part of defendant to attend to the extension of the debt when the bill of exchange matures, which he denies both in his answer and evidence. Admitting that there was such agreement, it is neither averred nor shown that complainant made any efforts to provide for the payment of the debt, or went to see about making arrangements for its extension. In the usual course of business, a new note or bill would be required to extend the debt in bank; and complainant could have scarcely expected defendant to give such note or bill without himself becoming primarily liable. Neither is it averred that defendant made any false representations as to the legal effect and operation of the deed. The only inducement held out by defendant, so far as the bill alleges, was that the transaction would save the trouble and expense of a foreclosure of the mortgage under the power of sale.

The conclusion of fraud, oppression, or unjust advantage is not deducible from any or all of these facts standing alone; neither is any shown by the evidence. As appears from the bill and the evidence, complainant made the transaction with full knowledge of all the facts and his rights. There was no concealment, or suppression, or misrepresentation. If admitted that the land was worth $1,200, as averred in the bill, the inadequacy of the consideration is not, in view of the nature and character of the transaction as shown by the bill, so gross as to produce the conviction of unfair dealing, whatever might have been the conclusion had the bill averred that this conveyance was an absolute and unconditional sale of the equity of redemption. It is also significant and suggestive that in none of the subsequent interviews did complainant offer to rescind the contract on the ground that the equity of redemption was acquired fraudulently, oppressively, or by undue advantage, or make any such charge. On the contrary, in his offers to settle the debt and redeem the property he acted on the assumption that the transaction was valid and binding on both parties. The gravamen of the complaint of fraud consists in the subsequent repudiation of the agreement, and the refusal to allow complainant to redeem. By the transaction defendant substantially extended and carried the mortgage debt. It was not increased in amount, so as to render it more burdensome. If the transaction is a conditional sale of the equity of redemption, it comes directly within the principle declared in Stouts v. Rouse, supra; and, if a mortgage, the existing relation between the parties remained the same; and the equity of redemption was unimpaired and unembarrassed. The legal effect of the transaction is the substitution of a conveyance absolute in form, with a condition of the right to repurchase or redeem within a reasonable and convenient time, for a mortgage regular in form, but misdescribing the debt. It is no reply that defendant denies in his answer and evidence that there was any agreement to allow the right to repurchase or redeem within any time whatever. Complainant, if he recovers at all, must recover on the case made by his bill. So long as unamended, he is bound by its allegations. He cannot recover on a case inconsistent therewith, though admitted in the answer, or established by the proof.

Independent of this conclusion, we think the long acquiescence of complainant, and the delay in filing the bill, are fatal to the right of relief. The general rule is that a party seeking to rescind a contract on the ground of fraud must act with reasonable promptness and diligence in the assertion of his remedial rights. Long acquiescence, unnecessary and unexplained delay for an unreasonable time after the discovery of the fraud, will bar the equitable relief. Especially is this rule applicable when the relative value of money and the property has changed in favor of the complaining party. What is reasonable promptness depends upon the character and facts of the particular case. In Cox v. Montgomery, 36 Ill. 396, it was held that delay in filing a bill to avoid a contract for the sale of land because of fraudulent representations for 18 months after the discovery of the fraud would be an unreasonable time. The conclusion is rested on the impolicy, in a country where the value of land changes as rapidly as in Illinois, of permitting the purchaser to retain possession for that length of time after the discovery of the fraud before filing his bill to rescind, and may be a too stringent application of the general rule where the values do not change so rapidly. In Coal Co. v. Neill, 87 Ala. 158, 6 South. Rep. 1, it was held that the vendor's right to a rescission of a contract for the sale of land is bound by laches after the lapse of more than two and a half years, when it appears that the vendor retained the notes and mortgage, and the market value of the land recently increased, notwithstanding there was an offer to rescind before the increase in value.

Defendant had the right to sell the land under the power of sale contained in the mortgage. Had he done so, and purchased, the sale would have been voidable at the option of complainant, seasonably expressed. As inferable from the allegations of the bill, complainant, for the purpose of preventing a sale under the mortgage, executed to defendant a conveyance on a parol agreement that he could avoid it by paying the debt in a reasonable time. In respect to what constitutes a reasonable time, when the mortgagee becomes the purchaser at his own sale, there being no varying, peculiar circumstances, it was said in Ezzell v. Watson, 83 Ala. 120, 3 South. Rep. 309: "But, in view of the importance of fixing some definite time, in ordinary cases, in order to impart more certainty to the law, and afford greater repose to title, our later decisions have inclined to settle two years as reasonable, by way of analogy to the time fixed by statute for the redemption of realty sold under mortgages, and purchased by other persons than the mortgagee." This may now be regarded as the established rule in this state. Alexander v. Hill, 88 Ala. 487, 7 South. Rep. 238. The transaction between the parties is assimilable, in its nature and effect, to a purchase by a mortgagee at his own sale, the mortgagor reserving by contract the same option to defeat the conveyance which the law would have given him to disaffirm the sale had it been made under the mortgage and the mortgagee become the purchaser. Where the mortgagor seeks to set aside such conveyance on the ground of fraud, and remove it as an impediment to his right to redeem, it seems that the sale rule of limitation should by analogy be applicable, and that two years after the discovery of the fraud would constitute a reasonable time. But we need not apply the rule so strictly in the present case. The bill was filed October 8, 1888, more than seven years after the execution of the conveyance, and more than six years after complainant was informed that defendant repudiated the agreement and refused to allow him to redeem. In the mean time the property had increased considerably in value, and defendant had made some improvements. Under these circumstances, the long acquiescence of complainant, the unexplained delay in the assertion of his rights, bars the special relief prayed,—the restoration of the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, with the right to redeem from the mortgage of March 14, 1881, by way of cancellation of the deed. The only explanation for the delay stated in the bill is that complainant applied to attorneys to prosecute his rights, and, because of his poverty, was unable to employ one. There is no evidence that he made any effort to employ an attorney, and we cannot presume that no member of a profession distinguished for high sense of right and justice, and noted for lending aid to the helpless, could be found, who would observe the duty enjoined by statute, "never to reject, for any consideration personal to themselves, the cause of the defenseless or oppressed." If the bill is regarded as a bill to have the conveyance of August 19, 1881, though absolute on its face, declared a mortgage, and to redeem therefrom, a different rule of limitation would govern. In such case the right to redeem is not barred until the expiration of 10 years. Parmer v. Parmer, 88 Ala. 545, 7 South. Rep. 657.

So far we have considered the right to the special relief on appellant's theory,—that the purpose of the bill is to set aside a sale or release of the equity of redemption as having been fraudulently, oppressively, or inequitably acquired. It remains to consider complainant's right to relief on defendant's theory of the character and purpose of the bill. The majority of the court are of the opinion that the evidence of complainant, who is the only witness testifying to the terms of the agreement, if accepted as true, shows a conditional sale. Peeples v. Stolla, 57 Ala. 53; Adams v. Pilcher, (Ala.) 8 South. Rep. 757. If the transaction be so regarded, complainant must fail on the ground that the agreement to allow the right to repurchase, not being in writing, is void under the statute of frauds. Peugler v. Stabler, supra. Applying the well-recognized principle that, when it is doubtful whether the parties intended a conditional sale or a mortgage, courts of equity are inclined to consider the transaction as a mortgage, the averments of the bill and the proof on the part of complainant, if believed, make, in my opinion, a case where the intention was that the deed should stand as a security for the debt; and, if such be the construction, complainant must fail because of a material variance between the descriptive terms of the defeasance as alleged and as proved,—the averments of the bill being that defendant would allow complainant a reasonable and convenient time to pay the debt, and his testimony being, until he was able to pay it; and if, as the majority of the court hold, the transaction shown by the evidence is a conditional sale, the variance would be equally fatal. In either view of the case, the result is the same.

CANCELLATION OF DEED—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden of proof is on a complainant who alleges that the grantor of deeds was mentally incompetent at the date of their execution.

Appeal from chancery court, Dale county; JOHN M. FOSTER, Chancellor.

Bill by Maggie T. Chancellor, daughter of Thompson Donnell, deceased, against A. J. Donnell and others, for the removal of the administration of her father's estate from the probate court to the chancery court, and for the cancellation of certain conveyances made by him. The chancery court took jurisdiction of the administration of the estate, but refused to disturb the conveyances. Complainant appeals. Affirmed.

M. E. Milligan, for appellant. W. D. Roberts and H. L. Martin, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The appellant is a daughter of Thompson Donnell, deceased. She filed her bill in this case for the removal of the administration of her father's estate from the probate court into the chancery court, and for the cancellation of certain conveyances of land executed by her father to her three brothers and her sister, who are parties defendant to the bill. The conveyances are attacked on the grounds that when they were made the grantor therein was not mentally competent, and that he was unduly influenced to execute them. The chancery court, by the decree which is appealed from, took jurisdiction of the administration of the estate of Thompson Donnell, deceased, but refused to disturb the conveyances made by him in his lifetime to his children. The decree was adverse to the appellant only so far as the validity of the conveyances was sustained. The burden was upon her to show that the grantor in the conveyances was mentally incompetent at the date of their execution. The presumption of mental soundness must be overcome by proof. The evidence is in some conflict upon the question of Thompson Donnell's mental condition in December, 1886, when the deeds were made. He was then an old man, and had had an attack of sickness in the summer of 1885. From that time, according to the complainant's contention, his mind was impaired, and he was not, during the year 1886, mentally competent to attend to ordinary matters of business. The defendants, on the other hand, offered much evidence tending to show that while Mr. Donnell's health was not as good as it had been before his sickness in 1885, yet he so far recovered that he was able to get about and to manage his affairs as intelligently as he did formerly until the spring of 1887, when he was stricken with paralysis. It is conceded that after the last-mentioned attack his mental faculties were seriously impaired. No good purpose would be served by a discussion of the voluminous evidence in the case. The impression made by a careful review of all the proof is that, when the deeds were executed, Thompson Donnell was fully competent, mentally, to manage his own affairs, and that he executed the deeds voluntarily, and with an intelligent comprehension of their import. We are fully satisfied that it was not shown by a preponderance of the evidence that at the date of the deeds the grantor was mentally incompetent to convey his property. The charge that the deeds were executed under duress or undue influence is unsupported, and is clearly negatived by the evidence introduced by the defendant. We concur in the conclusion of the chancellor that the attack upon the deeds was not sustained. The complainant has nothing to complain of in any other feature of the decree. Affirmed.

JOHNSON et al. v. DAVIS.

MORTGAGE—VALIDITY OF EXECUTION.

A note and mortgage are properly signed where the mortgagee writes the obligor's name to each instrument, the latter affixes his mark, and a disinterested witness attests the subscriptions. Carlisle v. Campbell, 76 Ala. 247, distinguished.

Appeal from circuit court, Clarke county; WILLIAM E. CLARKE, Judge.

Detinue by W. J. Johnson & Co. against Bevily Davis. The court excluded certain evidence offered by plaintiffs, and the latter thereupon took a nonsuit and appeal. Ruling reversed, and nonsuit set aside.

On the trial the plaintiffs offered to introduce in evidence a note and mortgage given by the defendant to the plaintiffs to secure the said note executed to him. One of the plaintiffs, as a witness, testified that he wrote both the mortgage and the note offered to be introduced in evidence, and signed the defendant's name thereto, he being unable to write; that the defendant made his cross mark between the two names, both to the note and mortgage, which was witnessed by one R. W. Davis, who also subscribed to both the instruments as a witness; that the said witness, Davis, has since died, but that the witness is familiar with the handwriting, and that the signature of the subscribing witness to the said instruments was that of Davis; and that the defendant did make his mark on both of the said instruments in the presence of said Davis. Upon this testimony the defendant objected to the introduction in evidence of both the note and mortgage, on the ground that one of the plaintiffs had written the name of said defendant thereto. The court sustained this objection.

MCCLELLAN, J. The case of Carlisle v. Campbell, 76 Ala. 247, is relied on to sustain the ruling of the circuit court to the effect that the paper purporting to be a mortgage, which evidenced plaintiffs' title to the property in suit, had not been efficiently executed by the defendant. But to our minds there is such a material difference between the facts of that case and this as that the principle there declared cannot be applied here. In both cases, it is true, the alleged maker of the paper was unable to write his name. In that case, however, the payee not only wrote the promisor's name under the obligation, but also made his mark for him, while in this, the agency of the payee, or more properly grantee, extended no further than to subscribe the letters constituting the grantor's name, and the latter himself affixed his mark thereto; thus doing not only all the law prescribes in such cases as necessary for him to do, but all that he could possibly do, under the circumstances, towards efficiently signing the instrument. And the subscription there made was duly attested, and the attestation fully proved on the trial. It is immaterial by whom the name is written. It cannot be written by the grantor, nor, standing alone, could it be the signature of the grantor. His signature is his mark, and the requirements of law are fully satisfied if, finding his name subscribed to an instrument, he set his mark near it. The sole purpose of the name being there at all is by way of identifying and individualizing the mark; and this purpose can be as fully conserved when the name is written—as is by no means unusual in practice—by the other party to the contract as by a stranger; the act of either in so doing being as purely clerical as writing the body of the paper. The authorities cited in Carlisle v. Campbell all refer to instances where the obligee had acted as the agent of the obligor in the execution of the instrument; the latter being able to write. The circuit court erred, we think, in holding the mortgage offered in evidence not to have been signed by the defendant. Its ruling in that regard is reversed, the nonsuit suffered in consequence of it is set aside, and the cause is remanded.

PAYNE v. CRAWFORD.†

ARBITRATION AND AWARD—VALIDITY—SUBMISSION PURSUANT TO CHURCH RULES—OATH OF ARBITRATORS—AMENDMENT OF COMPLAINT—SIGNATURE OF COUNSEL.

1. An amended complaint in ejectment is not demurrable because the amending clause, intended to be substituted for another, and thereby to change the description of one of the parcels of land, was not signed by counsel, when, the substitution having been effected, the complaint, as amended, would present his signature.

2. An arbitration and award are none the less binding because made pursuant to the regulations of a church to which the parties belong.

3. In a common-law submission to arbitration the arbitrators need not be sworn unless the parties demand it, and it will be presumed to have been dispensed with if not required in the submission.

4. A submission to arbitration, and award thereunder, sufficiently show the subject of the contention, and what was decided, when the one provided that the parties agreed to submit the "matters in dispute" between them, "in reference to the boundary line between" them, and the other, after describing the boundary line, found that one of the parties was entitled to the land lying south thereof, between courses run between designated monuments.

† New opinion substituted. See 11 So. 725.

5. An award of arbitrators as to a boundary line between certain land cannot be avoided on the ground that a survey was not made in compliance with a verbal condition requiring it; there being no such provision in the written submission.

6. Compliance with such condition was waived by allowing the trial of an action of ejectment, in which the arbitration and award were pleaded as a defense, to proceed without making the same known.

Appeal from circuit court, Lee county; J. M. CARMICHAEL, Judge.

Statutory action of ejectment by L. W. Payne against Mary A. Crawford. The parties had made the following submission to arbitration: "We, the undersigned, hereby agree and bind ourselves to submit the matter in dispute between us, in reference to the boundary line between our land, to arbitrators, each to select one arbitrator and these to select a third. We furthermore agree and bind ourselves to abide by the decision of said arbitrators." That award was in writing, signed by the arbitrators, and was in the following language; "We, the undersigned arbitrators in the case of sister Mary A. Crawford and brother L. W. Payne, respecting the disputed line between them, viz., the east and west and north and south line, after examining numerous and reputable witnesses, and retracing the east and west line between the said Crawford and Payne, we are of the opinion that Payne is entitled to the land lying south of the aforesaid line first run by us, beginning at a pine stob about 60 or 70 feet south of the mouth of the lane from Auburn to the colored graveyard, and running six degrees north of east to a sweet gum tree at the northeast corner of said Payne's woodland: thence south along the wire fence of said Payne, forming the eastern boundary of said Payne, to the Henry Sills place." At the request of the plaintiff the following written charges were given to the jury: "(1) We ask the court to charge the jury that the fact that the submission for arbitration was in writing is no evidence that the arbitration was not a church arbitration. (2) If the jury find that this arbitration was a church arbitration, then the jury must not consider it at all. (3) If the jury find from the evidence that Mrs. Crawford was in possession of the disputed land, claiming to own it up to the line claimed, before Payne took possession of it, and that she held such possession up to the time that Mr. Payne took possession, then she is entitled to recover, whether her paper title covered it or not." The defendant duly excepted to the giving of each of these charges, and also separately excepted to the court's refusal to give the two charges requested by him, which were as follows: "(1) An arbitration may be both a church arbitration and a common-law arbitration. (2) If the parties went into an arbitration as citizens, as well as church members, intending to settle their differences outside of as well as in the church, they could bind themselves thereby as well as if the church had had nothing to do with it." From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

George P. Harrison, for appellant. J. M. Chilton, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. There was a demurrer to the complaint, as second amended, because the amendment was not signed by counsel. That amendment consisted simply in a change of the description of one of the pieces of land sued for. The amending clause was intended to be substituted for another, and thereby displace and eliminate the original clause. Carried into effect, the complaint, as amended, would present the signature of counsel, and would be complete. In amendments, such as here made, it would be better to rewrite the count, and cause it to show at a glance how it would read when amended. This would avert confusion and misunderstanding. Our constitutional rule in regard to amending statutes furnishes a safe and simple guide to be followed in such cases. We do not think, however, that a failure to do so in a case like the present is a ground of demurrer.

This is a statutory real action brought by Mary A. Crawford against L. W. Payne, for the recovery of a strip of land lying between their several possessions. Their lands were and are coterminous, and their contention raised the issue whether the strip belonged to the one or the other. The situs of the dividing line was the only subject of litigation, so far as this particular tract was concerned, for neither contended that their asserted titles overlapped each other. Neither asserted claim save as they severally contended a proper survey and measurement would show the rightfulness of their several claims. Our defense pleaded and relied on by defendant, Payne, was that, before the action was brought, they had, by written agreement, submitted the matter of the disputed boundary to arbitrators, one named by each, with authority to them to name a third; that the two selected arbitrators had agreed on and chosen an umpire; that the arbitrators had acted, having the parties and their witnesses before them; and that they had made a written award, finding that the disputed strip of land was the property of Payne, the defendant. Copies of the agreement of submission and of the award are set forth in the statement of facts. Very many objections were raised to the sufficiency alike of the submission and of the award. Some of these we will proceed to notice. We will premise, however, that this was not a statutory submission. Code 1886, § 3221 et seq. The questions presented must be determined according to the rules of the common law. Brewer v. Bain, 60 Ala. 153.

It is objected to the sufficiency and binding effect of the submission and award that the subject of the contention is not described in such manner as to show what was intended to be submitted, and what was decided. The language they employed was: "We hereby agree and bind ourselves to submit the matter in dispute between us, in reference to the boundary line between our lands, to arbitration." The agreement then continued: "We furthermore agree and bind ourselves to abide by the decision of said arbitrators." This was signed by both parties. The award is very specific, and describes the proper dividing line between them in language that would be sufficient in a deed of conveyance. They give to Payne the land lying south of a dividing line, "beginning at a pine stob about sixty or seventy feet south of the mouth of the lane from Auburn to the colored graveyard, and running six degrees north of east to a sweet gum tree at the northeast corner of said Payne's woodland; thence south along the wire fence of said Payne's woodland, the eastern boundary of said Payne's, to the Henry Sills place." The law favors and encourages the settlement of disputes by arbitration, and neither exacts nor expects technical precision either in the submission or the award. It is enough if certainty to a common intent be observed. We think the descriptions in this case are sufficient to show what was intended, and, with reasonable care and skill, to prevent mistakes. See the many authorities collected in 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 656, and note 1; Id. p. 699, and note 2.

It is objected in the second place that the arbitrators were not sworn. That is not indispensable in a common-law arbitration; and if not required by the submission, or demanded by the parties, it will be presumed it was dispensed with. Id. p. 674, and notes.

It was attempted to be shown in avoidance of the award that plaintiff, Crawford, verbally required that the line should be surveyed as a condition of her agreement to be bound by the action of the arbitrators. What did actually take place was a demand to that effect made known to her pastor, but neither embodied in the written submission nor shown to have been communicated to the arbitrators. When the controversy came up for consideration and decision, it is not shown that she claimed this step should be taken. We think there are two complete answers to this contention: First, it was an attempt to vary and add to the terms of the submission by proof of an oral, qualifying stipulation not embraced in the writing; and, second, by allowing the trial to proceed without making known the condition on which her consent to arbitrate had been obtained, she must be held to have waived a compliance with it.

It is further objected that the arbitration in this case was had in obedience to a mere church regulation, and that it is not binding or conclusive upon the parties as to the title to the property in dispute. The precise form in which this question is presented is as follows: Plaintiff and defendant were members of the same church,—the Methodist Episcopal Church South. By the discipline and regulations of that church, it is made the duty of the pastor having charge of the church, whenever any dispute arises between two or more members concerning the payment of debts or otherwise, which cannot be settled by the parties concerned, to "recommend to the contending parties a reference, consisting of one arbiter chosen by the plaintiff, another chosen by the defendant, which two arbiters so chosen shall nominate the third. * * * If any member of the church shall refuse, in cases of debt or other disputes, to refer the matter to arbitration, * * * or shall enter into a lawsuit with another member before these measures are taken, he shall be expelled, unless the case be of such a nature as to require and justify a process at law." The award of the arbitrators was rendered in writing, signed by each of them, and sufficiently specifies the dividing or boundary line between the two litigants. It states that "after examining numerous and reputable witnesses, and retracing the east and west line between the said Crawford and Payne," they proceeded to describe and declare what they ascertained was the true dividing line. Is there anything in the objection that this arbitration was had under a church regulation, if it is sufficient in other respects? What is the rationale of such regulation? Manifestly the cultivation and preservation of harmony and brotherly love between the members caused its adoption. The observance of it by the members cannot be enforced either by the church or by the courts of the country. The only penalty for its nonobservance is a church trial, and its consequences; and the infliction of that penalty rests exclusively with the church. Compliance with it is a matter of pure volition, which law neither enforces nor restrains. What are the purpose and policy of arbitration? All will agree that speedy and inexpensive adjustment of disputes concerning property rights, without the exasperating tendencies of a suit in court, is its high commendation. Is it entitled to that commendation if it accomplishes nothing? Why arbitrate, if no right is settled by it? Why should the church require arbitration if the rights in dispute remain in the same unsettled condition they were in before it was entered upon? Is it a mere empty form? We hold that an arbitration held and award rendered pursuant to church regulation is equally binding (no more and no less) as if held without reference to such regulation. If valid and binding without the regulation, it is equally valid and binding notwithstanding the rules of the church brought it about. To hold otherwise would be to convict the church of establishing a rule that can lead to no practical result. We hold that the award rendered in this case is an estoppel upon plaintiff's right to maintain this action. Cox v. Jagger, 2 Cow. 638; French v. New, 20 Barb. 481.

Many of the rulings of the circuit court are not reconcilable with what we have declared. Reversed and remanded.

(95 Ala. 4)

YOUNG v. STATE.

HOMICIDE — DYING DECLARATIONS — INSTRUCTIONS — REASONABLE DOUBT.

1. On a trial for murder, the dying declarations of decedent to his attending physician were not admissible, when the only evidence that they were made under a sense of impending death was that the physician had told him that he was going to die, and where he had expressed an intention to "get even" with defendant "when he got up," though at what stage of his illness he had done so did not appear.

2. There was no error in an instruction that, "in case of homicide, the law presumes malice from the use of a deadly weapon, and casts on the defendant the onus of repelling the presumption, unless the evidence which proves the killing shows also that it was perpetrated without malice, and whenever malice is shown, and is unrebutted by the circumstances of the killing or by other facts in evidence, there can be no conviction for any less degree of homicide than murder."

3. The court properly refused an instruction that if, from all the evidence, "it is possible, * * * it may be, or perhaps, the defendant is not guilty," and if the jury "are not morally certain that he is guilty, this amounts to a reasonable doubt, and entitles the defendant to an acquittal."

Appeal from city court of Mobile; O. J. SEMMES, Judge.

Robert Young was indicted for murder. The facts necessary to a full understanding of the decision of the court are sufficiently stated in the opinion. The court, at the request of the state, gave, among others, the following charges: (1) "In case of homicide, the law presumes malice from the use of a deadly weapon, and casts on the defendant the onus of repelling the presumption, unless the evidence which proves the killing shows also that it was perpetrated without malice; and whenever malice is shown, and is unrebutted by the circumstances of the killing, or by other facts in evidence, there can be no conviction for any less degree of homicide than murder." The defendant excepted to the giving of this charge, as well as the other charges given at the request of the state; and also separately excepted to the refusal of the court to give the several charges requested by him, and, among the number, the following: (7) "The court charges the jury that if from all the evidence the jury believe that it is possible, or that it may be, or perhaps, the defendant is not guilty, and if they are not morally certain that he is guilty, this amounts to a reasonable doubt, and entitles the defendant to an acquittal." There was a judgment of conviction, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. L. Martin, Atty. Gen., for the State.

COLEMAN, J. The defendant was tried and convicted of murder in the second degree, and was sentenced by the court to confinement in the penitentiary for 10 years. The first exception relates to the admission of statements by the deceased as dying declarations. The testimony tends to show that the attending physician was called professionally to see deceased on the 7th day of May, 1891, immediately after the fatal shot was fired. The physician testifies that deceased "was suffering very much, and was then in a dying condition;" "that he died at 6 o'clock A. M. on May 9, 1891; that it was hardly two days from the time he was first called that he told deceased that he was going to die." With the exception of a description of the wound, and that it caused the death of White, the deceased, the foregoing statement contains the entire predicate upon which the declarations were admitted. Before declarations of deceased are entitled to be received in evidence as dying declarations, it must appear that declarant, at the time they were made, was impressed with the belief that death was impending, and would certainly ensue. It is not necessary to their admissibility, in point of fact, that they be made in articulo mortis, and that dissolution resulted immediately afterwards, but declarant must be impressed with the conviction that he cannot possibly recover. Hammil v. State, 90 Ala. 580, 8 South. Rep. 380; Pulliam v. State, 88 Ala. 3, 6 South. Rep. 839; Reynolds v. State, 68 Ala. 506; Whart. Ev. §§ 282, 286; 1 Greenl. § 158. The facts and circumstances testified to by the physician, and the statement made by the physician to deceased, were all legitimate for the consideration of the court, which must determine the admissibility of the evidence. Faire v. State, 58 Ala. 80. We fail to discover anything in his testimony, or elsewhere in the record, which indicates directly the state of mind of the deceased at the time the declarations were made. After laying the predicate as we have stated it, the witness says: "I asked deceased who shot him, and deceased replied that Bob Young shot him; that he got into a quarrel, and got scared, and ran; that he did not have a knife." We cannot say, from the statement of the physician here detailed, that, at the time deceased made the statements testified to, he had given up all hope of recovery. It nowhere appears that deceased expressed the belief that he was mortally wounded, and there is nothing to show that his confidence in the opinion of his physician was of that degree that an expression of opinon by him to the deceased that he "was going to die" was of itself sufficient to convince deceased of its truth. It was not necessary, to render them admissible, that deceased should have expressed the conviction that he would not recover, and an expression to this effect would not necessarily make them competent. The court must consider all the circumstances attending the declarations, and if, from them all, the fair and reasonable inference arises that declarant was convinced in his own mind that his wound was mortal,—that death was impending,—his declarations are entitled to be considered in evidence. Wills v. State, 74 Ala. 24; 58 Ala. supra. We think a just and salutary administration of the law requires that courts should have due regard to the rules and limitations placed upon declarations made by a person in the absence of the defendant against whom they are offered, and in regard to which he has had no opportunity to cross-examine declarant, before they can be regarded as dying declarations, and thus become admissible against him. We find in the record another statement by the deceased, to wit, "that he would get even with him [referring to the defendant] when he got up." No question is raised on this latter statement, and it is not shown at what period of his illness the declaration was made, and we refer to it simply to show that, notwithstanding the wound and the suffering of deceased, he expected to "get up." We do not think the predicate in this case was sufficient to authorize the introduction of the statements of deceased as dying declarations.

We find no error in the first charge given by the court defining murder. It is unnecessary to consider the other charges given, which undertake to define murder in the first degree. The defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and cannot be retried for a higher offense than that for which he was convicted. There was no error in refusing the charges asked for by the defendant. All of them are objectionable, and with the exception of the one numbered 7, ignore certain facts testified to by witnesses examined on the part of the state, from which, if believed, the jury might infer that the defendant was not free from fault in bringing on the difficulty. The definition given to a "reasonable doubt," in charge No. 7, finds no warrant in any decision of this court. For the error in admitting the dying declarations the case must be reversed and remanded.

KEARNEY v. KLING.

PLEADING—DEMURRER—ERRORS WAIVED BY JOINING ISSUE—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against the charterer of a steamboat, the complaint alleged that defendant had committed a breach of the charter party by failing and refusing to return the steamboat. Defendant answered, alleging, among other things, that said vessel sank and perished before a month had run, and any payment of hire had accrued, and the evidence proved the truth thereof. Held that, although said answer was demurrable, yet the court having overruled a demurrer thereto, and, plaintiff having thereupon joined issue thereon, the refusal of the court to intruct the jury to find for defendant, if they believed the evidence, was ground for reversal, the record not showing that the errors had neutralized each other.

Appeal from circuit court, Mobile county; W. E. CLARKE, Judge.

Action by August Kling against Phillip Kearney on a charter party or contract by which plaintiff leased the steamer Lillie to Peter Burke. Defendant was sued as surety thereon. The charter party and guaranty are as follows: "This charter party, entered into by and between August Kling, owner of the steamboat Lillie, on the first part, and Peter Burke of the second part, witnesseth: First. August Kling, of the first part, agrees to charter to Peter Burke the steamboat Lillie, for the term of five months, at and for the sum of sixty dollars per month, payable monthly, which the said Peter Burke doth agree to pay. Second. It is hereby agreed that the said Peter Burke shall assume all liabilities, of any and all kind, arising from or suffered by the said Lillie during the continuance of this said charter party. Third. The said Peter Burke is to insure the said Lillie, if she can be insured, in and for the benefit of the said August Kling, for the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, he, the said Burke, paying all the premiums on said insurance policy; and said policy is to be delivered to the said Kling within two weeks from the signing of this charter party. Fourth. It is expressly agreed and understood that the said Peter Burke shall not run said Lillie into debt; that he is to create no debts or liabilities on said vessel of any kind; and he does hereby covenant and agree to keep the said vessel free from all debts of any kind, and to hold the said August Kling and said vessel harmless from any and all debts or liabilities that may or shall be created or sustain or accrue during the continuance of this charter party. Fifth. The said Peter Burke doth agree to return the said steamboat Lillie to August Kling, in the city of Mobile, state of Alabama, upon the expiration of this charter party in the same condition as when received, ordinary wear and tear excepted. If said Lillie should sink, the said Peter Burke is to do all in his power to raise her. Sixth. It is mutually agreed between the parties that if the said Peter Burke, at any time during the continuance of this charter party, should decide or conclude to purchase the said steamboat Lillie, the said August Kling doth hereby agree to sell her to him for the sum of one thousand dollars in cash; and it is understood that, in that event, the amount said Burke shall have paid said Kling as charter money, under this charter party, shall be allowed him as so much paid on the one thousand dollars." "For and in consideration of the chartering or letting of the said steamboat Lillie to the said Peter Burke by the said August Kling, and for the sum of one dollar, I hereby become surety for the punctual payment of the said sixty dollars per month, and the performance of the agreements and covenants in the above written agreement or charter mentioned to be paid and performed by Peter Burke; and, if any default shall be made therein, I do hereby promise and agree to pay unto August Kling such sum or sums of money as will be sufficient to make up such deficiency, and fully satisfy the conditions of the said agreement, without requiring any notice of nonpayment or proof of demand being made. [Signed] PHILLIP KEARNEY." From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Pillans, Torrey & Hanaw, for appellant. Overall & Beston, for appellee.

STONE, C. J. The complaint contains two special counts, and each count sets out in extenso a copy of the contract, and a copy of Kearney's guaranty of Burke's faithful performance. Burke leased the boat from Kling, September 14, 1889; was to man and run her on his own account, and return her at the end of the lease, February 14, 1890, in the same condition as when received, "wear and tear excepted." No ruling appears to have been had on the first count, and we will not notice it. The case was tried on the second count, and the only breach assigned in it was and is "that said Burke has committed a breach of said contract or charter party, in this: that he has failed and refused to return said steamboat Lillie to plaintiff at Mobile, Ala., after the expiration of said charter party." There was a demurrer to the complaint, assigning grounds; but, as there is no assignment of error which brings up the ruling on the demurrer, we will not consider it. Defendant, Kearney, then filed eight pleas to the complaint. The first was that at the time of the charter the steamboat Lillie was not river worthy, and was not fit for carrying freight and passengers up and down the Mobile and Tombigbee rivers; second, that in consequence of said river unworthiness, and not from any peril of the navigation, said steamboat sprung a leak, and was lost on her first voyage; third, that by said charter party Kling warranted that the steamboat "was in all respects fit and suitable, in strength, structure, and condition, to carry a cargo in the river trade;" and defendant then negatived these qualities, and averred that on her first trip, in less than a month after the contract, from no peril of the navigation, but from her own unfitness and river unworthiness, she sank, and was lost; fourth plea avers that, by force of the contract, plaintiff was bound to see that the boat was river worthy, and in suitable condition for the service, and neglected to do so, and that in less than a month the boat was lost, in consequence of her own river unworthiness; fifth, that the boat sunk, and perished in less than a month after she was chartered, before any hire had accrued; sixth, same as fifth, with the additional averment that the boat was lost without the fault of Burke or defendant; seventh, that boat was lost, on her first voyage, from no peril of the river, but from inherent weakness and river unworthiness, and that it was not in Burke's power to raise her; eighth, that the steamboat, by her own inherent weakness and river unworthiness, was rendered incapable of being returned to plaintiff. Plaintiff demurred in gross to 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 7th, and 8th pleas of defendant, "raising the question of river unworthiness." He assigned grounds of demurrer: "First, because, by the terms of said contract of charter party, defendant's principal hired said boat as she was, and expressly agreed to return her to plaintiff in same condition as when received." Second assignment is not materially different from first. Third assignment denies that by the terms of the charter party there is any warranty of the river worthiness of the steamboat. Fourth assignment is substantially like the first and second. Plaintiff also demurred "to the fifth and sixth pleas, because they present no issue of law or fact." The court overruled these demurrers, and the plaintiff then took issue on the pleas.

The contract or charter party contains no express guaranty or other provision in reference to the soundness or river worthiness of the steamboat Lillie. If there was any guaranty, it was one implied from the nature of the contract. We have stated above that the only breach of Burke's contract stipulations which is assigned in the second count is that he failed and refused to restore the steamboat to Kling. The contract or charter party expressly imposes many duties on Burke. We mention only two of them. "Third. The said Peter Burke is to insure the said Lillie, if she can be insured, in and for the benefit of said August Kling, for the sum of fifteen hundred dollars; he, the said Burke, paying all the premiums on said insurance policy, and said policy to be delivered to said Kling within two weeks from the signing of this charter party. * * * Fifth. The said Peter Burke doth agree to return the said steamboat Lillie to August Kling, in the city of Mobile, state of Alabama, upon the expiration of this charter party, in the same condition as when received, ordinary wear and tear excepted. If said Lillie should sink, the said Peter Burke is to do all in his power to raise her." The testimony, without conflict, surely proved the truth of defendant's fifth plea. The only averment of fact set up by that plea in bar of plaintiff's action was "that said vessel sunk and perished before a month had run and any payment of hire had accrued." On this plea plaintiff had taken issue, and, when its truth was proved, defendant was entitled to a verdict. Defendant had in writing requested the court to charge the jury that, if they believed the evidence, they must find for the defendant, and the court had refused to so charge. This was excepted to, and is assigned as error. In the then state of the pleadings, this charge ought to have been given. Brewing Co. v. Handley, 90 Ala. 486, 7 South. Rep. 912. This plea had been demurred to by plaintiff, and the demurrer overruled. The plea being insufficient, if defendant had succeeded in the court below, and plaintiff had appealed, we would have reversed the judgment of the circuit court overruling the demurrer to the fifth plea. So, if defendant had succeeded in obtaining a verdict on the fifth plea, it is not improbable that plaintiff would have moved for a repleader. Mudge v. Treat, 57 Ala. 1; Irion v. Lewis, 56 Ala. 190; Railway Co. v. Propst, 90 Ala. 1, 7 South. Rep. 635.

In view of these principles, there possibly might be conditions in which we would hold that one error had neutralized the other, and on that account refuse to reverse. To justify such possible ruling, it would be necessary for the record to show affirmatively and clearly that no injury was done. The record before us is not in a condition to authorize us to make that statement. It is not satisfactorily shown that all the meritorious questions which arise out of this transaction have been raised by the pleadings or passed on in the court below. We state some inquiries which suggest themselves, which should be probably considered on a second trial, but we must not be considered as intimating a positive conviction in regard to them. The contract being in writing, all its provisions must be taken into the account in giving it its proper interpretation. The inquiries we suggest are—First. Does the contract impose on Burke an unconditional liability to return the vessel at the expiration of the lease? Does not the clause, "if said Lillie should sink, the said Peter Burke is to do all in his power to raise her," relieve him of such absolute liability? Second. Does not that clause impose on Peter Burke the duty of doing all in his power to raise the vessel if she sunk, or to show that such efforts would be fruitless, and that she could not be raised? Third. Was it not Burke's duty to insure the vessel before starting her on a voyage, or to show he could not obtain insurance on her? and are not the two weeks allowed for delivering the policy confined to the mere act of delivery, without enlarging the time for suing out the policy?

UNITED STATES ROLLING STOCK CO. v. CLARK et al.

SHERIFF'S FEES—ATTACHMENT.

Code, § 3687, relating to sheriff's commissions, provides that "when an attachment is by him levied on personal property, which is replevied, or the cause is settled without a sale, he is entitled to one half the commissions on the amount of the demand sued for, allowed him for making money on execution, to be paid by the party paying such demand or replevying such property." Held, that the word "demand" means the amount which plaintiff in attachment is entitled to recover.

Appeal from city court of Anniston; F. B. CASSADY, Judge.

Proceedings in attachment by Clark & Co. against the United States Rolling Stock Company. Settled without sale. Defendant's motion to retax costs overruled. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. J. Willett and Tompkins & Tray, for appellant. Caldwell & Johnston, for appellees.

WALKER, J. The attachment in this case was sued out for the sum of $12,000. The amount really due to the plaintiffs was less than $4,200. That amount was paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs before judgment. In taxing the costs the sheriff was allowed commissions on $12,000, and the circuit court refused to reduce this item, or to order the commissions to be taxed only on the amount really due and paid. The following is the provision fixing the sheriff's commissions in such a case: "When an attachment is by him levied on personal property, which is replevied, or the cause is settled without a sale, he is entitled to one half the commissions upon the amount of the demand sued for, allowed him for making money on execution, to be paid by the party paying such demand or replevying such property." Code, § 3687. The word "demand," as used in this statute, does not mean the amount claimed or the damages laid in the attachment affidavit or in the complaint. It means what the plaintiff was entitled to require the defendant to pay. In ordinary legal usage, the words "debt" and "demand" are of kindred meaning, but the latter word is a term of much more comprehensive signification than the former. The term "debt" imports a sum of money owing upon a contract, express or implied; while the term "demand" embraces rightful claims, whether founded upon a contract, a tort, or a superior right of property. In re Denny, 2 Hill, 220; Drews v. Coles, 2 Tyrw. 510. The statute which enumerates the classes of "demands" for which attachments may issue in the first place, authorizes the issue of the writ "to enforce the collection of a debt;" next, "for any moneyed demand, the amount of which can be certainly ascertained." Code 1886, § 2929. In such connection the meaning of the words "debt" and "demand" is plain. They are used to describe certain classes of rights of action. Neither of them covers anything more than what is due to the plaintiff in attachment,—the amount which he is entitled to recover. We think it is plain that the phrase, "the amount of the demand," as used in the statute fixing the sheriff's commissions when the attachment suit is settled, means the amount which the plaintiff was entitled to be paid by the defendant. To construe these words as requiring the commissions to be calculated on the amount claimed by the plaintiff, regardless of what was really due, would result in putting it in his power to defeat one of the purposes of the statute. It was evidently intended by the statute to secure to the defendant the right to save costs by discharging his liability or by replevying the property before a sale of it under the writ. If the plaintiff could swell the commissions to be paid by the defendant on a settlement, merely by making an extravagant claim, then the defendant, by paying all that was confessedly due, might become chargeable with a larger sum for the sheriff's commissions than if he had allowed the execution of the writ to proceed; and if, as in the present case, the plaintiff had claimed more than twice as much as was really due, the one half commissions on the amount of the claim would be more than the whole commissions which would be payable if there had been no settlement, but the property had been sold under the writ, and the plaintiff had recovered judgment for all that was really due. It was never intended to give the plaintiff in attachment the power to make it a positive disadvantage to the defendant to discharge his liability or to replevy the property before a sale. A construction of the statute involving such a result is unreasonable, and is not required by the language used. The one half commissions of the sheriff should have been computed on the amount which was really due, and which was paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs.

Reversed and remanded.

DE LOACH MILLS MANUF'G CO. v. MIDDLEBROOKS.

COMMISSIONS OF AGENT—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action by an agent to recover commissions for the sale of certain chattels, where there was no dispute as to the agency, and the only issue was whether plaintiff had made the sales, testimony by defendant that it had other agents for the sale of its wares in the county where plaintiff lived and did business was irrelevant.

2. The court properly refused to charge "that, when plaintiff fails to prove a material fact in his case," and neglects to offer evidence of the fact when he has the opportunity, the presumption is that such fact does not exist, since it assumed that plaintiff had failed to prove a material fact.

3. Where there was no evidence that defendant had become liable to pay or had paid a commission on these sales to another agent, the court properly refused to charge that it was plaintiff's duty to promptly notify defendant of the sales, to prevent it from paying commissions to some other person who might have sent the order, and that, if plaintiff failed to exercise such care, he could not recover.

Appeal from circuit court, Conecuh county; JOHN P. HUBBARD, Judge.

Action by J. C. Middlebrooks against the De Loach Mills Manufacturing Company to recover a commission for certain sales. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed

This was an action brought by the appellee against the appellant, and sought to recover commissions for 15 per cent. for making sales of appellant's mills and machinery to one Douglass and Deer. The defendant pleaded the general issue. The terms of the contract existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, the prices of the machinery sold to Deer and Douglass, respectively, and the terms at which the sales were made, which cover a period and relate to the character and subject-matter and dealings between the parties, are not controverted. As stated in the opinion, the only controverted fact is whether Middlebrooks worked up and made either of said sales, or is entitled to such commissions. There is only one exception reserved to the ruling of the court upon the evidence, and that was the court's refusal to allow the defendant's counsel to ask De Loach "if he did not have other agents for the sale of his goods here in Conecuh county during the years 1888–89." The court, in its general charge, among other things, instructed the jury as follows: (1) "If the jury believe from the evidence that there was an agreement between plaintiff and defendant by which defendant was to pay plaintiff a commission on all sales made by plaintiff, and on all sales that plaintiff worked up, and they believe from the evidence that plaintiff worked up the sale with Deer, and that Deer bought, then defendant would be liable as to the sale to Deer, although L. Finch & Co. may have ordered the mill for him, and he procured it through such order; or although defendant may have sold directly to Deer, if in the other respects plaintiff makes out his case." The defendant duly excepted to the giving of this charge, and separately excepted to the refusal of the court to give the following charges, requested by it in writing: (1) "The court charges the jury that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to make out his case, and that when he, the plaintiff, fails to prove a material fact in his case, and has the means and opportunity to prove such fact, fails or neglects to offer evidence of it, the presumption is fair and just that it does not exist." (2) "The court charges the jury that if the plaintiff effected a sale, or procured a customer for the defendant, that then it was the duty of the plaintiff within a reasonable time that the sale was effected by him, or customer was procured by him, (the plaintiff,) and prevent defendant paying commission to some other person who might have sent the order; and, if the evidence fails to show you reasonably that plaintiff exercised such care in notifying defendant, then there can be no recovery of commissions for such sales or customers." There was judgment for the plaintiff; and the defendant brings this appeal, and assigns as error the rulings of the court upon the evidence and the charges.

Stallworth & Burnett, for appellant. Farnham & Crum, for appellee.

MCCLELLAN, J. This action is by Middlebrooks for commissions on sales which he alleges were made or "worked up" by him for the defendant company as its agent. There is no conflict in the evidence as to the agency or the terms of it. Plaintiff was authorized to make sales of machinery, etc., for defendant, and was to receive 15 per cent. commissions on all sales made by him, and also on all sales which resulted from his efforts,—were worked up by him,—though not in fact consummated by or through him. The only material controversy as to the facts was in respect of the inquiry whether the sales upon which commissions were claimed had been made or worked up by the plaintiff; and in this connection the defendant corporation sought to prove that it had other agents for the sale of its wares in Conecuh county, where plaintiff resided and did business. The court, we think, properly excluded this proposed evidence from the jury. It was irrelevant to the issue. To have admitted it would have been to allow the jury to find that plaintiff had not made or worked up the alleged sales from the mere fact that they might have been made by another agent, without any proof that they were so made, and notwithstanding even though it had been further shown that they were actually made by another agent, yet they might have been worked up by the plaintiff in such sort as to entitle him to the commissions he claimed. Nor can the admissibility of this testimony be rested on the theory that it went to impeach plaintiff as a witness. Whether or not he had testified that defendant had no other agent in that territory, he could not be impeached by evidence contradicting him in that respect, because neither his rights nor defendant's liability depended upon that fact. It was an immaterial inquiry, which could not be gone into for the purposes of impeachment. Griel v. Solomon, 82 Ala. 85, 2 South. Rep. 322.

The only objection urged to that part of the court's general charge to which an exception was reserved is that "it assumed facts of which there was no evidence." The objection is untenable. It predicates only these facts: That there was a contract on the part of defendant to pay plaintiff 15 per cent. commissions on all sales made or worked up by him, (and this is uncontroverted;) that plaintiff worked up the sale to Deer, (and this plaintiff's evidence tends to establish;) and that a sale was made to Deer, (and this is undisputed.) Charge 1, requested for defendant, is faulty in that it assumes that plaintiff had failed to prove a material fact in his case, having reference, we suppose, to plaintiff's connection with the sale to Deer, since that fact only was in dispute. There was evidence tending to show that plaintiff's efforts had brought about this sale, and its sufficiency was for the jury. It was not for the court to assume, but for the jury to determine, whether it had or had not been proved. Charge 2, requested for the defendant, was well refused on the ground of its being abstract, if upon no other ground. Its assumption that defendant became liable to pay or had paid commissions on these sales to some third person in consequence of plaintiff's negligent delay in giving notice of his claim is entirely gratuitous; there is no such evidence in the record. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

PEARSON et al. v. KING.

EJECTMENT—PARTIES—CONVEYANCE OF LAND—USE OF GRANTOR'S NAME.

The heirs of a person who has conveyed land to another, which at the time is in the adverse possession of a third person, and the title to which, therefore, does not pass as against such person, cannot, by a subsequent release or conveyance to the adverse holder, defeat ejectment by the grantee in the name of his grantor. Scranton v. Ballard, 64 Ala. 402, and Jackson v. Demont, 9 Johns. 55, distinguished.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge.

This was an action of ejectment brought by David Pearson, the ancestor of the present plaintiffs, Baxter Pearson and others, against Peyton G. King. There was a demurrer to plaintiffs' replication, which was sustained, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Webb & Tillman, for appellants. W. M. Brooks, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is a common-law action of ejectment. David Pearson, in whom one of the demises was laid, having died pending the suit, it was revived as to that demise in the names of his heirs at law and of the administrator of his estate. The defendant interposed a special plea to the effect that, since the commencement of the suit, the heirs of David Pearson had executed a conveyance of the land sued for to the defendant. A demurrer to this plea having been overruled, the plaintiffs interposed a replication thereto to the effect that before the beginning of the suit David Pearson was seised of the legal title to the land sued for, and executed a conveyance thereof to Strange and White, when he knew that the land was in the adverse possession of the defendant's tenant; that this action was begun and is prosecuted for the use and benefit of said Strange and White; that the deed to them was duly recorded before the execution of the conveyance by Pearson's heirs to the defendant; and that the defendant had notice of David Pearson's deed to Strange and White when he obtained the deed from David Pearson's heirs to himself pending this suit. The defendant's demurrer to this replication was sustained. It is well settled that a sale and conveyance of lands, which are at the time in the possession of a third person, holding adversely to the grantor, is void as against the adverse possessor, and will not support ejectment by the grantee against him. 3 Brick. Dig. p. 18, § 51. The grantor in such conveyance may still maintain ejectment against the adverse holder, and the latter cannot plead the conveyance in bar of the suit. The conveyance is void as to him, and he cannot set it up as a defense. Davis v. Curry, 85 Ala. 133, 4 South. Rep. 734. The conveyance is void only as against the adverse possessor and persons in privity with him. As to all others, and as between the parties, it is valid and operative. Yarbrough v. Avant, 66 Ala. 526; Harvey v. Doe, 23 Ala. 637; Abernathy v. Boazman, 24 Ala. 189. The execution of the deed imports that the grantor intends to vest the title in his grantee, and to confer upon him the beneficial enjoyment of the property, so far as that result may be accomplished legally. Because of the rule of law which invalidates the deed as against the adverse holder, it cannot operate to authorize the grantee to sue in his own name for the recovery of the land from such adverse holder. But this rule of law does not stand in the way of the grantor authorizing the use of his name in a suit for the recovery of the property. Courts of law long ago recognized the right of a transferee of a chose in action which was not assignable under the common law, to use the name of the transferrer in a suit thereon. Though such assignment was void as to the debtor, yet it bound the creditor to permit the use of his name by his transferee for the enforcement of the demand. On like considerations, it has been held that a conveyance of land adversely held authorizes the grantee therein to use the grantor's name in a suit for the recovery of the property. The question was presented in the case of Steeple v. Downing, 60 Ind. 478–487. It was there said: "We are satisfied, both upon reason and authority, that where one conveys land to another, which at the time is in the adverse possession of a third person, whereby the title cannot pass as against the party thus in possession, the grantor impliedly authorizes the grantee to use his (the grantor's) name, in an action to recover the land from the party thus in the possession thereof." The result of the decisions has been stated to be that the deed is construed to be a power of attorney authorizing the grantee to use the grantor's name, as plaintiff in ejectment, to recover the lands, even against the will of the latter. Sedg. & W. Tr. Title Land, (2d Ed.) § 190. The recovery inures to the benefit of the grantee, though the action is prosecuted in the name of the grantor. Brunson v. Morgan, 86 Ala. 318, 5 South. Rep. 495. It is a general rule that there can be no recovery in favor of the plaintiff on the record after he has released or transferred his claim to the defendant. This court has recognized an exception to this rule in suits prosecuted in the name of an assignor for the benefit of the assignee of a chose in action Before the statute required a certain class of such suits to be prosecuted in the name of the party really interested, courts of law, even in suits in the name of the assignor, took notice of the rights of the assignee, and would not permit them to be prejudiced by the acts, declarations, or admissions of the assignor, done or made after the assignment. 1 Brick. Dig. p. 127, §§ 56-58. The assignment was given such effect, as between the parties, that thereafter the assignor could not defeat the action prosecuted in his name for the benefit of the assignee. The position of a grantee in a conveyance of land held adversely is similar to that occupied, at the common law, by an assignee of a chose in action. In each case the transfer is binding between the parties, and is void only as to third persons who, according to the theory of the law, might be prejudiced by having claims against them put in the hands of others than the original holders. In each case, if the suit is against such third person, it may be prosecuted in the name of the transferrer for the benefit of the transferee. The reasons against permitting the transferrer to defeat such suit by anything said or done by him after the transfer are equally applicable in each of the two cases. Those reasons have led several courts, in which the question has been presented, to the conclusion that a grantor in a conveyance of land held adversely cannot, by a subsequent release or conveyance to the adverse holder or by an order to dismiss, defeat an action brought in his name for a recovery of the land from the adverse holder for the benefit of the first grantee. Steeple v. Downing, 60 Ind. 478; White v. Patten, 24 Pick. 324; Farnum v. Peterson, 111 Mass. 148; McMahan v. Bowe, 114 Mass. 140. This conclusion is supported by a consideration which is well illustrated in the present case. David Pearson's heirs, who executed the deed relied on by the defendant, had only such right to the land as descended to them from their ancestor. So far as the defendant claims under their deed, he stands in their shoes. He has no greater rights by virtue of that deed than his grantors had at the time it was executed. Their ancestor's prior conveyance was binding on them in favor of his grantees. That conveyance conferred upon the grantees therein the right to use the name of the grantor or of his heirs in an action of ejectment against the adverse holder. Neither the grantor nor his heirs could refuse the use of their names for such a purpose. They could not confer upon another a right which they did not themselves have. The defendant's adverse possession entitles him to treat the deed to Strange and White as a nullity. But when he abandons this position, and sets up a claim under the grantor in that deed, to that extent he puts himself in privity with that grantor, and derives from him only such rights as the latter had. So far as the defendant claims under the deed to him from David Pearson's heirs, he relies on their rights as against Strange and White; and that deed cannot have effect to defeat this suit, as the grantors therein had no right to prevent the prosecution of the suit in their names for the benefit of their ancestor's grantees. It results from this conclusion, which, we are satisfied, is correct, that the demurrer to the replication to the defendant's special plea numbered 2 should have been overruled. The authorities cited for the appellee are not against this ruling. They only assert the general rule that in actions of ejectment, as in other forms of action, a release or transfer of his claim by the plaintiff pending the suit will defeat his right to recover. Doe v. Collins, 7 Ala. 480; Scranton v. Ballard, 64 Ala. 402; Jackson v. Demont, 9 Johns. 55. Neither of the cases cited is an authority against the proposition that a grantor, in a conveyance of land held adversely, cannot prevent the use of his name by the grantee in an action for the recovery of the land for the benefit of the latter. In actions of ejectment, as in other actions which may be prosecuted in the name of one person for the benefit of another, when the facts are brought to the attention of the court, it will not shut its eyes to the rights of the person beneficially interested in the prosecution of the suit, but will protect them against the unauthorized conduct of the nominal plaintiff. Roden v. Murphy, 10 Ala. 804. For the error in sustaining the demurrer to the replication the judgment must be reversed.

Reversed and remanded.

HUDSON v. GERMAIN FRUIT CO.

SALE—INSPECTION BEFORE ACCEPTANCE.

Where fruit which was to be shipped from a distance was subject to inspection by the buyer before acceptance, and an opportunity for inspection was given within a reasonable time after arrival, which the buyer refused to make, it is no defense to an action for the price that an inspection was refused by the carrier immediately on the arrival.

Appeal from city court of Birmingham; H. A. SHARPE, Judge.

Action by the Germain Fruit Company against B. B. Hudson to recover a balance due from the sale of oranges under a contract. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Upon the introduction of all the evidence, the substance of which is sufficiently set forth in the opinion, the court, at the request of the plaintiff, gave the following charges in writing: (1) "The court charges the jury that the plaintiff had a reasonable time after the sale of the fruit, under all the circumstances of the case, to deliver the fruit, and to allow an opportunity for inspection; and if the jury further believe that the 9th day of May was within such reasonable time, and if the jury further believe that on the 9th day of May the plaintiff, through Jones, offered the defendant an opportunity to inspect the fruit, and that the defendant refused to inspect the oranges, and to accept them, then the refusal of the defendant to inspect the fruit was wrongful." (2) "The court charges the jury that if defendant informed Jones that he would not examine the fruit, and would not accept it because he had made other arrangements, then the plaintiff was not bound to make any further offer or provide any further opportunity for inspection; and if the jury further believe from the evidence that the reasonable time for examination after arrival had not then expired, then the defendant's refusal to inspect the fruit was wrongful." (3) "The court charges the jury that if, within a reasonable time after the arrival of the fruit in Birmingham, the defendant was offered an opportunity to examine the fruit and refused to do so, then his refusal was wrongful." (4) "If, within a reasonable time after the arrival of the fruit in Birmingham, the defendant was offered by the plaintiff, through Jones, a reasonable opportunity to inspect the fruit, and refused to do so, or to accept the fruit, then his refusal to inspect the fruit was wrongful, although you further find that the railroad company had before then refused to allow an inspection." (5) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant was offered an opportunity, within a reasonable time after the sale of the fruit, to inspect the same, and that defendant refused such offer or privilege of inspection, then his refusal was wrongful." (6) "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant refused, within a reasonable time after the sale, to inspect the fruit, and that he stated that he would not inspect or receive it, then the plaintiff was not bound to make any further offer, or offer any further opportunity of inspection." (7) "Although the defendant may have demanded of Jones, plaintiff's agent, to be given an opportunity to examine the fruit, and Jones failed at that time to allow such examination without refusing to do so, if within a reasonable time after such demand was made the opportunity was given defendant to make such examination, and defendant refused to examine it, such refusal on the part of defendant was wrongful." (8) "If the jury believe from the evidence that, within a reasonable time after the arrival of the fruit here, the plaintiff offered the defendant an opportunity to examine the fruit, and defendant declined to examine such fruit, and to take the same, then such refusal on the part of defendant was wrongful." The defendant separately excepted to the giving of each of these charges, and also reserved an exception to the court's refusal to give the following charge requested by him in writing: (1) "The court charges the jury that if the plaintiff through its agent, W. H. Jones, agreed to let defendant examine the fruit, and not to take unless the same was found to be sound and bright; that defendant, upon the arrival of the fruit, demanded the right to examine the fruit; and that the right to examine the fruit was denied him by the railroad company, —this gave the defendant the right to then refuse to take the fruit."

Lane & White, for appellant. Cubaniss & Weakley, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. All the assignments of error are based upon the charges given by the court for plaintiff, and the refusal to charge as requested by defendant. The cause of action is founded upon a contract for the purchase of a car load of oranges, sold by appellee to the appellant, and was brought to recover the difference between the contract price and the amount realized from the sale of the oranges. The evidence shows that the fruit was sold by plaintiff though its agent, W. H. Jones, of Birmingham, Ala., to be shipped to the defendant at Birmingham, Ala., "subject to inspection, and to be received, if found by him to be sound and bright, and, if otherwise, to be rejected." The fruit was shipped from Los Angeles, Cal., to Birmingham, Ala. The defense relied upon for refusing to accept the car load of oranges is set up in the special plea of the defendant, which avers that the "plaintiff agreed, by and with the defendant, that the said defendant would be allowed to open said car, and examine the fruit, on its arrival in Birmingham, before taking or receiving the same; and defendant says, on the arrival of the said car, he asked and sought permission to open the car, and to examine the fruit, all of which was denied him," etc. It is not pretended that the fruit did not arrive at its destination within due time, or was not of the quality agreed to be shipped; neither is it controverted that the defendant, by virtue of his contract of purchase, had the right to examine the fruit, before accepting it. The real contest is as to whether the defendant in fact was refused permission to examine the fruit, within the contemplation of the parties, and whether he was justifiable in refusing to receive the fruit. It is proven that the car having the oranges arrived in Birmingham on the 7th of May, 1890. It is further proven that W. H. Jones, the agent of the shipper, was in Birmingham, and this was known to the defendant. It is not denied that, on the day of the arrival of the car, the defendant was notified by the agent of the railroad that the fruit had arrived, and that on the same day the defendant applied to the railroad agent for leave to examine the oranges, and that the railroad agent refused to permit the examination upon the ground that the bill of lading did not authorize it. The remaining testimony is somewhat conflicting. That of the plaintiff tends to show that, on the evening of the 7th, the day of arrival of the fruit, the defendant notified W. H. Jones, the agent of the shipper, of the arrival of the fruit, that he had applied to the railroad agent to examine the fruit and had been refused, and that he was anxious to get the fruit. The agent, Jones, then stated he would get permission, and the evidence shows that Jones telegraphed immediately to the shipper, and that on the next day, the 8th of May, he received permission, and offered to the defendant permission to examine the fruit, and offered to turn it over to him, and that defendant refused to inspect the fruit or to take it, because "he was not allowed to examine it when he wanted to do so." The defendant's testimony tended to show that the offer of the agent, Jones, to permit the examination, was made on the 10th of May, and that the defendant had made other arrangements by that time. There was evidence tending to show that oranges at that season of the year would keep two or three weeks, and that offered by defendant tended to show that oranges at that season of the year were in danger of rotting unless sold and used quickly. The bill of lading was attached to a check drawn on the defendant for the purchase money through a bank at Birmingham. The evidence is sufficiently stated to test the correctness of the ruling of the court upon the charges given, and the refusal to charge as requested. The purchaser was not compelled to pay the purchase money, and thereby secure a delivery of the bill of lading and fruit before exercising his right, under his contract, to inspect the fruit. We are clearly of the opinion, however, that if he had pursued this course merely to get control of the car or goods, so as to make the inspection, the payment of the purchase money, under such circumstances and for this purpose, would not have been a waiver of the right to examine and reject the fruit if it failed to correspond with the quality purchased. When goods of a certain quality are to be shipped from a distance, and delivered at a designated place, subject to inspection by the buyer, and no time is fixed by the contract within which they are to be delivered, or the right of inspection to be exercised, it is understood the law says that a reasonable time is allowed for the delivery, and a reasonable time after their arrival is allowed to the buyer within which he must make the inspection. What is a reasonable time depends upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case, to be found by the jury. Benj. Sales, p. 519; Pierson v. Crooks, 115 N. Y. 539, 22 N. E. Rep. 349; Diversy v. Kellogg, 92 Amer. Dec. 154, 44 Ill. 114. After the buyer refused to examine or accept the goods, the plaintiff was under no obligation to continue for an indefinite time to insist upon the acceptance of the fruit by the buyer. As we construe the charges given for the plaintiff when applied to the evidence, they assert the law correctly. The charge requested by the defendant asserts the proposition that if, upon the arrival of the fruit, the railroad company then denied the right of examination to defendant, such refusal on the part of the railroad gave him the right to reject the fruit. We do not understand, from the contract as stated in the evidence, that it was incumbent on the shipper to provide in the bill of lading permission to the buyer to inspect the fruit on its arrival, or that the common carrier, the agent of the shipper, had authority to grant or refuse the inspection. It was the duty of the shipper, after its arrival, within a reasonable time, to see that the buyer had the opportunity, as provided in the contract, to inspect the fruit, and it was also the duty of the buyer within such reasonable time to exercise the right. If the shipper himself, or his agent, Jones, had denied the right and refused the inspection, or had not provided for the inspection within a reasonable time, the buyer would have been under no duty to have repeated the demand to inspect the fruit. If such had been proven, the buyer would have been at liberty to regard the contract as rescinded. The charge refused asserts no such proposition. As a matter of law, it bases the right to reject the fruit and avoid the contract upon the bare refusal of the railroad company to permit the inspection. When referred to the evidence, the charge is also misleading, conceding that, as an abstract proposition, it was correct. It utterly ignores all the evidence which tends to show that, after the refusal by the railroad company, the defendant notified Jones, the agent of the shipper, that he was anxious to get the fruit, and desired to inspect it, and the statement of the agent in reply, that he would telegraph the shipper for the authority, to which the defendant made no objection. If the jury believed this phase of the evidence, it tends to show that the buyer waived any right to rescind the purchase which he might have claimed on account of the refusal of the railroad to permit the inspection.

We find no error in the record. Affirmed.

ROTHENBERG et al. v. BRADLEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Mississippi. Dec. 14, 1891.)

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—PREFERENCES—CONSTRUCTIVE FRAUD.

1. Where, in a suit to set aside an assignment for the benefit of creditors, the deed appears valid upon its face, but evidence aliunde discloses facts which will operate to hinder and delay creditors, this is sufficient to avoid the deed in toto, without proof of an actual covinous intent.

2. Where an assignment for the benefit of the creditors of a partnership prefers a claim for taxes due on real estate owned by the individual partners, it will, at the instance of creditors, be set aside as a fraud upon their rights.

3. Upon the execution of an assignment for the benefit of firm creditors, one of the partners retained insurance money from the firm assets on the ground that the burned building which produced the fund was his individual property. The building had been occupied by the firm; the policies were in the name of, and the premiums had been paid by, the firm; and, in the proof of loss, it was stated that the firm owned the building, and a portion of the insurance money had been used, before the assignment, in paying firm debts. Held, that the retention of the balance of the insurance money was a sufficient cause for setting the assignment aside as a fraud upon creditors.

4. It is not a fraud upon creditors for a firm about to make a general assignment to pay the amount of an outstanding bona fide note to its accommodation maker, if the latter assumes payment, and induces its holder to release the firm.

Appeal from chancery court, Madison county; H. C. CONN, Chancellor.

Bill in equity by Marks Rothenberg & Co. and others against N. H. & R. L. Bradley to set aside an assignment for the benefit of creditors. Decree for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Nugent & McWillie, H. Peyton, E. E. Baldwin, and Brame & Alexander, for appellants. Calhoon & Green, for appellees.

COOPER, J. On the 25th day of February, 1891, N. H. & R. L. Bradley, a commercial firm, made an assignment of the partnership assets for the payment of partnership creditors, with preferences. The conveyance purports to convey all the partners' property. The present bill was exhibited by certain creditors of the firm, attacking the assignment as fraudulent. These facts are relied upon to invalidate it: Some weeks prior to the assignment the firm was indebted to James, Lawson & Gordon in about the sum of $4,000. These creditors held as collateral security certain notes and accounts, but were pressing for other security. In this condition of affairs, it was agreed that Mrs. A. H. Bradley should execute her note to James, Lawson & Gordon, and secure the same by a mortgage of her farm, and that the firm of N. H. & R. L. Bradley should indorse the note. This was intended only as a temporary security, and Mrs. Bradley and her property were to be released as soon as other financial arrangements could be made by the firm. A few weeks after this the store of N. H. & R. L. Bradley, at Flora, with its contents, was destroyed by fire. The property was insured, and some $3,000 was collected from the insurance policies; and the firm, failing to make any satisfactory arrangements, determined to make an assignment. About the 20th of February, R. L. Bradley drew from the bank in which it had been deposited the insurance money, and sent by express to A. H. Bradley the sum of —— dollars. A. H. Bradley, acting for his wife, went to James, Lawon & Gordon with the money, and arranged with this firm for the discharge of the firm of N. H. & R. L. Bradley, by agreeing that his wife would assume the payment of the debt absolutely, and that her property, which had been mortgaged, should stand as security therefor. James, Lawson & Gordon thereupon surrendered to the firm of N. H. & R. L. Bradley the collaterals which they had held for the debt, erased the names of these parties from the note of Mrs. A. H. Bradley, and agreed to look solely to her for the payment of the debt. This transaction furnishes one of the grounds upon which the validity of the deed is assailed. Of the debts mentioned in the assignment, among the preferred claims, is one to R. J. Harding for about $294. The evidence discloses that the greater part of this claim arose in this way: The members of the firm of N. H. & R. L. Bradley owned certain lands and personal property, upon which taxes for the year 1890 were due and unpaid. Some weeks before the assignment was made, the firm wrote to Mr. Harding, who was the sheriff and tax collector of Hinds county, directing him to draw upon it for these taxes. In accordance with this request the sheriff drew upon the firm, and attached the tax receipts to the draft. The draft was presented and payment refused, and thereupon the draft and receipts were returned to Harding, who destroyed them, and advertised the property for sale. It does not appear that the assignors knew that the lands had been so advertised, or that there remained sufficient time for the sheriff to do so. The supposed debt to Harding, arising from these facts, was, as we have stated, among those preferred. Another attack arises from these facts: The store at Flora, in which the firm transacted business, was the individual property of N. H. Bradley. It was insured in the name of the firm, and the premiums paid by it. In making proofs of the loss, it was stated that the firm owned the store, but before the policy was paid the adjuster of the insurance company discovered the fact that the title was in N. H. Bradley. The company, however, waived defense on this ground, and paid the amount of the policy to the firm. A portion of the insurance money arising from the policy on the store was used in discharging the debt to James, Lawson & Gordon; but there remained of it about $290, which was in hand at the time of the execution of the assignment. Because of the ownership of the building by him, this fund was treated as the property of N. H. Bradley; and the money remaining on hand arising from the policy was handed to him by R. L. Bradley, and was by N. H. Bradley kept, and not delivered to the assignee. These are the principal facts upon which the assignment is sought to be annulled.

It is sufficient to say in reference to the transaction between the firm of James, Lawson & Gordon and Mrs. A. H. Bradley that nothing appears from which an inference of fraud is fairly to be drawn. The money was applied in the discharge of a debt due by the firm; and the fact that it was not actually paid over to James, Lawson & Gordon, and by them returned to Mrs. Bradley, is immaterial. The result is the same, and, since the thing done was lawful, no injury could accrue to any creditor by reason of the method pursued.

The effect of the preference given to R. J. Harding for the payment of the taxes upon the property of the members of the firm, and of the retention by N. H. Bradley of a part of the insurance money, may be considered together. They are of like character, being in the one case an appropriation of firm assets to the payment of the debts of the individual members, and in the other a retention by one of the assignors of a part of the firm assets.

It is argued by the appellees' counsel that no objection can be taken to the assignment on its face; that, so far as thereby appears, no fraud is shown, nor anything condemned by law; that the objectionable facts are shown by evidence dehors the instrument, and that under such circumstances the question is whether there was a fraudulent intent in fact on the part of the assignors, which is to be determined by a consideration of all the circumstances under which the assignment was made; and that an honest mistake of law or of fact, so shown, ought not to vitiate the deed. In other words, that where the court is not confined to a mere inspection and construction of the deed its validity is to be determined by the existence or nonexistence of a fraudulent purpose on the part of the grantors, and that a merely unlawful provision, disclosed by evidence aliunde the deed, should not affect it as a whole, but that it should be upheld save as to such provision. Two questions are presented by the inquiry: First, whether the intent which is the subject of investigation is the personal intent of the assignor, or the technical intent of the statute against fraudulent conveyances; and, second, whether the intent, if found, as matter of fact, by evidence outside the deed, is in any respect different from the intent discovered by an inspection of the deed itself.

Mr. Bigelow, in his work on Frauds, (volume 2, p. 374,) in discussing the question whether it is necessary to show a personal fraudulent purpose of the debtors to invalidate a conveyance, the necessary effect of which is to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, says: "The truth appears to be that to have taken the statute literally would in most cases have nullified the law; and accordingly, in all the great range and number of cases relating to the statutes against fraudulent conveyances, there is hardly to be found, apart from one or two well-defined situations, a single specific authority, which would be generally considered as of weight, for the proposition that the 'intent' of the statute is a personal intent. It is true, indeed, that proof of such intent will always make a case under the statute; and it is everyday practice for the courts to receive evidence for and against such intent. But in most cases the effect, whatever the purpose, of evidence of a personal intention to defraud, is only to strengthen a case that, if sustained, might have been made without such evidence." Mr. Burrill, on the other hand, contends that the true rule of construction is such that "in order to bring an assignment by a debtor within the statute of fraudulent conveyances, (at least in its original and unabridged form, and in reference to its professed title,) on the ground of an intent to hinder and delay, there must be an intent to delay and hinder actually entertained by the debtor, and not only an actual intent, but a covinous and fraudulent one. But there is a class of cases establishing a very different rule of construction to the statute in some states, and constituting there the law of the land." Burrill, Assignm. § 330. In this state, in a line of decisions beginning with Bank v. Douglass, 11 Smedes & M. 469, it has uniformly been held that where, upon the face of an instrument, an unlawful purpose appears, the law will impute to the grantor a fraudulent intent, and avoid the deed, upon the maxim that one must be held to have intended the consequences of an act done by him. It is admitted by counsel for appellees that if, upon the face of the instrument, it appeared that the assignors had devoted the partnership property to the payment of their individual debts, or that a part of the property purporting to have been conveyed by it was in fact reserved, the assignment would be annulled. But it is argued that this result would follow because the law would impute under such circumstances to the assignors, from the face of the instrument, a covinous and fraudulent intent. In other words, that the personal intent is that which in all cases must be discovered, and that it must be a fraudulent one to avoid the deed. We do not so understand the decisions. An act otherwise lawful may be invalidated because of the fraudulent personal intent of the party, but an act in and of itself unlawful cannot be made lawful because of the absence of actual fraudulent intent on the part of the actor. Where the intent is a fraudulent one, and the consequences of the act injurious, the fraudulent intent avoids it. Where the act is unlawful, though the actual fraudulent intent is absent, it is avoided because it is unlawful. Nightingale v. Harris, 6 R. I. 321, the case often referred to as supporting the proposition that the fraud which will vitiate an assignment must be the intentional fraud of the assignor, has been practically overruled in the more recent case of Gardner v. Bank, 13 R. I. 155.

It is evident that the nature and effect of an act cannot be changed or controlled by the character of the evidence by which it is proved. An unlawful act proved by the face of the deed is merely an unlawful act. An unlawful purpose proved by extraneous evidence is not the less unlawful. The question is not how the fact shall be proved, but it is, what effect does it have when proved? And so are the authorities. Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 424; Gere v. Murray, 6 Minn. 305, (Gil. 213;) Sturdivant v. Davis, 9 Ired. 365; Ranlett v. Blodgett, 17 N. H. 298; Gardner v. McEwen, 19 N. Y. 123; Coolidge v. Melvin, 42 N. H. 510; Clow v. Woods, 5 Serg. & R. 275; Gibson v. Love, 4 Fla. 217; Putnam v. Osgood, 52 N. H. 148; Orton v. Orton, 7 Or. 478.

It might be sufficient for the disposition of this case to say that the reservation by N. H. Bradley of a part of the proceeds of the policy of insurance, which was the property of the firm, was sufficient to avoid the assignment, because it was an act done at the time, and as a part, of the assignment, the necessary consequence of which was to prevent the assignment from operating upon the property according to its professed purpose; but we are also of opinion that the preference to Harding for the taxes due upon the property of the individual members of the firm was a reservation of a benefit to them in the assigned property, and would alone have the same effect. In truth, the assignors owed Harding nothing, and, unless it be that this preference was a reservation of a benefit to the members of the firm, it was the preferring of a fictitious debt, and that would also avoid the deed. Bump, Fraud. Conv. p. 376, states the law to be "that an appropriation of the property to the payment of debts not owing by the assignor, nor contracted on his account, or for a larger sum than is due to the prejudice of his creditors, is evidence of fraud. This will not, however, make the assignment void unless the assignee participates in the fraud. No creditor is concluded by taking under the assignment from impeaching any of the debts attempted to be secured by it, and showing fraud and collusion in such of them as may stand in his way, and the payment of which would operate to his prejudice. The impeached claim is extinguished by the fraud, and the share that would otherwise have been appropriated to its payment sinks into the residuum for the benefit of those who are entitled to the residuum by the terms of the deed." For this statement of the law he cites Mackintosh v. Corner, 33 Md. 598; Hempstead v. Johnston, 18 Ark. 123; Hardcastle v. Fisher, 24 Mo. 70; Harris v. Degraffenreid, 11 Ired. 89; Pinneo v. Hart, 30 Mo. 561; Nightingale v. Harris, 6 R. I. 321; Starr v. Dugan, 22 Md. 58; Woodward v. Marshall, 22 Pick. 468. Mr. Waite, in his work on Fraudulent Conveyances, (section 228,) makes a similar statement, relying upon some of these cases, as does also Burrill on Assignments, (section 355,) citing, in addition, the cases from Alabama. The Missouri court holds in accordance with the text of these writers. Maryland and Massachusetts have statutes on the subject by which their decisions seem to be controlled. We have been unable to find the statutes of these states. But in Woodward v. Marshall, 22 Pick. 468, it is held that "fraud on the part of an assignor, not participated in by the assignee, would not defeat the rights of the creditors to have the trust fund administered according to the statute; the court saying it is not one of the grounds mentioned in the statute for invalidating the discharge of the debtor." In Arkansas and Alabama it is also held that an assignment, though fraudulently made, is not void unless the assignee participated in the fraud. Hill v. Shrygley, 51 Ark. 56, 9 S. W. Rep. 845; Trussl v. Davidson, 90 Ala. 359, 7 South. Rep. 812; Harris v. Degraffenreid, 11 Ired. 89, was a controversy between a creditor and a bona fide purchaser from a trustee holding under a fraudulent deed, the fraud not appearing on the face of the instrument; and it was held that the purchaser got title. This case consists with our own decision of Covington v. Mayers, 62 Miss. 730. In Stone v. Marshall, 7 Jones, (N. C.) 300, it was held that the insertion of a fictitious debt avoided the assignment, upon the ground that the debts intended to be paid by the assignment formed the consideration for the conveyance, and that where a part of the consideration of a deed is against law the whole is void. Stone v. Marshall was overruled in Morris v. Pearson, 79 N. C. 253, upon the ground that the debts mentioned in an assignment for the payment of which it is made do not form the consideration of the conveyance, but that the nominal consideration recited in the instrument was its real consideration. On the other hand, it is held in Pennsylvania, New York, Kansas, Tennessee, and probably Kentucky, that the insertion of a simulated claim avoids the deed. Irwin v. Keen, 3 Whart. 347; Bank v. Wood, 45 Hun, 411; Jacobs v. Remsen, 36 N. Y. 668; Livermore v. Northrop, 44 N. Y. 107; Kayser v. Heavenrich, 5 Kan. 324; Lockhard v. Brodie, 1 Tenn. Ch. 384; Peacock v. Tompkins, Meigs, 317; Gibbs v. Thompson, 7 Humph. 179; Lehmer v. Herr, 1 Duv. 360.

The conflict in these authorities springs somewhat from the different points of view in which they are considered by the courts. If the assignee in the deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors is a purchaser for value, or, if because of the debts due to creditors, for the payment of which the assignment is made, their rights only are to be considered, it would seem that fraud of the grantor, not participated in or known by them, should not affect the validity of the conveyance; and if one or more of the claims to be paid are fraudulent the assignment should be upheld in favor of those whose debts are just. But with us the assignee is considered as a volunteer. He pays nothing for the conveyance, nor is the condition of any creditor changed by reason of its execution. If the conveyance is upheld, their claims are to be paid out of the property assigned; but, if it is avoided, they occupy no worse position than before. They lose nothing by reason of the attempt to prefer them. The whole effect of annulling an assignment is to disappoint the will of the assignor, which ought not to be effectuated if his purpose is an unlawful one. The conveyance is, in any event, valid so far as he is concerned, and cannot be assailed by him. But creditors who do not assent to it ought not to be precluded from pursuing their legal remedy, and subjecting the property assigned as the property of their debtor, unless some right superior to theirs has intervened. Assignments with preferences do not commend themselves to the courts, because of the inequality produced among a class of persons, each having an equal equity to a participation in the estate of the debtor. But since the law, by reason of the right of the debtor to control his own property, permits him to prefer one creditor to another, this inequality, alone, is not sufficient to condemn an assignment. Where, however, the power is exercised, it must be confined within legal limits, and no infringement upon the rights of creditors can be permitted. It is to be noted that the authorities cited by the text writers in support of the proposition that the insertion of a simulated claim does not avoid the deed are by courts in states in which, either by statute or by decision, it is held that the fraud of the assignor alone does not avoid the deed; North Carolina and Missouri only holding that the assignee is not a bona fide purchaser, and yet that the simulated claim is not ground of invalidating the assignment. We cannot assent to the correctness of these decisions. A creditor whose claim is not preferred should not be subjected to the additional claim of disproving the validity of preferred claims, recognized by the assignor, before he can reach the property or participate in its proceeds. The law gives and must preserve to a creditor the right of proceeding against his debtor to subject his property to the debt. He is not concerned about the claim of other creditors, and their existence interposes no obstacle to his subjecting the debtor's estate. The mere interposition by the debtor of a false claim, to which priority of right is by his act given over real creditors, operates necessarily to hinder and delay them, and probably to defraud them. They must, in any event, turn aside from the pursuit of their debtor or his estate, and litigate with the fictitious creditor, and are thereby hindered and delayed, or must submit to the unlawful appropriation by the debtor of a part of his estate to such simulated debt, by which they would be defrauded. An insolvent debtor, for the reason that he is the owner of his property notwithstanding his indebtedness, may appropriate his estate to the payment of any just debts due by him; and, since each creditor is justly entitled to the whole sum due him, no legal wrong is done to any creditor by the payment in full of the demands of others, to the exclusion of his own, if the debtor's estate is insufficient to pay all he owes. It is upon this principle that the right of an insolvent to make a preferential assignment rests, but the debtor may not pass beyond the limit fixed by law, and apply his estate to the benefit of himself or of others, whom he does not owe, to the injury of creditors; for this is, in and of itself, a fraud upon them, regardless of the secret purpose of the debtor.

Much of the apparent inconsistency in judicial utterances arises from the fact that the word "fraud" is sometimes used as though applicable only to an act done with a corrupt or covinous intent, whereas, in legal terminology, it has a much broader meaning and application. Voluntary conveyances have been in very many cases held to be fraudulent as against creditors, where there was an absence of any other evidence of a fraudulent intent on the part of the grantor, other than the fact and character of the conveyance and the insolvency of the grantor. No case can be found in which the absence of a personal fraudulent purpose has given validity to a voluntary conveyance by an insolvent debtor of his whole estate; and it would be manifestly immaterial whether the character of the conveyance appeared on its face, or should be proved to be voluntary by evidence debors the instrument. It is unnecessary to express any opinion as to what would be the effect where, by honest mistake of fact, reasonably occurring, the debtor has unintentionally included as a recognized claim against him one having no existence. It will be time enough to consider that when presented. In any event, the courts could not relieve against such mistake save under such circumstances as would warrant reformation of the instrument according to the practice in chancery. Authority, however, is not wanting for the proposition that where a mistake is made in such an assignment, which under other circumstances would be corrected by a court of equity, the court will not interfere to correct it because of the strong equity of the general creditors, but will leave it to stand or fall as executed by the party. BRADY v. BRADY. (No. 10,929.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; ALBERT VOORHIES, Judge.

Action by Mrs. T. J. Brady for a separation from her husband's bed and board, and to enjoin him from alienating the community property. From a judgment for plaintiff, allowing her alimony, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellant. Henry P. Dart, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. The plaintiff sued the defendant for a separation of bed and board; also for an injunction restraining the defendant from alienating the property of the community. The defendant filed the plea of general denial. A short time after, the plaintiff by rule prayed to be allowed alimony, as she was without means of support. After legal hearing, she recovered alimony, to be paid monthly by her husband. From this interlocutory judgment allowing her alimony the defendant has appealed. On appeal the attorney representing the plaintiff filed a motion to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that it is premature, and from an interlocutory judgment, and that the court is without jurisdiction ratione materia. The appellant also files a motion to dismiss, and annexed to it a copy of the judgment dismissing plaintiff's suit in the district court. Both the appellant and the appellee move to dismiss the appeal. It is therefore ordered that the appeal be dismissed, at appellant's costs.

STATE v. TOWNSEND. (No. 11,024.)

CRIMINAL DOCKET—SETTING CASES FOR TRIAL.

In the absence of any special rule of court fixing cases for trial when reached on the docket, the defendant in a criminal case cannot be ruled to trial without a previous setting of his case, or other proper notice giving him time to subpœna his witnesses.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, parish of Richland; R. P. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Conviction of Tom Townsend. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Todd & Todd and Fergus Kernan, for appellant. Walter H. Rogers, Atty. Gen., for the State.

FENNER, J. The bill of exceptions recites, in substance, that prior to proceeding with the trial, counsel for defendant represented to the court that a material witness, residing in the parish, and without whom he could not go to trial, was absent, and that, although he had issued a subpœna for him, there had not been time to serve it; that the case had just been called, and that there had been no previous setting of the case for trial; that he was entitled to time to have his witness served; and that the granting of a short time would be sufficient. The judge overruled the application, and proceeded with the trial. The judge, in his statement appended to the bill, does not contradict or traverse any statement therein contained, but simply based his action on defendant's lack of diligence. Both the judge a qua and the attorney general seem to treat this as a mere ordinary application for a continuance on the ground of absence of a witness. If it were such, it would not be entitled to a moment's consideration, not being supported by any affidavit of the evidence or other necessary facts. We regard it in a much more serious light,—as an objection to going to trial on the ground that the case was called without having been previously set for trial, and without the allowance of any time whatever to the defendant for the summoning of his witnesses. It is true that this court has held that, "where the court had adopted a special rule authorizing such a mode of procedure, a case may be called on being reached on the regular docket before it has been fixed for trial." State v. Lartigue, 29 La. Ann. 642. The judge does not advise us that any such rule has been adopted in his court, and we cannot presume it. The statements of the bill, approved by the judge's signature, strongly suggest the contrary. The adoption of such a rule would have operated all needful notice to defendant, and would have put him under the necessity of diligence to be ready with his witnesses when the case was reached upon the docket. But certainly defendant is entitled to some kind of notice as to when the trial of his case will be taken up. Under the showing made by this bill, we think the objection was well taken, and the judge erred in overruling it. It is therefore ordered that the verdict and judgment be annulled and set aside, and that the case be remanded for further proceedings according to law.

STATE ex rel. CITY OF NEW ORLEANS v. ST. CHARLES ST. R. CO. (No. 10,921.)

STREET RAILROADS — STREET REPAIRS — MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT.

1. The St. Charles Street Railroad Company, under its contract with the city of New Orleans, was to plank Baronne street from specified points.

2. The city of New Orleans having caused the contract to pave this street between the said specified points to be adjudicated to the Rosetta Gravel Paving & Improvement Company, and the defendant company having submitted propositions which have been acted upon to pay part of the cost of graveling the street, in lieu of the performance of its paving contract, the city must rescind its action in the matter of the said adjudication and of cost, if there be cause, before suit can be maintained, to enforce the original contract.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; THOMAS C. W. ELLIS, Judge.

Suit by the city of New Orleans against the St. Charles Street Railroad Company to compel it to plank a certain street along which defendant's tracks are laid. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel L. Gilmore, Asst. City Atty., for appellant. Harry H. Hall, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. The relator sues to compel the defendant to plank Baronne street, alleging that the defendant bound itself by contract to plank all mud streets through which its tracks shall pass, with the exception of Dryades street. The defendant, answering, says that it is ready to comply with its contract by planking Baronne street from Howard avenue to a point about equidistant between Sixth and Seventh streets, being that part of Baronne street occupied alone by its tracks; but that the property holders objected, and presented a petition to the common council for permission to have Baronne street paved with Rosetta gravel; that the city comptroller advertised for sealed proposals to pave the said street with said gravel; that the mayor was authorized to contract with the Rosetta Gravel Paving & Improvement Company to pave the said street, and that the city has by its several acts made it impossible for the defendant company to comply with the alleged contract. Judgment was rendered dismissing plaintiff's suit as in case of nonsuit, from which the relator prosecutes this appeal.

The petition of the property holders on Baronne street states that the defendant company has consented to pay the amount that would be required for laying a plank road on the said street. It is also shown that a committee reported to the common council that the defendant company has generally complied with its contracts, except in so far as relates to the planking of Baronne street, and this "default the company are hardly responsible for, as the property owners objected to the planking, and failed to agree upon a substitute. The question is now practically settled, however; the property owners having petitioned for a general gravel pavement, the railroad contributing to the expense of same what it would cost to plank the street." Subsequent to the contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant company the right to gravel this street was adjudicated to the Rosetta Paving & Improvement Company. The defendant company having acquiesced in this adjudication, and promised to pay the cost of planking the street, instead of actually planking it under the original contract, a difference has arisen about the cost to be paid by the defendant. The following is an extract from a letter of the president of the defendant company, addressed to the city surveyor: "That the St. Charles Street Railroad Company is willing to pay in full discharge and satisfaction of its obligation to plank Baronne street, as aforesaid, a sum equal to 50 cts. per superficial square yard for each such yard of gravel laid on Baronne street between its track and gutter. That it will expend five cents for each superficial square yard in repairing said street," etc. Several witnesses testify that this is less than should be paid. The question remains undetermined. Were this cost agreed upon or fixed, no reason is stated why the street should not be graveled in compliance with the ordinance on the subject. All parties concerned favor the change proposed from plank to gravel, and have in due form expressed a preference for the latter. The question to be settled (it seems to be the only cause of disagreement) is as to the cost which should be paid by the defendant, to be applied towards graveling the street. Although evidence was admitted on the subject, that issue is not before us for decision. Unless the action of the council be rescinded for cause, or issue be presented to the court and evidence adduced showing an unwillingness of the defendant company to comply with its obligation, necessity for judicial action does not arise. We agree with the district judge that the action is premature, and that, until the question of the gravel contract be settled, and the right under the contract adjudicated to the gravel company determined, the suit is premature.

Judgment affirmed, at appellant's costs.

OLDSTEIN v. FIREMEN'S BLDG. ASS'N et al.
(No. 10,899.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 4, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

ADJACENT LAND OWNERS—PARTY WALLS—AIR AND LIGHT—ORDINANCE.

1. Merely building a wall by one of two adjacent owners, and placing the same in equal proportions on each lot, does not make it a party wall in absence of agreement to that effect.

2. The owner of the lot adjacent has no right to have the windows in the wall closed before he makes it a wall in common.

3. Servitude of light and of air through windows in a wall cannot be acquired by prescription against the owner of the lot adjacent, unless he is able to assert the right to have them closed.

4. The owner of the adjacent lot, that on which servitude is claimed, has the right to use, to enjoy, and to dispose of his property.

5. He who builds either above or below his soil, adjacent to his neighbor's property, must build it in a perpendicular line.

6. He may build as high as he pleases, although it may occasion inconvenience, provided the building does not cause damage.

7. Damage must be proven to enable a private individual to invoke the benefit of a city ordinance as to the moving of wooden buildings within certain limits. Inconvenience, although great, will not suffice.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Suit by Abraham Oldstein against the Firemen's Building Association and others to recover damages for obstructing his light. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified.

Moise & Titche and W. B. Lancaster, for appellants. Moise & Cahn, for appellee.

BREAUX, J. Plaintiff is the owner of an improved lot in this city, which he purchased from Mrs. Emma Beers. The building improvement is a two-story dwelling house constructed years ago. Witnesses residing in the neighborhood, advanced in years, did not know when it was built. They saw it in their youth, where it now is. One half of the wall was constructed on the lot which now belongs to the defendant. It is not proven that any of defendant's authors contributed in any manner to the building of this wall. There are eight windows in this wall,—four in the first story, and the others in the second. Four of these windows have blinds opening and closing on their hinges. The defendant bought the adjacent lot, on which the said wall partly rests, from the Firemen's Building Association. The structures on defendant's property were, at the time of his purchase, two small houses,—one an old frame cottage, fronting on the street, with one of its side walls extending from the banquet to the front corner of plaintiff's house, on or near the boundary line of the two premises; the other was in the rear of his lot. The shutters of defendant's cottage opened on plaintiff's flower garden, in front of his house. The defendant had 18 inches cut off the western side of the building, (the side adjacent to plaintiff's lot,) and reduced its width by that number of inches. His shutters no longer open on plaintiff's lot. The space between the two corners of plaintiff's building and defendant's cottages, separated by 18 inches cut off, as just mentioned, was closed by a wall about 7 feet high. Another building—the one in the rear of the lot—was moved by defendant against the wall of plaintiff, leaving a space along the wall between this moved building and defendant's cottage in front. This space was afterwards taken up with a new structure against plaintiff's wall and connecting defendant's cottage with the said moved building. There is no window in that wall opposite this part of the building. The uprights of the building touch the wall of the plaintiff. These uprights average three to four inches in thickness. Laths were nailed thereon, and afterwards the inside wall was plastered. This part of the building has no wall on the outside, other than plaintiff's. The frame of each of the defendant's buildings is self-supporting. Four of the windows are almost entirely closed by the wall of defendant's building. That part not closed by the wall was closed by the defendant with boards. Defendant's buildings are covered with slate. Where the roof touches the wall there is a coat of plaster serving as a valley or conduit to the rain falling on the roof. A shed was constructed in the rear of the last building, one of the walls of which completely obstructed two windows. The two remaining windows were closed at first with boards; afterwards screens were erected. Plaintiff's vendor states as a witness that the closing of the windows darkened the apartments of the house and caused dampness. It was her reason for selling, she says. A skylight was opened. It did not give sufficient light, another witness testifies, and it is necessary at times to light the gas in the kitchen. They also testify that the value of the property was depreciated; the danger from fire was increased.

Pleadings: Plaintiff alleges that the wall is a party wall, and that the defendant has no right to close his windows, which, during more than 30 years, had given access to light and air; that his possession and that of his antecedent owners entitles him to these windows; that the defendant has annoyed and harassed him by depriving him of light and air. For damage to his property, deprivation of light and air, and the value of the half of the wall, he claims $4,600. The defendant excepted to plaintiff's petition on the ground that his allegations were contradictory, and his demands inconsistent, and that he should be made to elect one or the other. In compliance with the court's ruling, plaintiff, after having reserved a bill of exception to the ruling, elected to abandon the demand for the value of the wall, and vested his case on its being a wall in common. The defendant filed a general denial, and, in addition, alleged that his acts on his premises were in pursuance of his legal rights as owner. The plaintiff also filed a special plea of immemorial possession, and pleaded the prescription of 10, 20, and 30 years. He also filed a plea in estoppel, based on defendant's allegation in his answer that, in acting as he had, he pursued his legal right as owner. The judge of the district court maintained the pleas of prescription and estoppel, and ordered that the hindrances be removed, and recognized a servitude of light and air as described in the petition.

The owner of a lot in a city who first builds in a place not surrounded by walls may rest one half of his wall on the land of his neighbor. Civil Code, art. 675. There is conflict between the article just referred to and article 505, Civil Code. Under the latter, the ownership of the soil carries with it the improvement. Under the former, he has the right to erect a construction on the owner's property, and to remain the owner until his neighbor may choose to make it a wall in common. Built at his expense, he is the owner. Jeannin v. De Blanc, 11 La. Ann. 465; Lavergne v. Lacoste, 26 La. Ann. 507. In each of the cases just referred to, the wall which was the subject of litigation was built at the individual expense of one of the neighbors, and rested upon the line of division of the properties adjacent one to the other. In each it was held that the wall was owned by the proprietor at whose expense it was built. The case principally relied upon by the plaintiff is not similar. The two buildings were separated by a wall in common. It was presumed common for the reason that each building on the respective lots rested on the whole wall. It was decided that the flues in this wall also were in common, as well as the wall used by both proprietors. Weill v. Baker, 39 La. Ann. 1102, 3 South. Rep. 361. In the pending case, prior to moving the buildings, as before stated, there was no structure against or near the wall. The fact that this wall separated defendant's lot from plaintiff's houses does not make it a wall in common. Every wall which separates a yard and garden in a city shall be presumed to be common. Rev. Civil Code, art. 677. This article corresponds to article 653, Code Nap. Baudry de Lacantinerie, commenting upon the latter, says: "The wall which separates a house from a garden or lot is not presumed a wall in common, (mitoyen.) The law reads 'between buildings,' and between inclosure and garden, and not between a building and inclosure and garden." Volume 1, p. 884. "The owner of the inclosure or of the garden has not the same interest in constructing the wall as the proprietor of the house." Id. He cannot be forced to surrender part of his land, and made to pay the cost and value of the wall, although of no service to him in building. The ownership remains in the one who has had it constructed, until the owner of the adjacent lot makes it a wall in common. "The defendant contends that until the wall is made common it is her exclusive property. * * * It appears to me that view of the case is correct." 11 La. Ann. 465. It was decided in said case that plaintiff did not have a right of action to have the window closed in a wall which he did not choose to make a party wall. It is obvious that, in order that prescription may be acquired, the owner must be able to assert his right. "The wall belonged to plaintiff in full ownership until the owner of the contiguous lot should pay for half of it; and this right would exist so long as that wall stood." 26 La. Ann. 507. It is in some respects different under the French Code.

In a case in which the facts were somewhat similar to those in the case at bar the plea of immemorial possession was maintained. The grounds were that the owners of the adjacent estate, before the wall had been made one in common, had the right to have the windows closed before making it a party wall. "They (the said parties) permitted a servitude to be established which they might have prevented." "Legislation and jurisprudence have established that servitude can be acquired by prescription." Montagnac v. Montagu, Cassation, 1869, p. 387. In Jeannin v. De Blanc the reverse is decided: "The wall belongs exclusively to the party who built the wall." His right of action "remains in suspense until he may see proper to make it a wall in common." This decision is not the only authority. Under the Code of 1808 the proprietor of a wall, not in common, adjoining the estate of another, had the right to make windows, under certain restrictions. The articles conferring the right were not included in the Code of 1825. The reasons given for the suppression of those articles shows that it was not the intention to prohibit the openings in walls thus situated. "Nous avons cru devoir supprimer ces deux articles qui prescrirent au proprietaire d'un mur non-mitoyen, joignant immediatement l'heritage d'autrui, de n'y faire des ouvertures ou fenetres qu'a une certaine hauteur et avec des barreaux et a verre dormant. Nous avons pense que chacun doit etre le maitre de faire dans son bien, ce qui lui plait, et par consequent d'ouvrir dans son mur, telles fenetres que bon lui semble." Travaux Preparatoires, p. 73; Civil Code La. 1825. The question had been previously considered in this and other states, and the doctrine has since been followed in numerous well-considered cases. "The simplest rule, and that best suited to a country like ours, in which changes are continually taking place in the ownership and use of lands, is, that no right of the said character can be acquired, that is, the prescriptive right to light and air, without express grant of an interest in or covenant relating to the lands over which the right is claimed." Wait, Act. & Def. pp. 297, 295, and alia. The French text writers are equally as clear as to the right of the owner of the lot adjacent to build on his property. "The owner who has possessed during 30 years windows at a prohibited distance has acquired the right to conserve them. But has he, in addition, acquired the right to prevent the neighbor from constructing on his land buildings near enough to render the lights useless?" The answer of the commentator is in the negative. 1 Mourlon, p. 861. Equally as clear is 8 Laurent, p. 54: "Si, dans un mur joignant immediatement l'heritage d'autrui, il pratique des vues au lieu de jours, s'il les possede pendant trente ans, il aura recouvre la liberte de son heritage, la servitude legale de l'article 676 sera eteinte. Mais il n'aura acquis aucun droit sur l'heritage du voisin; celui-ci conserve, de son cote, la liberte de son heritage, il peut construire meme contre les fenetres de son voisin, sans etre tenu de respecter un pretendu droit de vue qui n'existe pas." The wall is not a party wall. The owner of the adjacent lot has not paid its cost, nor its value. His buildings were not erected against the wall to support any weight. The testimony gives rise to the immediate impression that defendant's buildings were constructed against the wall to close the windows, so as to prevent servants and children from prying upon the privacy of his dwelling and premises.

The plaintiff contends that it is a partition wall, in order, evidently, to establish a servitude of light. If we were to maintain plaintiff's contention that the wall is one in common, prescription would at most commence to run from the time the buildings were moved against the wall. This would not be of any service to his cause. The acquisition of the right would not have a retroactive effect. There was no estoppel on the part of the defendant. The allegation in his answer that he acted in pursuit of his right as owner, is not such an admission as makes it conclusive that the wall was common. The wall not being a party wall, the neighbor had no right to its use, and, without authority, to close the windows as was done. The plaintiff having alleged a party wall, and the defendant having denied, each manifestly against his interest, we treat the question as an original question, and base our conclusions on the testimony which establishes that it was not in common. "Generally a party is not estopped by assuming a petition forced upon him by the opposite party." 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 22; 1 Greenl. Ev. p. 34.

Plaintiff urges that a city ordinance has been violated, relating to the moving and remodeling of wooden buildings. Private individuals have no right of action unless they have personally suffered damages. The allegations with reference to damages were not proved, and plaintiff is therefore left without cause of complaint on account of the said violation. The additional danger from fire was not shown, nor any increase in the rate of insurance. No depreciation in the value of property was proved. The vendor to plaintiff says that, after the structures had been moved against the walls, she accepted $1,000 less than the price at which she had previously offered the property. This statement, uncorroborated by other testimony, does not establish the difference in the value of the property, which should be shown by direct reference to the value of the house before the moving and after, and not by what a vendor asked one day and determined to accept the next. "Ownership gives the right to use, to enjoy, one's property in the most unlimited manner not prohibited by law." Rev. Civil Code, art. 491; Id. art. 450. Plaintiff lastly argues that the city ordinance was not only violated, but that the defendant, in violating it, had concealed his breach of the law, and fixed matters so as to prevent an injunction. Our conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider this proposition at length. The defendant had no right to close windows as he did, and to build against and use his neighbor's wall as he did. Plaintiff had no right under said city ordinance, (actual damages to him not having been proven,) to prevent him from moving his buildings. The defendant has the right to make the wall one in common by paying half its value, or he can build as near to plaintiff's wall as he chooses, provided his structures do not touch his wall. The judgment appealed from is affirmed in so far as it orders that the boards nailed on the windows, and any of defendant's structures touching plaintiff's wall, be moved, and made not to touch it; also in so far as it orders the plaster serving as a valley or conduit for water to be taken off plaintiff's wall. It is amended by rejecting plaintiff's demand to have them moved away further than to prevent their touching plaintiff's wall. Judgment amended, and, as amended, affirmed, at appellee's costs.

CALDER et al. v. HIS CREDITORS. (No. 11,025.)

INSOLVENCY — PRACTICE — APPOINTMENT OF PROVISIONAL SYNDIC — SALE OF PROPERTY.

1. The general rule of our insolvent laws requires that the property surrendered shall be held intact during the pendency of proceedings for the election of a definitive syndic; and provisional syndics, when appointed, are not generally authorized to sell property, but are required to hold all the assets, and deliver them to the syndic.

2. But this general rule suffers exceptions in cases where, owing to the nature and situation of particular property, a sale is necessary to prevent its deterioration, and preserve its value for the benefit of all concerned; in which cases the sale may be sustained as a conservatory act, which the law expressly authorizes provisional syndics to perform.

3. It certainly requires a strong case to justify the sale of immovable property as a conservatory act; but in the case of a sugar plantation in course of cultivation, where it is admitted that the insolvent is without means to run it, that the abandonment of its cultivation would operate a great deterioration of value, and that its prompt sale is necessary for the interest of all concerned, and particularly when the first mortgage creditors to the probable value of the plantation and the provisional syndics concur in the facts and in the opinion of the advisability of the sale, the judge is vested with a legal discretion to order the sale as a conservatory act, and this court approves its exercise.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

The Whitney National Bank, as a creditor of D. R. Calder, seized his plantation, and advertised the same for sale. Pending the notice, he made a cession of his property under the insolvent law, and provisional syndics were appointed. The bank intervened, and took a rule on the syndics to show cause why the court should not order the plantation to be sold. From a judgment making the rule absolute and granting the order, the syndics appeal. Affirmed.

Horace E. Upton and Henry L. Lazarus, for appellants. White, Parlange & Saunders, for appellee Whitney Nat. Bank. Carroll & Carroll, for appellee Bank of Commerce, party in interest. Henry C. Miller, for appellee Canal Bank, party in interest.

FENNER, J. The Whitney National Bank is a creditor of D. R. Calder for $20,000, secured by first mortgage on the Orange Grove plantation. After fruitless efforts by the insolvent and the bank to effect a private sale of the plantation, the bank sued out executory process in the civil district court of this parish, under which the plantation was duly seized and advertised for sale to take place on March 19, 1892. On the 15th of February, 1892, Calder made, in the proceeding now before us, a cession of his property under the state insolvent law. Provisional syndics were duly appointed and qualified. Thereupon the bank intervened in the insolvent proceedings, and, representing the necessities and circumstances of the case as indicated in the agreed statement of facts which we reproduce further on, they took a rule upon the provisional syndics to show cause why the court should not make its order allowing the sale of the plantation to proceed under the order of seizure and sale as advertised, under the condition that the proceeds should be paid over to the syndics, and held by them as funds of the insolvency, subject to the same mortgages resting on the plantation, and to be distributed by them according to law. The syndics appeared, and showed cause against the rule on two grounds, viz.: (1) That, under the law, the court is without authority or power to grant the relief demanded. (2) That no legal order for the sale of the property referred to in said rule can be granted until a definitive syndic is elected herein, and the cession made by the insolvents accepted by their creditors. The case was submitted to the court under the following agreed statement of facts: "(1) The Whitney National Bank of New Orleans held and owned, and still holds and owns, the note of D. R. Calder, one of the above-named insolvents, for $20,000, dated March 30, 1889, payable one year from date, and payment extended to January 1, 1891. (2) The said above described note was secured by first mortgage on the Orange Grove plantation, in Lafourche parish, La., owned by said D. R. Calder, before H. N. Coulon, notary public in said parish of Lafourche, and duly recorded. Said mortgage contains the pact de non alienando. (3) On December 26, 1891, the said Whitney National Bank sued out executory process on the above-mentioned note and act of mortgage, in the suit entitled 'Whitney National Bank v. D. R. Calder,' No. 34,586 of the docket of the civil district court for the parish of Orleans, in which said parish said D. R. Calder was resident and domiciled at the time. (4) In said proceedings, after due notices and delays, the writ of seizure and sale issued and was placed in the hands of the sheriff of Lafourche parish for execution, and thereunder, after due notices and delays, the said sheriff seized, and then advertised for sale, according to law, the said Orange Grove plantation. (5) After the issuance of said writ and the seizure of said plantation, as above recited, the said John Calder & Co., and the said D. R. Calder, filed their petition making a cession of their property to their creditors, under the insolvent laws of Louisiana, in the proceedings hereinabove entitled. (6) The insolvents surrendered, as part of their assets, seven sugar plantations under cultivation, one of which was the said Orange Grove plantation. (7) The only funds surrendered by the insolvents, or since received by the provisional syndics, are seven thousand dollars, part of the proceeds of the crop of 1891, made on said sugar plantations, or on some of them, and now applicable to the privilege or ordinary creditors of the insolvents. (8) It will cost about $1,500 a month to cultivate and keep up the Orange Grove plantation from now until July, 1892. (9) If said Orange Grove plantation is not so cultivated and kept up, it will rapidly and largely deteriorate in value; the drainage will become obstructed with vegetation and earth; the labor will leave the place; the crop will be lost; and a heavy expenditure of money will be necessitated to restore the plantation to its present earning capacity and value, and in consequence of such deterioration the plantation will sell for much less than could be obtained for it now. (10) The opinion of persons who own or deal with sugar plantations is that they will not sell as advantageously later in the season as they would now; that, while the plantation might sell for a little more later on, it would not, in all probability, sell for as much more as would have been expended in cultivating and keeping it up; and if, in consequence of an unfavorable season, too much rain or too little, a crevasse, or visitation of worms, the crop did not look well, the plantation would probably sell for much less than it would bring now. (11) The syndics have not sufficient funds in the insolvency to cultivate and keep up all the plantations surrendered, even if they are permitted to use all the funds in the insolvency for that purpose. If they undertake to cultivate the places, they will be compelled to borrow money for that purpose; and, if the plantations should not find a purchaser when offered for sale, then the syndics will be compelled to borrow largely in order to complete the crop and get back the sums so borrowed. (12) The said Orange Grove plantation was offered for sale nearly six weeks preceding the cession of property herein, and the highest price offered in that time did not equal the amount of the mortgage resting on said plantation. (13) The meeting of creditors for the election of a syndic will open in this case on March 21, 1892. (14) If the Whitney National Bank is permitted to sell under its writ, as demanded in its rule, it is willing to advance the funds necessary to run the plantation until the date of the sale; and the provisional syndics are of the opinion that, if such sale can be legally allowed by the court, it will be greatly to the interest of all concerned. [Signed] HORACE E. UPTON and H. L. LAZARUS, Attorneys for Provisional Syndics. WHITE, PARLANGE & SAUNDERS, Attorneys for Whitney National Bank." After hearing, judgment was rendered making the rule absolute, and granting the order prayed for, from which the provisional syndics prosecute the present appeal.

The case really presents no issue except the issues of law raised in the pleadings, viz., to wit, (1) whether, in any case, the court has power to order the sale of property surrendered before the election of a definitive syndic; and (2) whether it had authority to make the particular order here granted.

If the court had the authority to order the sale, the statement of facts exhibits conclusively a proper case for its exercise. We deal with the substance, not the form, of things. It is not of the slightest consequence whether the order is applied for by the bank or by the provisional syndics. Both were before the court; both submitted the question to the court; both agreed upon the facts which rendered the sale necessary; and the syndics expressly told the court that they were "of the opinion that, if such sale can be legally allowed by the court, it will be greatly to the interest of all concerned." Their counsel now say in their brief: "The provisional syndics are not before the court urging that the sale of the mortgaged plantation was a conservatory act necessary for its preservation and safekeeping." We can give no heed to such a statement. They were before the court upon an agreed statement of facts showing that the sale of the property was a conservatory act, necessary to preserve the property from great deterioration in value, and advising the court that, if it could be legally done, the sale should be ordered in the interest of all concerned. We cannot permit them, in this court, to impugn the judgment of the court below on any other question than the one submitted, of judicial authority vel non. It is equally insubstantial to say that this sale was made in a proceeding conducted against the debtor, and under an order granted in a proceeding different from the cession, and which had been stayed by the latter. The sale was really made under and by authority here complained of, issued by the court in the insolvent proceedings. The bank asserted no pretension of right to proceed with the sale under the original order. It acknowledged the paramount authority of the insolvent court, and applied for its order as the warrant under which the sale should be made, and according to which the funds realized were to be held, controlled, and distributed by that tribunal. The case differs in no respect from what it would have been had the court rendered an independent order of sale without reference to the pending foreclosure proceeding. It prejudiced no right, and was a wise exercise of discretion, in the interest of economy, to allow the sale to proceed under the pending advertisement, if it was legal to make the sale at all. It was, moreover, a substantial compliance with the provisions of the law, under which suits against the insolvent do not abate, but are only stayed by the cession, and which require further proceedings therein to be conducted before, and under the authority of, the insolvent court. Code Pr. art. 165, No. 3; Rev. St. § 1816; State v. Ellis, 41 La. Ann. 41, 6 South. Rep. 55.

These formal objections being thus eliminated, the sole question remaining is whether or not the law vests the insolvent court with authority, in any case, to order the sale of assets surrendered, prior to the meeting of creditors and the choice of a definitive syndic. It cannot be denied that the general rule prescribed by our insolvent laws requires that the property surrendered shall be held intact during the pendency of the proceedings for the election of a syndic, and that provisional syndics, when appointed, exercise, ordinarily, only powers of administration, and must hold and deliver to the definitive syndic, when elected, all the assets which have been received by them. Such are the provisions of the law enforced by uniform jurisprudence. Rev. St. pars. 1793, 1794, 1812; Pitcher v. Creditors, 40 La. Ann. 784, 6 South. Rep. 98; Spears v. Creditors, 40 La. Ann. 650, 4 South. Rep. 567; Barkley v. Creditors, 11 Rob. La. 30.

But the lawmaker could not close his eyes to the fact that during the considerable delays that might intervene before the appointment of a definitive syndic, sometimes extending over many months, an inflexible adherence to this rule might impair, and even utterly destroy, the value of some of the surrendered assets. Hence he wisely invested provisional syndics with the power of "performing all the conservatory acts which may be necessary as well for the interest of the insolvent debtor as for that of the mass of creditors." Rev. St. 1793. It is, to our minds, self-evident that these powers embrace the power of sale, when that is necessary for the conservation of the property or its value. Even in cases of attachment the law wisely provides that property attached, if "of a perishable nature and subject to be lost or deteriorated during the pendency of the suit," may be sold pendente lite. The judge before whom the cession is pending is vested with a discretion to determine what are such conservatory acts as are necessary to preserve the property or its value for the interest of all concerned. It certainly requires a clear case of necessity to justify the sale of immovable property as a conservatory act. But no one can read the statement of agreed facts without perceiving that it presents the strongest possible case. The syndics themselves, who are the only appellants, unreservedly concede the necessity of the sale in order to prevent serious deterioration in value, and that it would be greatly to the interest of all concerned. What was the judge to do? Was he to sit idly, and permit the plantations to go to waste and ruin, sacrificing the whole benefit of the planted crops? Or was he to embark the provisional syndics in the hazardous enterprise of borrowing large sums of money to run seven sugar plantations? If not, there was no other alternative but to order the sale to proceed, and, in so doing, we think he wisely exercised a legal discretion.

Judgment affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 18, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

VENDOR'S PRIVILEGE—SALE IN BLOCK.

When goods, on which a vendor's privilege is claimed, have been sold in block, and for a lumping price, and when the proof sustains the privilege on a part and fails to sustain it on the rest of the goods, the impossibility of separating the price is fatal to the allowance of the privilege.

Appeal from district court, parish of Avoyelles; ADOLPHE V. COCO, Judge.

Action by H. & C. Newman against Clifton Cannon, sheriff, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, A. Lehman & Co. appeal. Affirmed.

Irion & Lafargue, for appellants. Thorp & Peterman, for appellees.

FENNER, J. When this case was before us last year (9 South. Rep. 439) we remanded it, in order to allow A. Lehman & Co. and other parties, claiming the vendor's privilege upon certain goods, the opportunity, by further evidence, "to improve the certainty of their identification, and to separate the price of the goods properly identified from that of those which cannot be identified." A. Lehman & Co. undertook to do this by further evidence, but failed to satisfy the judge a qua, who rendered judgment rejecting their privilege, from which they bring the present appeal. The only additional evidence offered is that of the same witness whose evidence was their main reliance on the former trial. He amplifies and strengthens his former evidence in some respects, but he does not overcome our conviction that a considerable portion of the goods claimed were not susceptible of identification, and that some of them had not even been sold by A. Lehman & Co. All the goods claimed and set aside by A. Lehman & Co. were sold in block, and adjudicated to them at a lumping price. It is impossible to separate the price of the goods on which their privilege is established from that of those on which they have proved none. This is fatal to their claim, and sustains the judge's ruling. Judgment affirmed.

DUCOTE v. RACHAL. (No. 11,045.)

REGISTRY OF HOMESTEAD.

1. A registry of a homestead exemption of a farm, including "the necessary quantity of corn and fodder for the current year," is sufficient without specifying the particular quantity of corn and fodder.

2. The constitution requires no more, and courts cannot enlarge its requirements.

Appeal from third magistrate's court, parish of Avoyelles; P. A. DURAND, Judge.

Action by C. J. Ducote against Henry Rachal. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified.

Irion & Lafargue and H. C. Edwards, for appellant.

FENNER, J. The plaintiff, claiming a privilege for a debt of $15, caused to be sequestered a quantity of corn on defendant's farm, which the defendant claims to be exempt, as attached to his homestead, under article 219 of the constitution, which exempts "on a farm the necessary quantity of corn and fodder for the current year." It fully appears that defendant had duly registered his homestead exemption, including his farm, and "the necessary corn and fodder for the current year;" that all the conditions entitling him to the exemption continued to exist; and that he did not have more corn, including that sequestered, than was necessary for the year. The magistrate nevertheless rejected the exemption, and maintained the sequestration. The magistrate gives no reasons for his judgment, and plaintiff has made no appearance in this court. It is suggested by appellee's counsel that the magistrate refused the exemption, because the registered homestead claim did not specify the number of barrels of corn to be exempted. The constitution requires no such specifications, and courts cannot enlarge the requirements of the constitution. There was a reconventional demand for damages, but the record exhibits no proof whatever in its support. The claim should not have been rejected, but only nonsuited. It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the judgment appealed from be amended by denying the privilege and dissolving the sequestration, and, further, that the judgment rejecting the reconventional demand be changed to one of nonsuit, and, as thus amended, the same be now affirmed, appellee to pay costs of appeal.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Suit by H. B. Whelage against Christine Lotz to compel her to execute title to certain land. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Zengel and Henry P. Dart, for appellant. James C. Walker, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. This suit has for object to compel the defendant to execute title to real estate, and it is therefore petitory in character,—the demand of the petition being that the defendant be condemned to a specific compliance with her agreement, and to execute conveyance to the plaintiff of two lots of ground, with the buildings and improvements thereon, situated in the first district of the city of New Orleans, in the square bounded by Hunter, Tchoupitoulas, New Levee, and Benjamin streets, designated by the letters A and B, and measuring as follows, to wit: Lot A, 69 feet front on Hunter street, by 48 feet in depth, and front on Tchoupitoulas street; lot B, 26 feet front on Hunter street, by 48 feet in depth between parallel lines; "Lot A, forming the corner of Tchoupitoulas and Hunter streets, as will appear from the agreement to buy, hereto annexed as part of this petition." The following is plaintiff's proposition, viz.: "New Orleans, October 23rd, 1890. Baumgarden and Friedericks—Gentlemen: I have a client who will give $3,400 cash for the property corner of Tchoupitoulas and Hunter streets. See title for dimensions. Please submit this proposition to your clients, and let me have an early offer. Yours truly, FRANK ZENGEL, Attorney." Messrs. Baumgarden & Friedericks presented this communication to their client, the defendant, who wrote thereupon this indorsement, viz.: "I accept the above proposition. [Signed] Mrs. J. C. LOTZ." This proposition and its acceptance are the foundation of this suit.

The position of the defendant's counsel is that the offer was only to sell the "property corner of Tchoupitoulas and Hunter streets," and that it is described in plaintiff's petition as "Lot A;" and the averment of her answer is that her acceptance of plaintiff's offer did not include lot B, which she never contemplated selling, but which she expected always to reserve as her homestead, and which is subject to a special mortgage in favor of her minor children, to secure their interest in the succession of their father, and of which she has no power to divest them. The main controversy in the lower court was in relation to the admissibility of testimony, the greater part of which was admitted over defendant's objection; the judge a qua ruling that the objections urged went to the effect of the evidence after it had been received. Some of the testimony consisted of (1) a letter written by Baumgarden & Friedericks to Frank Zengel, having date October 24, 1890, in reference to his proposition of the day previous, and connecting it with "the measurements and conditions of sale, as advertised in the New Orleans Picayune" at a certain time; (2) a printed form, filled up, authorizing Baumgarden & Friedericks to sell property corner of Tchoupitoulas and Market streets; (3) a receipt of Baumgarden & Friedericks for $340, it being an advance of 10 per cent. on the price of contemplated purchase; and (4) the plan of the property as it was exhibited for sale by Baumgarden & Friedericks. The principal ground of objection that was urged to this character of proof was that it was insufficient and inadmissible for the purpose of disclosing in Baumgarden & Friedericks authority to sell real estate for the defendant; and insufficient for, and inadmissible to prove, either a promise to sell or a sale of real estate. We agree with our learned brother of the lower court, both as to his opinion in reference to the admissibility of the testimony and his appreciation of it. It is only parol evidence that is inadmissible, under the provisions of the Code, to prove agency to sell real estate. Rev. Civil Code, art. 2992; Hackenburg v. Gartskamp, 30 La. Ann. 898; Perrault v. Perrault, 32 La. Ann. 635. That article specially sanctions the right of a party to conceive a power of attorney in any kind of private writing, "even by letter;" hence the admissibility of the writings that were offered in evidence. But they do not, of themselves, prove defendant's authorization to Baumgarden & Friedericks. It may well be that they were authorized to sell for the defendant "the property [at the] corner of Tchoupitoulas and Hunter streets. It may well be that those gentlemen, acting in perfect good faith under such an authorization, advertised in the Picayune the property as one single property. It may well be that the plaintiff, making the offer he did, acted upon the information contained in that newspaper advertisement. But, if all that be taken for granted, there remains an ellipsis to be supplied by parol proof, and that is the defendant's authorization to them to make sale of two lots. Not only is this the case, but such evidence tends to enlarge plaintiff's proposition, as well as to alter his averments. On the whole, we are of opinion that the proof fails to disclose that consentio mentium necessary to constitute a contract binding between the parties in respect to the object of sale.

SCHLIEDER v. DIELMAN et al. (No. 10,851.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 18, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

OPTIONS — CORPORATIONS — LIABILITIES — OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS — BREACH — DAMAGES — FUTURE PROFITS.

1. An option is not an existing and complete agreement, which contains a condition, but it is the supplement of an agreement, to the performance of which the assent of another is of the essence.

2. It is a mere pollicitation, not yet ripened into a perfect, commutative contract. It belongs to that class of conditional covenants which obliges the party in whose favor such a stipulation is made to give notice to the one granting it of his intention to exercise it before it becomes obligatory on the other.

3. A private corporation is a person in law, quite as responsible for its contracts as natural persons are. Notwithstanding such corporations possess the inherent power of dissolution at will, that right does not carry with it the authority of impairing the obligation of their contracts; but this liquidation, while it deprives the creditor of the power to compel specific performance, leaves his equitable remedy for the recovery of damages unimpaired.

4. As a general rule the future profits of a contract cannot be included in the injury suffered by its breach, mainly for the reason that they depend upon so many and various contingencies that it is impossible for a court or a jury to arrive at any definite determination of the actual loss by any trustworthy method. They are open to the objection of remoteness as well as of uncertainty.

5. When the breach of a contract consists in preventing its performance, without the fault of the other party, who is willing to perform it, the damages which the latter can recover will consist of (1) what he has already expended towards performance; (2) the profits which he would have realized by performance.

6. Profits cannot always be recovered. They may be too remote and speculative in their character, and therefore incapable of that clear and definite proof which the law requires. When not fully proven, or they are too remote, the true measure is the loss of outlay and expense.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Action by E. G. Schlieder against P. W. Dielman and others to recover damages for a breach of contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellants. White, Parlange & Saunders and E. Howard McCaleb, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. This is an action for the recovery of purely prospective damages, alleged to have resulted from the loss of anticipated profits occasioned by the defendants' nonfulfillment of their contract, whereby its full term was abbreviated by the period of six years and more. Judgment is claimed against defendants, as liquidators of the Louisiana Brewing Company, for the sum of $97,209.18 on that score, alleging its dissolution and liquidation, and claiming the right to have the same paid from the assets in their hands. The plaintiff prayed for and obtained an injunction restraining the defendants and the New Orleans Brewing Association—a new corporation, into which the Louisiana Brewing Company and other brewing companies had been consolidated—from disposing of said assets, and from surrendering them to the stockholders of the dissolved corporation, especially the stock and bonds which said liquidators had received from the Louisiana Brewing Association. Stated in more general terms, the claim of plaintiff is that he had a contract with the Louisiana Brewing Company whereby the latter agreed to furnish him all the beer he required for bottling purposes, and to furnish bottling beer to no one else, for and during a term of five years,—consenting that he should have the option to continue the contract in force for an additional period of five years; that prior to the expiration of the term of five years the corporation was, by a vote of the stockholders, voluntarily dissolved, and its affairs placed in the hands of the defendants as liquidators, leaving said contract in force. There is no fraud, tort, or wrong alleged in the act of dissolution, or any attempt to thereby avoid or evade the force and effect of their engagement; but the plaintiff's averment is that the obligation of the contract remained unbroken notwithstanding the dissolution of the corporation. The judge a qua perpetuated plaintiff's injunction, and gave him judgment for the sum of $43,482.38, allowing as the value of the bottling plant $10,378.16, and as the amount of future profits $33,104.22. It is from that judgment that the defendants have appealed.

Originally the Louisiana Brewing Company was engaged in the manufacture and sale of beer in the city of New Orleans, and in connection therewith it operated a bottling department for bottling beer, likewise for sale; the two plants being conducted co-operatively. As bottled beer was principally marketed in localities distantly removed from the place of its manufacture, its introduction into new business communities necessitated the employment of traveling salesmen, at heavy outlay and expense, to maintain its established trade relations. On this account, mainly, the brewing company disposed of its bottling plant, and leased the buildings wherein it was located and was in full operation as "a going concern." By this means the beer manufactory and the bottling department became separated, and each one passed under a separate administration. Contemporaneously with the sale of the bottling plant to Daniels & Schlieder—the predecessors of the plaintiff, whose rights he acquired—on the 1st of July, 1886, the contract sought to be enforced was executed. The principal stipulations of their agreement may be thus summarized, viz.: (1) The Louisiana Brewing Company contracted to sell Daniels & Schlieder the beer of its manufacture, and to no other person or bottling establishment, for bottling purposes, and to continue to thus furnish them beer for a period of five years. (2) Daniels & Schlieder agreed to purchase all the beer they required from said brewing company, and to take and use no other beer than that of its manufacture, and to continue their purchase for a period of five years.

The present controversy involves an interpretation of the contract of the brewing company to sell plaintiff beer, and the solitary issue tendered is the quantum of damages plaintiff is entitled to recover, upon the score of his loss of the anticipated profits of his bottling establishment, because of the brewing company's failure to carry its contract to its ultimate completion. At the date the suit was instituted there remained a little more than one year of the first period of five years unexpired; and there was likewise more than one year to elapse between the date of suit and the commencement of the further period of five years, during which plaintiff had the option to keep the contract in force. This action is for the recovery of damages ex contractu, resulting from the brewing company's simple inexecution of its contract to supply the plaintiff with bottling beer, which was occasioned by the purely lawful act of liquidating the corporation. The plaintiff's counsel treat the contract as though the two five-year periods were installments thereof, employing this expression, viz.: "His existing contract had more than one year to run, and he had the privilege of running for a period of five years more. This privilege was an integral part of his contract, and the company was as much bound by it, and bound to respect it, as it was bound by any other provision in the contract." On this theory counsel have formulated their demands, and the judge a qua accepted their theory, and acted upon it, in rendering judgment, taking as the initial point of his computation the sum of $5,517.37, as the annual net profits of the bottling business, and multiplying that sum by 6, thus giving to plaintiff an allowance of $33,104.22, on this score. In our opinion the learned judge of the district court misapprehended the true import of the plaintiff's option, and, so doing, incorrectly held it to be an integral part of the absolute contract; his judgment resting upon the incorrect hypothesis that the plaintiff had "exercised his privilege," and continued the contract in force for an additional period of five years, whereas he had not, in point of fact, so elected to continue the contract in force, by giving due notice to the brewing company before its liquidation. An option is not an actual, existing contract, but merely a right reserved in a subsisting agreement to the obligee to continue it in force for an additional term; but its preservation depends upon the obligee's exercise of the faculty of renewal, and seasonable notice given to the obligor of his intention to exercise the option. Mossy v. Mead, 2 La. 157; Lieuteaud v. Jeanneaud, 20 La. Ann. 327. In a certain sense an option is a mere pollicitation,—a promise without mutuality, not yet ripened into a perfect agreement, containing mutual stipulations, which either may enforce, and from which neither is at liberty to recede. It is an open proposition by one party to a contract, which must be accepted in precise terms by the other in order that it may be binding upon both parties. Without attempting any collation of authorities on this question, we make a single extract from a standard text writer on the subject, aptly expressing our views upon the subject, viz.: "It may be," says the author, in treating of the conditions on which a sale of goods depends, "the happening of some event; and then the question arises as to the duty of the obligee to give notice that the event has happened. As a general rule a man who binds himself to do anything upon the happening of a particular event is bound to take notice, at his own peril, and to comply with his promise when the event happens. But there are cases in which, from the very nature of the transaction, the party bound on a contract of this sort is entitled to notice from the other of the happening of the event on which the liability depends." The author then furnishes this illustration, to wit: "But no notice is required when the particular person whose action is made a condition of the bargain is named, * * * and no option to be exercised by the vendor. And it seems that this is the true test, viz.: That, if the obligee has reserved any option to himself by which he can control the event on which the duty of the obligor depends, then he must give notice of his own act before he can call upon the obligor to comply with his engagement." Benj. Sales, pp. 561, 562, § 577. See, also, Watson v. Walker, 23 N. H. 471; De Mill v. Insurance Co., 4 Allen, (N. B.) 341; Lent v. Padelford, 10 Mass. 230; Tasker v. Bartlett, 5 Cush. 359. In Ice Co. v. Heinze, 14 S. W. Rep. 756, the Missouri court said: "The option given by the company was never exercised. Hence that clause of the proposition never became applicable." Accepting this interpretation of an option in a contract, and applying thereto the evidence supplied by the record, and we have no hesitancy in reaching the conclusion that plaintiff never exercised his right, or gave any notice of his intention to exercise it. While it is true that the plaintiff, in all of his relations of contractor with the brewing company, occupied the position of a third person, yet the fact is quite undeniable that he was both a director and stockholder of the corporation at the same time; and while negotiations were in progress, looking to a liquidation, the plaintiff actively participated therein, and gave them countenance and support; and they resulted in its virtual assignment to the New Orleans Brewing Association. These negotiations occasioned several meetings of the stockholders, many of which were attended by the plaintiff, though it is contended by counsel that he did not participate therein, and they state in their brief, to wit: "Schlieder favored all the negotiations to sell to the English syndicate, but when the question of consolidation came up, although he was one of the largest stockholders in the Louisiana Brewing Company, and attended the meeting at which the proposition to dissolve was voted upon, he refrained from voting because he was apprehensive that the dissolution might affect his contract rights." He was present at "the meeting at which the dissolution was determined upon, * * * and did not vote. * * * Some one remarked that the voting was about to close, and asked Schlieder if he did not wish to vote. There is some discrepancy in the evidence as to the reply that Schlieder made. Schlieder says positively that, in declining to vote for the liquidation, he gave as his reason that by doing so he might imperil his right as a contractor."

As a witness, plaintiff states that he had been advised by counsel not to vote in the stockholders' meeting, and that he was present at that meeting, and publicly stated the reasons why he could not consent to vote for the liquidation, nor sign any document to that effect. It is in proof that the plaintiff made similar statements, just before and just after the meeting, to several of the stockholders. But, considering all the evidence on this question, it is quite apparent that plaintiff acted and voted in such manner as to tacitly permit, so far as he was concerned, the liquidation to take place, and thus realize a share of the large profits of the adventure, and at the same time to protect his contract rights from impairment. This is evident from his general course of conduct, and having taken the advice of a lawyer as to the nature and extent of his rights, and the best manner of protecting them. Openly and publicly, plaintiff made no protest. He assigned to his associate stockholders no ground for his refusal to act. But, just as soon as the dissolution of the corporation became an accomplished fact, he promptly instituted this suit against the liquidators appointed to adjust its affairs, and by injunction arrested in their hands the entire avails of its liquidation, and from which he claims the right to receive a little less than $100,000 as damages resulting to his bottling business because of the dissolution, in the mean while making no disavowal of his intention to accept his share of the immense profits realized by the liquidation. Without commenting upon plaintiff's course of dealing with his associates, or making any application of it to the actual contract, in respect to its unexpired term, we may, with becoming propriety, state, and emphasize the statement, that there is not one scintilla of testimony which even tends to show that he ever asserted any intention to exercise his option, nor that he did any act or uttered any word that would by any fair and reasonable interpretation indicate such purpose on his part. And we are well satisfied that, if he entertained such an idea, it was only a thought he harbored in his own mind, but never communicated to the stockholders or directors of the corporation, and who, in the absence of any such notification, had a perfect right to assume that he had abandoned it, and act accordingly. Inasmuch as the exercise of the option was exclusively under the plaintiff's control, and as he was not only aware of the proposed liquidation, but was present and participated in all the proceedings that led up to the liquidation, though he declined to sign the final act, a clear and indisputable obligation was imposed on him to have given notice to the stockholders' meeting of his intention to exercise his option; and, failing to do so, he must be conclusively presumed to have abandoned such right. This being our conclusion, the option of the plaintiff to continue the contract in force for a new and additional term is eliminated from the controversy.

In respect to the immediate effects of the liquidation of the corporation on the plaintiff's contract rights, there can be but little difficulty, as it cannot be doubted that the liquidation of a corporation has the immediate effect of terminating all of its purely personal obligations, and of relegating the beneficiaries thereunder to an action in damages in keeping with its covenants. A corporation is quite as much bound as a natural person is to the performance of its contracts. The law, in authorizing the creation of corporations, provides at the same time for their forced as well as for their voluntary dissolution. The law authorizes the stockholders of a business corporation such as the Louisiana Brewing Company was to dissolve at will, upon a vote of three fourths of its stockholders. Rev. St. § 687. The privilege is incorporated in the company's charter, and no act of the board of directors could deprive the stockholders of such right, and the contract the corporation had made with the plaintiff could have no such effect. It has been repeatedly decided that "the laws of a state, in this regard, enter directly into the contract, and as corporations have the power to dissolve themselves, or consent to a forfeiture of corporate franchise, all persons must be regarded as having contracted upon the hypothesis of the existence and possible exercise of this power." State v. Gas-Light Co., 2 Rob. 529; Hunter v. Insurance Co., 26 La. Ann. 13; Louisiana State Bank v. Orleans Nav. Co., 8 La. Ann. 294; Palfrey v. Paulding, 7 La. Ann. 363; Trisconi v. Winship, 43 La. Ann. 49, 9 South. Rep. 29; Mumma v. Potomac Co., 8 Pet. 281; Railroad Co. v. State, 29 Ala. 586; Taft v. Pittsford, 28 Vt. 286; Green's Ultra Vires, §§ 138, 435. But it is equally true that such dissolution does not destroy the obligation of the company's contracts; the equitable rights of creditors surviving the act of dissolution, and attaching to the assets and property of the corporation in the hands of its liquidators. Mor. Corp. § 1035; Curran v. Arkansas, 15 How. 304.

Whether, however, obligations in futuro of a corporation, such as plaintiff seeks to enforce, survive a dissolution, is a question of serious difficulty. The right of dissolution being expressly granted by law, and the law being read into such a contract, it is not easily perceived how it could be enforced specifically, or damages for nonperformance granted; nonperformance being the necessary result of dissolution. Lex neminem cogit ad impossibilia.

But preliminary to this discussion a question arises in reference to the plea of estoppel that is urged against the plaintiff, based on the ground that he was a stockholder and director in the corporation, and participated in the proceedings which culminated in its dissolution, and is by such action concluded from claiming damages. Quoad this transaction, plaintiff was an utter stranger, to be dealt with as such, and to have his contract interpreted just as though he had no relations of trust with the corporation, for the principal and sufficient reason that his action was not controlling, and any resistance on his part to dissolution could not have prevented it, and equity does not require resort to a vain effort to accomplish an impossibility. We are therefore of opinion that the estoppel urged is not good.

Whatever may be the correct view to be taken of the allowance and measure of damages, it is obvious that the rights of all parties became fixed and irrevocable at the date of dissolution, and that which in the contract was potestative or conditional became absolute at the time of liquidation. In a recent and well-considered case the Florida court said: "It has been held in England, as well as in this country, that when one party, before the time of performance of the contract has arrived, renounces it to the other party, the latter may act upon the renunciation, treat the contract as broken, and sue before the time for performance." Sullivan v. McMillan, 8 South. Rep. 450. The purport of that opinion is that where there is an executory contract for the manufacture and supply of goods from time to time, to be paid for after delivery, if the purchaser, having accepted and paid for a portion of the goods contracted for, gives notice to the vendor not to manufacture any more, the vendor being able and desirous to complete the contract, he may, without manufacturing and tendering the rest of the goods, maintain an action against the purchaser for a breach of contract. To the same effect are numerous other authorities, to wit: Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362; Dugan v. Anderson, 36 Md. 567; Fish v. Folley, 6 Hill, 54; Tinney v. Ashley, 15 Pick. 547; Mullaly v. Austin, 97 Mass. 30; Smith v. Lewis, 24 Conn. 624; Fales v. Hemenway, 64 Me. 373; Morrison v. Lovejoy, 6 Minn. 319, (Gil. 224;) Town v. Turnpike Co., 14 Vt. 311; Railroad Co. v. Van Dusen, 29 Mich. 431; George v. Railroad Co., 8 Ala. 234; Friedlander v. Pugh, 43 Miss. 111; Railroad Co. v. Howard, 13 How. 307.

Considering plaintiff's claim for damages, we find it to be predicated on the principles of the Code; and he makes claim to reimbursement, exclusively upon the ground that the inexecution of the company's agreement to continue to supply him with beer of its manufacture, for bottling purposes, rendered his bottling plant absolutely useless to him, and caused the destruction of his business, and hence the measure of his damages is the loss of the profits anticipated to result from that enterprise for the residue of the unexpired term. The controlling article of the Code on the subject "of damages resulting from the inexecution of obligations" declares that "the damages due to the creditor for its breach are the amount of the loss he has sustained, and the profit of which he has been deprived;" or, in the further words of the article, "when the debtor has been guilty of no fraud or bad faith, he is liable only for such damages as were contemplated, or may reasonably be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties at the time of the contract." Rev. Civil Code, art. 1934. In this connection the question to be determined is whether the unearned profits of a transaction properly enter into a calculation of the loss which the creditor has sustained, and the profit of which he has been deprived, in the sense of that article. The decisions based on that article have invariably placed a strict interpretation on its provisions; the court generally awarding only such damages as will fully indemnify the creditor, and disallowing speculative profits, confining them to the immediate and direct consequences of the breach of contract. Such is the purport of the following cases, viz.: Ryder v. Thayer, 3 La. Ann. 150; Arrowsmith v. Gordon, Id. 105; Porter v. Barrow, Id. 140; Reading v. Donovan, 6 La. Ann. 491; Smith v. Thielen, 17 La. Ann. 239; Berje v. Railroad Co., 37 La. Ann. 468; Vidalat v. City of New Orleans, 43 La. Ann. 1121, 10 South. Rep. 175. In Harrison v. Railroad Co., 28 La. Ann. 777, quite a similar question arose to the one under consideration, and the court said: "The question is, what damages had the plaintiff sustained up to the time the suit was instituted, and how are those damages to be ascertained?" An examination has satisfied us that our jurisprudence is in accord with the opinions of text writers, and the jurisprudence of other courts of the country, in this regard. One author announces the general rule to be that an allowance of damages should be restricted to "the natural and proximate consequences of the breach." Suth. Dam. pp. 17, 74. Another says: "The future profits of a business which has been interrupted are open to the objection of remoteness as well as of uncertainty." 3 Pars. Cont. p. 181. Another says: "It is a rule that a catching bargain shall not be taken advantage of, so as to enable the plaintiff to put into his pocket a greater sum of money than from a fair and reasonable compensation for the injury he has sustained by the breach of a contract." 2 Add. Cont. p. 1110. The summary of opinions of the courts of the country, in respect to the allowance of future profits as an element of damages, seems to incline in its favor, with certain modifications; and they appear rather to turn upon the question of the remote and speculative character of the damages claimed than upon their allowance vel non on the score of being future profits. In U. S. v. Behan, 110 U. S. 338, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 81, the supreme court said: "When the breach of a contract consists in preventing its performance, without the fault of the other party, who is willing to perform it, the damages which the latter can recover will consist—First, of what he has already expended towards performance; and, second, the profits which he would realize by performing the whole contract. The second item, profits, cannot always be recovered. They may be too remote and speculative in their character, and therefore incapable of that clear and direct proof which the law requires,"—stating in conclusion that the "prima facie measure of damages for the breach of a contract is the amount of the loss which the injured party has sustained thereby." This rule in the assessment of damages ex contractu has been followed by the state courts in varying forms of expression, and in many cases. Vide Walrath v. Whittekind, 26 Kan. 482; Cates v. Sparkman, (Tex. Sup.) 11 S. W. Rep. 846; Bingham v. City of Walla Walla, (Wash.) 13 Pac. Rep. 408; Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489; Snell v. Cottingham, 72 Ill. 161; Ruff v. Rinaldo, 55 N. Y. 664, mem; Hexter v. Knox, 63 N. Y. 561; Hinckley v. Beckwith, 13 Wis. 34; Shepard v. Gaslight Co., 15 Wis. 349; 1 Sedg. Dam. 77; Fuld. Dam. 10; Kenny v. Collier, (Ga.) 8 S. E. Rep. 59; Hamilton v. Schumacher, (Tex. App.) 15 S. W. Rep. 715; Railroad Co. v. Hutchins, (Neb.) 48 N. W. Rep. 398; McHose v. Fulmer, 73 Pa. St. 365; Masterton v. Mayor, 7 Hill, 61.

allowance of damages for future profits, we think it quite clear that the plaintiff has not stated a proper case for the allowance of such profits; for it appears from the evidence that the plaintiff was a large stockholder in the Louisiana Brewing Company, and also a director, and as such he participated in all the proceedings which led up to, and resulted in, the liquidation of that corporation. The evidence leaves no doubt that he favored and approved it, and desired its consummation. The liquidation produced large pecuniary advantages to the stockholders, to a participation in which plaintiff is entitled. It is true that he declined to vote for or to sign the final act of liquidation, assigning as his reason that it might prejudice his contract, yet even at that time, and with the idea of protecting his contract uppermost in his mind, he failed to oppose or vote against it, but on the contrary signified his approval of the action that was taken by his associates. It is difficult to appreciate how his mere refraining from voting on the question of dissolution alters or improves his position in any respect. The only importance attaching to the question of dissolution vel non arises from the fact that it placed on the corporation the impossibility of performing its personal obligations under its contract with plaintiff. But the final result was just as effectually brought about by the various measures to which he expressly gave his assent and approval, and which operated the sale of the plant of the corporation and the abandonment of the enterprise. If evidence was needed to further substantiate plaintiff's full knowledge of, and acquiescence in, the liquidation of the corporation, it is readily supplied by the letter his lawyer addressed to the New Orleans Brewing Association soon afterwards, in which the desire is expressed "that some arrangement be made with him by [the] association at an early day," etc. Replying thereto, the brewing association promised and agreed to carry out the contract of the Louisiana Brewing Company in all respects, but the only answer he made to this proposition was the institution of this suit. The resolution of the brewing association tendered exact and specific performance of every obligation of the contract. Plaintiff, it is true, suggests certain possible disadvantages to which he would be subjected by the change of proprietorship, but they are more seeming than real. It is true that in effecting the consolidation of the breweries the brewing association acquired the ownership of other bottling establishments attached to other breweries; but these existed prior to the liquidation of the Louisiana Brewing Company, and were in active operation and competition with the plaintiff. The evidence further shows that there were on hand at date of liquidation over 5,000 barrels of the Louisinaa beer, which had been actually brewed by that company, and which were subject to plaintiff's order, and were tendered to him by the brewing association, and which would have supplied him under his contract for more than one year; and he refused to accept it. On the contrary, plaintiff chose to abandon his business and bring this suit for damages. Under the facts and circumstances related, we are of opinion that the plaintiff's case must fail, under the maxim volenti non fit injuria.

With regard to that part of the judgment awarding the plaintiff $10,378.16 as the value of his bottling plant, our conclusion is that it is likewise erroneous, and must be reversed, because the terms of the act of sale of the bottling plant to Daniels & Schlieder are that in case of the discontinuance of the bottling business the Louisiana Brewing Company was reserved the right to purchase the plant at a price to be fixed by arbitrators. The liquidators invoke that stipulation, and they have an absolute contract right to have it enforced. It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that there be judgment rejecting the plaintiff's demands, at his cost in both courts; the rights of all parties being fully reserved in reference to the bottling plant under the contract.

PARTITION—ABSENT HEIRS—FAILURE TO APPOINT CURATOR.

Notwithstanding the Civil Code directs that an attorney or curator must be appointed by the judge to represent absent heirs in the conduct of succession and partition proceedings, the failure of the judge to make such appointment, or the existence of an irregularity in the appointment, does not constitute such an absolute nullity as will work the revocation or annulment of a sale of property made thereunder. Omnia rite acta.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; THOMAS C. W. ELLIS, Judge.

Suit by George Mather against Gustave Lehman, Sr., to compel compliance with a certain contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Buck, Dinkelspiel & Hart, for appellant. H. G. Morgan, for appellee.

WATKINS, J. Plaintiff institutes this suit to compel the defendant's compliance with the terms of his contract to buy of him a certain piece of improved real estate, situated in the sixth municipal district of the city of New Orleans, in the square bounded by Antoine, Foucher, and Prytania streets and St. Charles avenue, having a frontage on the latter of 175 feet, for the consideration of $13,000. The defendant admits the contract, but denies the validity of the title tendered him, averring that on the 30th of November, 1868, one James O'Dowd purchased the property from Raymond Pochleu, and subsequently died; that his succession was administered, and therein certain alleged partition proceedings were had, by which the surviving widow of the deceased appeared to have acquired same, but which the defendant avers to have been null and void for want of proper parties thereto. And he further avers that the subsequent proceedings had in said succession could not have the effect of validating the title of Widow O'Dowd, she having in the mean time conveyed title to another, and the same not having been conducted according to law. From the record it appears that in the partition proceedings designated the property was allotted to Mrs. O'Dowd; that on the 29th of October, 1877, she sold it to Mrs. Eva Jonas Lyons, and that she conveyed it to the present plaintiff. From the record it appears that James O'Dowd left at his demise the property in controversy, and certain other parcels of city real estate, thereto adjoining, all of which belonged to the community theretofore existing between himself and his surviving widow, Mrs. E. A. O'Dowd, one undivided one-half interest in the whole of which vested in her, and the remaining one-half interest in the legal heirs of the deceased. Mrs. O'Dowd presented a petition to the then second district court for the parish of Orleans, in which the succession of her deceased husband was being administered, praying for a partition of the common property, she being unwilling longer to continue joint ownership with the heirs of her late husband. On her petition an attorney was appointed to represent the absent heirs, who accepted the appointment, and acted accordingly. The matter was by the judge of that court referred to a notary for further proceedings according to law; and, upon the report of experts duly appointed that the several properties were susceptible of division in kind, the partition was made, the widow O'Dowd having allotted to her the property in controversy as the fair equivalent of that which was allotted to the heirs of the deceased. All the foregoing proceedings were conducted contradictorily with the said attorney for absent heirs. The notary prepared a proces verbal of the partition, which was duly filed and homologated on the 26th of October, 1877, and thereunder Mrs. O'Dowd went into possession as owner.

On this state of the case the sole question raised is of the capacity of the attorney for absent heirs to personate them in the partition proceedings. The Code directs that, upon the opening of a vacant succession, or one of which the heirs, or a part of them, are absent from, and not represented in, the state, it is the duty of the judge ordering an inventory of the succession effects to be made to "appoint a counsel to the absent heirs," etc. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1210. It also provides that, when an order for the sale of succession property is applied for, "the petition of the curator must be notified to the counsel for the absent heirs," etc. Id. art. 1166. It further declares that in case of the absence of coheirs, "the curators who have been appointed for them * * * can sue or be sued for a partition as representing in every respect the absent heirs." Id. art. 1315. (Our italics.) These articles relate evidently to an appointment of counsel or curators under varying circumstances, either in successions or in partition suits outside of successions. In this case we have under consideration the appointment of an attorney for absent heirs, made in a partition of succession property, and we cannot conceive of any reason why it should not be accepted and regarded as efficacious in view of the foregoing provisions of the Code. Some verbal criticism has been made of the style or title given to the person thus appointed, but it is not discoverable what the distinction consists in, for practically there is none. Vide Hooke v. Hooke, 6 La. 473; Bienvenu v. Insurance Co., 33 La. Ann. 209. Even if there were any doubt of the regularity of the appointment of the attorney for absent heirs, it could not avail the defendant, after the lapse of so great a length of time, because it was held in Gibson v. Foster, 2 La. Ann. 503, that, the record of the sale disclosing no order of appointment of such an attorney, the presumption omnia rite acta was strictly applicable. It was also held in Succession of Wadsworth, 2 La. Ann. 966, that "an order for the sale of the property of a succession, made at the suit of an administratrix, without citing the attorney of absent heirs, is not a nullity. * * * The omission to cite the attorney for absent heirs was an informality anterior to judgment, which could not be inquired into collaterally," etc. In Herriman v. Janney, 31 La. Ann. 276, it was held that the failure to appoint an attorney for absent heirs with whom to conduct contradictorily an application for the administration of a succession will not affect the validity of the appointment of the administrator. As against the theory of plaintiff's title, predicated upon the foregoing statement of facts, defendant's further contention is that Mrs. O'Dowd petitioned the court to be recognized and put in possession of the property of the succession of her deceased husband as heir; but it is quite evident that those proceedings are not germane to the question of title under examination, as they exclusively relate to that portion of the community property which was set off to the absent heirs in the aforesaid partition proceedings. The tendency of such proof is rather to confirm than disaffirm the plaintiff's title by partition. Counsel for plaintiff has collated many decisions of this court on the question of prescription acquirendi causa, but as, in our opinion, the questions at issue are clearly determinable upon other grounds, we find no occasion to give them an examination.

STATE ex rel. CITY OF NEW ORLEANS v. CANAL & C. ST. R. CO. (No. 10,945.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 18, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

MANDAMUS—ENFORCEMENT OF CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. Under Act 133 of 1888, mandamus is provided as a special statutory remedy, applicable to the enforcement of such obligations as those involved in this case, in a contract between the city and a street railway corporation.

2. The case involves a construction of the provisions of the contract, and the judge below properly interpreted the meaning of the language used.

3. The intent of the parties being plainly expressed, no foundation existed for resort to evidence of prior conversations to vary or explain.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by the city of New Orleans against the Canal & Claiborne Streets Railroad Company to compel the performance of a certain contract. From a judgment for the relator the respondent appeals. Affirmed.

James R. Beckwith, for appellant. Carleton Hunt, City Atty., and Henry Renshaw, Asst. City Atty., for appellee.

FENNER, J. This is a proceeding by mandamus to compel the performance of obligations of a certain contract entered into between the city and defendant with reference to the maintenance of certain street bridges along the route of a street railway. It is taken in conformity with legislative Act No. 133 of 1888, which authorizes the writ of mandamus as a special statutory remedy in such cases, and there is no tenable objection to its invocation in this case.

The following are the provisions of the contract, enforcement of which is demanded: "The street bridges, where crossed by the company's tracks, throughout their routes, shall be placed in first-class order, and be kept so during the term of franchise. * * * That said Canal & Claiborne Streets Railroad Company, or its successor or assigns, as a part consideration for said franchise," etc., "shall, at its own cost, charges, and expense for all material and labor, and without indemnity or right of reclamation, construct and maintain all street bridges where crossed by said company's tracks, and at all times to keep such crossings, bridges, culverts, where crossed, in first-class order, and shall also keep and maintain two feet of the street on the outer side of each rail of their tracks in good order and condition." The city contends that these provisions impose the obligation to keep the bridges crossed by the railway in order. The defendant claims that it is only required to keep that portion of the bridges in order immediately under or between the tracks, or "where crossed." The judge below maintained the city's construction, and gave reasons therefor to which we can add nothing. Notwithstanding the insistence of defendant's counsel, we are unable to discover any ambiguity in the contract, which raises in our minds any doubt as to its true meaning. The things to be constructed and maintained are the bridges, not the crossings of the company's tracks over the bridges. It is true the word "where" indicates and limits locality; but the locality indicated here is that of the bridges, not of the particular part of the bridges crossed by the track. The meaning of the words "where crossed" jumps to the eye. It means that bridges situated where they are crossed by the track are to be maintained and kept in order. Other bridges, situated where they are not crossed, are not included. This is rendered more clear by reference to the preceding contract between the parties, which required the purchaser "to keep in good repair and condition, during the continuance of this privilege, the paved and unpaved streets through which said tracks pass, as well as all the bridges on said streets." The new contract modifies the old in favor of the company, by restricting the obligation to a particular part of the streets, and to the particular bridges crossed. Had the intention been to confine the obligation to a particular part of the bridges, this would have been defined with the same distinctness as that employed as to the parts of the streets. Moreover, as the judge a qua weightily says, "there was no reason for the city to obligate by written contract the defendant to keep in repair the bridges only at the points were crossed by the tracks, for the reason that the defendant was and is compelled to do so in order to maintain its tracks and run its cars."

Finding that the intention of the parties is plainly expressed in the contract, no foundation existed for resorting to prior conversations and negotiations between representatives of the contracting corporations to vary or explain it, and such evidence was rightly excluded.

Judgment affirmed.

HANSELL et al. v. HANSELL. (No. 10,946.)

(Supreme Court of Louisiana. April 18, 1892. 44 La. Ann.)

FOREIGN LUNATIC—HOW PROCEEDED AGAINST—CURATOR AD HOC—JUDGMENT—IRREGULARITIES—WHO MAY TAKE ADVANTAGE OF—ESTOPPEL.

1. A person alleged to be insane, whose domicile is in a foreign jurisdiction, cannot be represented in this state by a special curator.

2. The courts of this state must deal with an absent insane person, domiciled elsewhere, as a sane person until the courts of his domicile have interdicted him.

3. Where an absent insane person has property in this state, held in common with another, for the purpose of partition, he must be considered and proceeded against as an absentee.

4. If no curator has been appointed to represent him and to take charge of his property, and he has no known representative in the state, the court before whom the suit is pending must appoint a curator ad hoc to represent the absent person. He is not required to take an oath.

5. Parties to a suit only can avail themselves of irregularities when prosecuted to a judgment. Other parties cannot urge such irregularities for annulling the judgment.

6. When property is owned in indivision, and is the only property so owned with the coproprietor, it is unnecessary to have an inventory of the property made.

7. When the property is ordered to be sold at public auction in conformity to articles 1339, 1340, Rev. Civil Code, it is to be presumed that satisfactory evidence was adduced before the judge that the property was indivisible in kind, or that it could not be conveniently divided.

8. Where a minor who has arrived at majority appears in court, and disclaims any title to or interest in property which it is alleged was transferred without divesting his interest when a minor, he will afterwards be estopped from setting up title to said property.

Appeal from civil district court, parish of Orleans; FREDERICK D. KING, Judge.

Suit for partition by Emma W. Hansell and others against Henry H. Hansell. There was judgment ordering the premises sold, which was done, and the properties adjudged, one to R. Maitre and the other to R. F. W. Bachman, who refused to take title. Plaintiffs took a rule to compel them to comply with the adjudication. From a judgment for defendants in the rule plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions to make the rule absolute.

Hayne & Denegre, for appellants. Browne & Choate, for appellees.

McENERY, J. Plaintiffs, Emma W. Hansell et al., being the owners of an undivided twenty-nine thirtieths of certain improved real estate in the First ward of the city of New Orleans, on Magazine and Common streets, bring this suit for a partition against Henry H. Hansell, the owner of the remaining undivided one-thirtieth interest. The petition alleges the ownership, and that Henry H. Hansell is a notoriously insane person, who has never been interdicted, and to whom no curator has ever been appointed; that he is confined in an asylum in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., and it is necessary that a special curator and curator ad hoc be appointed to represent him, and defend the suit; that F. F. Hansell, of the full age of majority, is the brother of H. H. Hansell, and is the person who, under the law, would be appointed curator to said H. H. Hansell in case he were to be interdicted. The prayer is that said F. F. Hansell be appointed special curator and curator ad hoc to represent said H. H. Hansell; that he be notified of his appointment, and duly cited to answer the petition; and that there be judgment ordering the property sold at public auction, as provided by law. In accordance with the prayer of the petition, F. F. Hansell was appointed special curator and curator ad hoc of Henry H. Hansell, and was duly notified and served with citation to answer in due course. The judgment was regularly rendered, in accordance with the prayer of the petition, ordering a sale of the property at public auction. The sale was made, and the properties were adjudicated, one to R. Maitre and the other to R. F. W. Bachman, who refused to take title for various reasons stated in their answer to the rule taken by plaintiffs on them to compel them to comply with the adjudication. The principal objection made by the adjudicatees, and the one upon which they insist most strongly, is that, until H. H. Hansell has been interdicted, and a curator appointed for him, as provided by law, he cannot be properly brought into court, and a binding judgment rendered against him; (2) they object on the ground that F. F. Hansell has never taken oath as special curator, and therefore H. H. Hansell was not properly represented, and the judgment rendered against him not a valid and binding one.

It is alleged in the petition that H. H. Hansell is notoriously insane, and this averment is proved by the testimony. He has been in this condition for three years, and during that time has been confined in an insane asylum in the city of Philadelphia. His domicile is in that city. The courts in this state have no jurisdiction of his person, and can render no decree affecting his personal status, and interdict him. The courts of his domicile alone have jurisdiction to ascertain his mental condition, and to render the necessary decree relieving him of the control both of his person and estate. No facts alleged and no evidence received by the courts here can place a person domiciled in a foreign jurisdiction among the class of persons incapable of managing their persons and estates. A person alleged to be insane, whose legal domicile is in a foreign jurisdiction, cannot, therefore, be represented in this state by the appointment of a special curator. Interdiction of Dumas, 32 La. Ann. 679. The courts of this state must treat him as a sane person until the courts of his domicile have decreed otherwise by interdicting him. That part of the petition which alleges the insanity of H. H. Hansell, and the order of the court appointing a special curator, may be disregarded.

The petition does allege that he is an absentee and owns property in this state. A curator ad hoc was appointed to represent him as an absentee, and the proceedings for a partition were conducted regularly and contradictorily with him. He is not represented in this state. In the matter of the interdiction of Dumas, above referred to, Dumas' actual domicile was in France. He had, when sane, given a power of attorney to an agent residing here. This court said in the opinion announcing the decree: "The lamentable disability with which it is alleged that Dumas was afflicted at the bringing of this suit, and which continued to dement him long afterwards, was a mental malady, which could, no more than any other infirmity, produce the effect of revoking the procuration which he had given to his agent. It could be recalled, in a circumstance like this only by actual, valid judgment of interdiction. Rev. Civil Code, art. 3027. The institution of the interdiction suit did not revoke the power so intrusted. Gernon v. Dubois, 23 La. Ann. 27." "Even could such mental derangement put an end to the mandate, the consequence would only have been that Dumas would have to be treated as an absentee, and his property taken care of and administered upon as provided by law in such cases. Rev. Civil Code, art. 50 et seq." H. H. Hansell cannot be considered as an insane person, as his incapacity has not been declared by the courts of his actual domicile, where he can be personally cited. He has property in this state. He is an absentee, and has no known agent in the state to manage this property. It must therefore be preserved and cared for as provided by the Code, art. 47 et seq. Article 56 of the Revised Civil Code provides that, "if a suit be instituted against an absentee, who has no known agent in the state, or for the administration of whose property no curator has been appointed, the judge before whom the suit is pending shall appoint a curator ad hoc to defend the absentee in the suit." No curator had been appointed when the suit was brought to take charge of the property of the absentee. Article 116 of the Code of Practice also provides that a curator ad hoc must be appointed to represent the person intended to be sued, if he be absent, and not represented in the state. Neither of the above articles of the Revised Civil Code and Code of Practice requires that the curator ad hoc shall take any oath. The absentee, H. H. Hansell, owned property in common with a resident of this state. No one can be compelled to hold property in indivision with another. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1289. The rules established in the Revised Civil Code, art. 1298 et seq., are applicable to partitions between coproprietors of the same thing when among the coproprietors any are absent, minors, or interdicted. The only way of having the absentee brought into court was through the appointment of a curator ad hoc. The coproprietor of the absentee, Hansell, had the right to demand a partition, and his only remedy was by proceeding against the absentee in the manner provided for by articles 56, Revised Civil Code, and 116, Code Practice.

The defendants in rule have urged other objections to accepting title to the property. The objections that the signatures to the petition in Succession of S. F. Hansell, in suit No. 32,246, civil district court, consenting to the recognition of their mother as universal legatee of the deceased, have not been proved, concerns only the parties to that suit. The judgment rendered in that suit is conclusive as to the genuineness of the signatures. It is presumed to have been rendered on sufficient evidence. We make the same remark with reference to the objections to the signatures to the agreement, annexed to the petition in Succession of Barnett Hansell, No. 32,247, civil district court. The interest of the minor Morris E. Hansell, it is alleged, was not disposed of legally in the property adjudicated to defendants in rule. The agreement among the heirs and the surviving partners in the Hansell partnership seem to have been more for the just recognition of what belonged to the partnership, and the individual members of the same, rather than for the alienation of property. The property was taken in the name of individual partners, and by consent restored to its proper ownership. But whether this view is correct or not is immaterial, so far as this controversy is involved, as Morris E. Hansell, now 26 years of age, renounced all right, title, and interest to said property in open court, and put the declaration on record in the note of evidence, and is therefore estopped from asserting title or any claim whatever to said property.

There is a technical objection to the petition filed in Succession of Standish F. Hansell, No. 32,246, civil district court, that the signatures of the attorneys were not at the foot of the petition. One of the attorneys signed on the back of the petition inadvertently. The suit was prosecuted to a judgment, and the parties directly interested interposed no objections. The defendants in rule have no interest in opposing the want of the signatures to the petition. The judgment was not absolutely null and void, and could not be attacked collaterally. We do not intimate even that it was relatively null, as the want of the signature to the petition was cured by the judgment. The immediate parties to the suit only could urge the objection now opposed by defendants in rule. It is also urged that there was no inventory of the property to be partitioned, and no experts appointed, to show that it was indivisible in kind. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1339, provides that when the property is indivisible by its nature, or when it cannot be conveniently divided, the judge shall order, at the instance of one of the heirs, on proof of either of these facts, that it be sold at public auction, etc. Rev. Civil Code, art. 1340, says: "It is said that a thing cannot be conveniently divided when a diminution of its value, or loss and inconvenience of one of the owners, would be the consequence of dividing it." It appears from the record the party who held the property in common with the absentee was not an heir, and that it was the only property he owned in indivision with him. An inventory was therefore unnecessary. It is to be presumed that before the order to sell the property at public auction was rendered the judge had sufficient evidence before him to satisfy him that the property could not be conveniently divided in kind. The averments in the petition as to the small amount of interest owned by the absentee in the property would indicate that the judge who gave the order was satisfied on this point. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, avoided, and reversed, and it is now ordered that the relief prayed for be granted, and the rule herein be made absolute; appellees to pay costs.
